

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

JAMES WALKER (Suspender), Appellant.—Cotton, Q.C.—J. M. Duncan. No. 1.

THE PRESBYTERY OF ARBROATH (Respondents), Respondents.—

Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

Church—Churchyard—Presbytery—Jurisdiction—Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 96), secs. 3, 14, and 20—Compulsory Sale—

Notice.—On 18th April 1875 a notice was read from the pulpit of a parish church intimating that a petition had been presented to the Presbytery, “craving them to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors and all others concerned, or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend.” For several months prior to the giving of this notice the heritors of the parish had been in treaty with W., a heritor, the proprietor of part of “the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north,” but had been unable to conclude an agreement with him.

At the time specified the Presbytery, after inspecting the churchyard, proceeded to designate the piece of ground to the north belonging to W., who was not present, but who had heard the above intimation made in church. On 11th May notice was sent to W., as a heritor, that a second meeting of Presbytery would be held on 17th May “to take further steps towards making an addition to the churchyard,” and requesting him to attend.

At this meeting the Presbytery, upon the report of men of skill, fixed the value of W.'s ground. No notice of either judgment of the Presbytery was sent to W. or to his tenant till 22d July 1875.

In a suspension and interdict brought by W., on the grounds (1) that the only notice he had got of the meeting of 6th May was a notice that the Presbytery would merely visit and inspect the churchyard, and that therefore the decree of designation then pronounced was illegal, and (2) that he had been deprived of his statutory right of appeal to the Sheriff by not receiving notice of the judgment until after the time for appeal had expired, the First Division held (1) that the designation of an addition to a churchyard, and the regulation of the procedure thereanent, being matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Presbytery, were not subject to review in the Court of Session; and (2) that considering the fact that W. had been engaged in negotiations with the heritors as to the sale of his ground before the application to the Presbytery the notice from the pulpit was not insufficient, so as to justify the Court in quashing the whole proceedings as illegal. Judgment affirmed.

Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).
Ld. O'Hagan.
Lord Blackburn.
Lord Gordon.

This appeal was presented by James Walker of Ravensby against a judgment of the First Division of 1st March 1876 in a process of suspension and interdict at his instance against the Presbytery of Arbroath. In that process the appellant craved suspension of a decree of designation by the Presbytery of a piece of land on the estate of Ravensby as an addition to the churchyard of Barry, and interdict against the respondents carrying the same into effect.

The First Division refused suspension and interdict.

The circumstances are fully narrated in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the appellant in this case complains that a portion of his land, about three-quarters of an acre in extent, has been taken from him for the purpose of enlarging the churchyard of the parish of Barry, and that it has been taken from him irregularly, in a manner of which he is entitled to complain, and as against which he is entitled to have redress. My Lords, the appellant does not say that the churchyard of the parish should not be enlarged; on the contrary, he admits that it ought to be enlarged; and he does not say that his land is not the proper land out of which the enlargement ought to be made, and that some other land belonging to some other person would be better land for that purpose. An appraisement of the value of his land has been made, by which the three-fourths of an acre has been valued at about £106 or £107. What the value which the appellant puts upon his piece of land may be your Lordships are not informed, but of course he is quite in his right in saying that he estimates the value more highly than at the sum I have mentioned.

But I point out, in the first place, to your Lordships—and I do so with some regret—that the whole of this litigation is confined to the difference between the sum which I have mentioned and the larger sum, whatever it may be, which represents in the mind of the appellant the value of this small portion of land; and I cannot but strongly suspect that the costs incurred in the present litigation must amount to a very much larger sum than the difference between the sum which the respondents have been prepared to pay and that which the appellant would wish to have paid to him for this piece of land.

However, my Lords, be the sum which is at stake large or small, the appellant is entirely in his right in testing the regularity of the proceedings by which this portion of land is attempted to be taken from him. The complaint which he makes as to the regularity of these proceedings divides itself into two parts. In the first place, he says that under the circumstances of the case the Presbytery never acquired any jurisdiction to take his land, or to designate it as the land by which the churchyard was to be enlarged; and, in the second place, he says that even supposing that the circumstances were such as to give the Presbytery jurisdiction to designate a piece of ground for the enlargement of the churchyard, they did not give him that notice or intimation of the proceedings they were taking which he was entitled to, and which would have enabled him both to intervene in these proceedings, and, if dissatisfied with the result, to appeal against them under a recent statute of the present reign. I will take the second of these questions first. I will afterwards consider whether the Presbytery had, under the circumstances, jurisdiction to designate land for the enlargement of the churchyard; but I will assume at this moment that they had that jurisdiction, and will proceed to point out to your Lordships the facts of the case, as to the notice which the appellant received of the proceedings of the Presbytery. No. 1.

Now, in order that your Lordships may have that matter properly placed before you, I must remind you, in the first instance, of the origin and inception of these proceedings. The churchyard was supposed by the heritors and inhabitants of the parish to be too small for the increasing population of the principal town or place in the parish, namely the town of Carnoustie; and on the 18th of February 1874 we find that a meeting of heritors took place upon the subject. Mr Walker (the appellant) was present at that meeting, and was chairman. At that meeting, "after due deliberation on the present and prospective circumstances of the churchyard, and hearing the sexton's statement," "on the suggestion of Mr Walker, Mr Stevenson moved, and Mr Borrie seconded, that the meeting be adjourned to the 4th of March ensuing, at one o'clock afternoon, in order to obtain a fuller meeting of members of the committee."

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

What was done at the committee meeting of the 4th of March we are not told, but afterwards, on the 19th of March, a meeting of the heritors took place, at which again Mr Walker was present; and your Lordships have this information as to the opinion of that meeting of the heritors—"The meeting having had under consideration the state of the present burial-ground of this parish, is unanimously of opinion that some steps must immediately be taken, either for the purpose of enlarging the present burial-ground, or for acquiring ground in some other part of the parish for the purpose of burial." Therefore your Lordships have the opinion of the appellant that the churchyard should be enlarged, and of course he must have been aware that one, and not the most unlikely, mode of enlarging it would be by means of his own land, which was in actual contact with the churchyard.

On the 1st October, after an interval of some months, there was another meeting of the heritors. At that meeting Mr Walker was not present. "The meeting having had under consideration the necessity of providing additional burying-ground for the parish," we find that they say they are "unanimously of opinion that the most suitable ground for this purpose is the small field immediately adjoining the present burying-ground—to the north of the existing churchyard—belonging to James Walker, Esquire." Then they came to a resolution as to the offer which should be made to Mr Walker for a portion of his ground, and the clerk was "instructed to transmit to Mr Walker an extract of this minute, and the following committee was chosen, with power to carry into effect the resolutions aforesaid and report to another meeting."

Then your Lordships find by the minutes of the 19th November 1874 that upon the day after this formal meeting, namely on the 2d of October, the clerk immediately communicates with Mr Walker, and Mr Walker is then made aware, not merely that the churchyard was to be enlarged (to that he had assented), but that the opinion of the heritors was that the enlargement ought to be made out of his ground, and that they were willing to pay him a certain price for the ground. It further appears from the minute of this same meeting of the 19th of November that an answer had been given by Mr Walker, stating the price at which he would sell, but the meeting thought that price unreasonable, and declined to entertain it. Then it appears that a suggestion was made that some person else might be willing to sell a piece of land in the neighbourhood of another part of Mr Walker's property, and that might be exchanged by the heritors for the piece of ground of Mr Walker's which they wanted for the enlarge-

No. 1. ment of the churchyard; and the meeting appointed some members of the committee as a deputation, to wait upon Mr Walker and ascertain whether he would fall into this alternative plan. Your Lordships find that in the minute of the 1st December 1874 there is a report of the interview which the committee had with Mr Walker, from which it appears that Mr Walker declined the exchange, and adhered to his former offer as to price.

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

In the year 1875 it appears that there was a meeting of heritors on the 18th of March. Counsel's opinion had been taken as to the difficulty the heritors were in, and I infer that counsel had advised that it would be better if the heritors were to hand over the further conduct of this matter—the enlargement of the burying-ground—to the Presbytery, inasmuch as they themselves did not appear to have the power of getting the ground which they desired. The memorial and counsel's opinion “having been read and carefully considered by the meeting, it was unanimously resolved to act upon” counsel's “opinion, and make application to the Presbytery of Arbroath to design the ground necessary for the extension of the churchyard. The clerk was accordingly instructed to prepare the necessary petition.” The petition was prepared and signed by a number of heritors in the parish, and was presented to the Presbytery.

Now, I will ask your Lordships to observe the resolution at which the Presbytery arrived, because when I come to look at the intimation given in the kirk, it will connect itself with this resolution, and the resolution therefore should be borne in mind. The minute of the meeting of the Presbytery is of the 6th of April 1875; it is in these words—the “petition was read, and the Presbytery having considered the same, resolved to visit and inspect the churchyard of Barry on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock p.m., with a view to fix upon a piece of ground suitable for designating as an addition to the churchyard, if they shall find the same to be necessary, and to designate the same; and directed and hereby direct the minister to intimate this petition, and the time fixed for the visit, from the pulpit, and on the church door, and also by advertisement,” and so on. Therefore your Lordships, I think, can have no doubt in arriving at this, that whatever may be the effect of the intimation when it was given (that I will consider afterwards) the object and intention of the Presbytery was that there should be an intimation given in the kirk that they were going on the 6th of May to the churchyard, not alone to consider the question of the enlargement of the churchyard, but, feeling confident that the enlargement must take place—for the heritors were agreed upon it—to designate a piece of ground which would be suitable for the purpose of the enlargement. And in that respect they were acting upon the petition, because the petition had stated to them, not merely that the churchyard ought to be increased, but “that at a meeting of the heritors, held on the 1st of October 1874, it was unanimously agreed that a piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north side is the most suitable and convenient for appropriating as an addition to it,” viz. Mr Walker's piece of ground.

Your Lordships, therefore, before you come to the intimation in the kirk, approach it with this knowledge, that this matter had been a subject of general consideration throughout the parish, and among the heritors; that it was perfectly well known to Mr Walker, and that Mr Walker was himself of opinion that the churchyard ought to be enlarged; that he knew that the heritors desired to enlarge it by means of a piece of ground belonging to him, and that he was, or had been, in controversy with the heritors as to the price to be paid to him for that piece of ground; and therefore if he heard, as I shall afterwards shew he did hear, the intimation as to what the Presbytery were going to do, he heard that with a knowledge of all that had gone before, and of what was the desire of the heritors as to the mode and form of the enlargement of the churchyard.

No. 1.

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

My Lords, the intimation which the Presbytery had ordered was given in the kirk on the 18th of April, and your Lordships have it admitted that Mr Walker was present at the kirk and heard that intimation. The intimation, therefore, must be read, not as it might have struck your Lordships if you had been at the kirk without any knowledge of what had taken place, but as it would appear to the mind of Mr Walker, who knew everything which had taken place up to that time, and who knew the piece of ground which was referred to in the intimation as the source from which the enlargement was to take place. With that knowledge on his part this intimation is made in the kirk:—"Intimation is hereby given to the heritors of this parish, and all concerned, that a petition has been presented to the reverend the Presbytery of Arbroath, craving them to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors, and all others concerned, or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend."

Now, my Lords, as regards Mr Walker, this to his mind of course would read just as if his own name had been mentioned in it—as if it had been an intimation that a petition had been presented to the Presbytery craving them to set apart Mr Walker's piece of ground for an addition to the churchyard, and that the Presbytery would visit and inspect the churchyard at one o'clock on Thursday, the 6th May, at which time Mr Walker—for he was one of the heritors—was required to attend.

Now, I ask your Lordships to observe, with respect to the objection which has been made to this notice, that it consists both of an introduction and also of a part which conveys the actual affirmative intimation. The introductory part does not say that the petition presented to the Presbytery had asked the Presbytery first to consider whether there should be an enlargement or not, and then to designate the piece of ground, but it states that the Presbytery had been asked to do one thing, and one thing only, namely, assuming that there should be an enlargement, to designate and set apart the particular piece of ground mentioned in the notice, or other suitable piece, for the purpose of the enlargement. My Lords, I attach some importance to that, for this reason: If the introductory part of the notice had stated that the Presbytery had been asked to consider the expediency of enlarging the churchyard and then the mode of enlarging it, and thereupon an intimation had been given that the Presbytery were to meet in the churchyard on a particular day, it might have been said—I, hearing this notice, am in doubt whether it means that the Presbytery at their meeting are going to do anything more than consider the first question, namely, whether the churchyard ought to be enlarged at all. But, my Lords, when that is not the form of the notice—when the introductory part speaks of designating a particular piece of land, and the notice then states that the Presbytery will, upon a particular day, visit and inspect the churchyard—I must say that the inference which I should draw from that intimation, and I think the inference which any person who reads it or hears it, ought to draw from the intimation, is this, that the Presbytery, upon the day named, is coming to the churchyard for the

No. 1. purpose of considering that step—that proposal—which is mentioned in the introductory part of the intimation, namely, the designation of the particular piece of land, or other suitable piece of land, mentioned in the introduction. Your Lordships cannot of course tell what passed through the mind of Mr Walker, but I am bound to say that any person of ordinary understanding ought to have concluded that this was the meaning of the intimation, and that in any Court Mr Walker must be held to have received an intimation which has that natural and fair construction.

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

I should be extremely unwilling under any circumstances to hold as inept or irregular merely upon a matter of form the proceedings of a Presbytery, which is not a Court of law, and which does not proceed upon fixed and settled formulæ with regard to notices or other documents; but in this case it appears to me that both in form and in substance, upon a fair construction of the notice, the Presbytery had given a notice such as fairness required them to give before they were proceeding to designate the land under their powers.

The case does not stop there, because a subsequent notice was given on the 11th of May, following that which was given on the 18th of April. The notice of the 11th of May was not a notice in the kirk; it was a notice in a letter addressed to the appellant personally, and it states to him that "the reverend the Presbytery of Arbroath will meet at Barry on Monday, the 17th instant, within the parish church at Barry, at 1-30 p.m., to take further steps towards making an addition to the churchyard at Barry, which meeting you are requested to attend."

Now, supposing for a moment that on hearing the first intimation in the kirk the appellant had conceived that the Presbytery were going to divide their proceedings in two, and were going at their first meeting to consider whether the churchyard should be enlarged at all, and were going to leave over for a separate meeting whether it should be enlarged by the taking of the ground of the appellant—supposing, I say, that that had been his idea when he heard the first intimation, then it seems to me that this second intimation, given to him personally by letter, ought to have told him that the first step had been taken, and had resulted in the opinion that the churchyard should be enlarged, and that the Presbytery were now going to take the second step which had been referred to in the former intimation, namely, to designate his piece of ground as the ground by the addition of which the enlargement ought to be made.

My Lords, I have no hesitation in adopting the conclusion arrived at by the Lord President and the majority of the Court below, that there was in this case, supposing the Presbytery to have had the jurisdiction, a sufficient intimation to the appellant of their intention of exercising that jurisdiction for the purpose of designating his land.

I now turn to the other point which I reserved for subsequent consideration, namely, had the Presbytery the jurisdiction in this case to proceed to designate land for the enlargement of the churchyard? My Lords, the only objection made to their jurisdiction is this—and it is an objection which did not meet with favour from any of the Judges in the Court in Scotland—it is said the jurisdiction of the Presbytery to designate land for the enlargement of a churchyard is not a primary or original jurisdiction as it were; it arises only upon the failure or the refusal of the heritors to enlarge the churchyard and to procure ground for the purpose. The duty, argues the appellant, lies in the first instance upon the heritors to enlarge the churchyard. If they neglect it, or if they refuse to perform it, the Presbytery may step in and exercise their jurisdiction; but their jurisdiction does not arise until there is a failure on the part of the heritors, and, says the appellant, there was no such failure on the part of the heritors here. You are not able to predicate, he says, of the heritors that they did fail or refuse to enlarge the churchyard. On the contrary, he says, they were endeavouring to do it.

No. 1.
Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

My Lords, I will assume—though I should desire not to be understood as myself affirming it—that the view taken by the appellant of the law is correct. The old statute upon the subject is very obscure, and I should be sorry myself to appear to be defining what is the jurisdiction of the Presbytery, or how it arises; but I will assume that the appellant is right in his statement of the law. If the law be as he states it, of course it is obvious to your Lordships that the reason of the law must be this—until there has been some neglect by those who ought to be the best judges of the manner of the enlargement of the churchyard, and who will have to pay for that enlargement, the law does not desire to take the matter out of their hands, and to place it in the hands of what I may term an external body, who are not the body to pay for the enlargement. On the other hand, the law says that that which is necessary must be done, and if those who ought to do it fail to do it then the Presbytery are to be allowed to exercise their rights. What, my Lords, I ask, does that mean? Does that state of the law require that the heritors must contumaciously and violently refuse to exercise their power, or to discharge their duty, of providing an enlargement of the churchyard? Supposing the heritors admit openly and candidly that it ought to be enlarged, but suppose that in point of fact they do not enlarge it; suppose that they say—We cannot make a bargain of a satisfactory kind with any owner of land for the purpose of procuring an enlargement which we all admit to be required—are the Presbytery to be paralysed by the mere fact that the heritors have made no refusal, but have simply done nothing?

But I carry it further. Suppose the heritors come to the Presbytery and say, We do not desire to stand in your way; we do not desire to be supposed to be persons who are going to enlarge the churchyard, or to take any steps towards acquiring land for that purpose; we find the difficulties to be such that we abandon it in despair, and now you must look upon us as asking you to step in and to exercise the right which we might have exercised. It would appear to me to be the most monstrous and violent and the most inconvenient proposition possible, and one for which I know of no authority, to contend that in that state of things the jurisdiction of the Presbytery is not to arise, just as much as if the heritors had been contumacious—had denied that there ought to be an enlargement at all, or, admitting that there ought to be an enlargement, had refused to take any steps for the purpose of procuring that enlargement.

My Lords, I have in the former part of the case laid before you the facts as to the meetings which were held, and your Lordships remember what took place before the petition was presented to the Presbytery. If the heritors had been able to do so they would have made a bargain with the appellant, and have bought his land, and enlarged the churchyard; but they found they could not do that, and they took counsel's opinion, and the difficulties of their position being pointed out to them they gave up any idea of acting. They presented that petition to the Presbytery, in which they abandoned any intention of acting, and asked the Presbytery to proceed upon the footing that they, the heritors, were not going to act. My Lords, if the law be such that the Presbytery cannot

No. 1. act unless there be a failure by the heritors to act, then I say that in this case there was that failure by the heritors to act, and the jurisdiction therefore of the Presbytery arose. Therefore I entirely concur in the unanimous opinion of the learned Judges in the Court of Scotland.

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

Upon the whole, I submit to your Lordships that this appeal is one which does not rest upon any solid foundation, and that it ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I have had some difficulty, during the argument of this case, in reaching a conclusion satisfactory to myself. But, on the whole, I do not feel warranted in refusing my assent to the resolution proposed by my noble and learned friend. My difficulty was of a two-fold character. The conflict of opinion between the eminent Judges of the Court below created a reasonable hesitation in my mind. They had to consider a question of local procedure, to be determined very much by local usage, on which their knowledge of the ordinary course of action in the Church Courts of Scotland with reference to the extension of graveyards must necessarily have been greater than is possessed by the majority of your Lordships, and the marked difference in their mode of applying that knowledge suggested the propriety of caution and diffidence to persons less informed. But, further, the views of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Ardmillan as to the insufficiency of the notice given to the appellant have manifestly much to commend them to respectful attention.

Undoubtedly no man's property should be taken from him for any purpose, private or public, in the absence of such notice as may enable him to assert his right and offer such reasons, in respect both to the taking and the terms of the taking, as may secure him justice and adequate compensation. Now, in this case neither the statement to the congregation, of which the appellant appears to have been a member, nor the letter addressed to him personally, made any express reference to the designation or the value of his land. The statement only announced that on a given day the Presbytery would "visit and inspect," and did not declare that they would "designate," the ground; and the letter merely made the intimation that they would meet within the parish church "to take further steps towards making an addition to the churchyard." It is further to be observed that in neither case was the appellant addressed as the owner of the land in controversy, but only as one of the heritors of the parish.

Now, I think it very unfortunate that a more full and unequivocal indication of the intentions of the Presbytery was not given, for if it had been, this wretched litigation, at such heavy cost, about an interest so trivial, could not have been maintained. But when we are asked to set aside the entire proceedings and declare them of no effect we must consider the position of the appellant and the means substantially afforded him for self-protection. The notice published from the pulpit, affixed to the church door, and inserted in the newspapers, had more in it than the announcement of intention to "visit and inspect." It recited the petition craving the Presbytery to "design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground." The piece of ground "on the north" was the ground of the appellant, as to which there had been much negotiation, and which everybody knew the Presbytery wished to acquire; and taking the whole notice together, I incline to agree with the Lord Chancellor that, the "visit and inspection" being undertaken in pursuance of a petition "to design and set apart," the appellant might reasonably have expected to see for himself that nothing be done to prejudice his rights. He knew what was desired and what was contemplated. He had had interviews about the ground; he had had offers for it; and it would have been easy for him to have guarded himself from injury by his presence, or that of a representative, at the inspection to which he was invited.

No. 1.

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

Then, as a matter of fact, can we reasonably doubt that he had knowledge of the doings of the Presbytery on the occasion of their visit—quite time enough to appeal if he had been disposed to do so? The churchyard is in the immediate vicinity of the appellant's residence. His complaint rests very much on the allegation that the "amenity" of his property will be injured by its extension, so that the addition will become visible from the windows of his mansion-house. Is it conceivable in such circumstances that he should not have inquired about the proceedings of the Presbytery, almost at his very door, upon the 6th of May, or that he should not have heard of their designation of the ground? If he did know of it, the lapse of the time for appealing occurred through his own default.

Next, we have the letter of the 11th of May inviting him to meet the Presbytery on the 17th of May, with a view to the taking of further steps "towards making an addition to the churchyard." He may not have been bound to attend that meeting, but he was free to do so, and he must have understood it to have been designed to complete a proceeding already taken, and, if he had attended, he would still have had full time and opportunity to make his appeal.

This being the history of the matter, I think it important to note that there is no impeachment of the bona fides of the Presbytery. They did not seek to deceive or over-reach the appellant. They took the best advice they could get in Scotland, and acted honestly upon it for the general interest. And their proceedings are not lightly to be set aside if your Lordships are of opinion that, although technically the notices might have been better framed, the appellant did not suffer wrong, but had substantially such information given to him as should have been sufficient for the protection of his rights.

Then, we must not forget that there was no hard and fast line of procedure imposed upon the Presbytery. They acted, as was said in the Court of Session, under a jurisdiction regulated by the common law; the regulation of it depended on established usage, and that usage is authoritatively described by the Lord President when he says—"We have been referred to the forms and styles in Church Courts, which are well known and published and acted on every day, and in analogous cases, where styles are provided, we certainly find a great deal of authority for holding that an intimation of this kind, conveyed in general terms and making reference to the prayer of the application which is before the Presbytery, is quite sufficient notice to everybody concerned." And Lord Mure speaks of the practice to the same effect—"All this is done in the usual mode of giving notice by Presbyteries of proceedings before them, as I understand the style book." It is very hard for strangers to Scotland to resist the force of such testimony as to a local practice, coming from those whose position and experience must make them especially conversant with it.

And, finally, my Lords, it is plain that according to the law of Scotland the Court of Session had no power, and your Lordships have no power, to supervise or review or correct the action of the Presbytery. We can only interfere if there has been some flagrant violation of the fundamental principles of justice, resulting in substantial wrong to an individual, which it would be contrary to the universal course of legal tribunals to allow. We are not asked to amend a statutable or

No. 1. other irregularity, but to declare the proceedings absolutely null and void, on the ground that they have been essentially inequitable ; and can we do this, having regard to the good faith of the Presbytery, the substantial intimations of its purpose given to the defendant, and the opportunities afforded to him of resisting any wrong ?

Nov. 24, 1876.
Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

As to the question of jurisdiction, I shall add nothing to the observations already made. The Scottish Judges were unanimous upon it, and I see no reason to doubt that they were right.

I therefore give my concurrence to the proposition of the Lord Chancellor.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I also am of opinion that the resolution which has been proposed to your Lordships should be adopted.

I take it that the facts are to a certain extent undisputed here. The churchyard of the parish of Barry was in fact too small, and required to be enlarged, and the heritors agreed that a particular portion of land on the north side of the churchyard, which belonged in part (the greater part of it) to Mr Walker, the appellant, was the best piece of ground to be added to the churchyard. They wished to get it, and some negotiations between them and Mr Walker went on for that purpose for some time, in which they were endeavouring amicably by some arrangement to get this piece of land added to the churchyard. He objected to the proposed conditions,—I should conjecture not solely to the conditions as to the price, but also to the mode in which the piece of ground was to be laid out and occupied, which might affect the amenity of his property. But whatever the reason might be, the parties could not agree, and it is an admitted and agreed fact on all sides that the churchyard required enlargement, and the heritors thought that the piece of ground which ought to be added to it in order to make the enlargement was that which belonged to Mr Walker. Under these circumstances, having taken advice, they petitioned the Presbytery of Arbroath, in which the parish of Barry is, saying, what seems to be agreed on all hands, “that the providing and maintaining of a churchyard sufficient in extent for the wants of the parish is a burden incumbent on the heritors of each parish, and the duty of enforcing the obligation belongs to the Presbytery of the bounds.” Then they proceed to narrate in their petition (truly) that the churchyard was too small ; they narrate (truly) that the heritors had, at a meeting duly constituted, unanimously resolved that a portion of land on the north side was most suitable to be added, and they request the reverend Presbytery to take the proper steps to get that piece of land, or some other suitable piece, to be the addition.

Now, the first objection urged, as I understand, to the jurisdiction of the Presbytery, is this, that the duty of enforcing the obligation upon the heritors does not arise until the heritors have made default, and that consequently all that the Presbytery could or should have done here was to declare the undisputed fact (nobody ever disputed it ; it was a matter of common sense), that the churchyard did require increase, to agree with what seems to be the fact as stated by the heritors, that this piece of land on the north was the most convenient, and to send it back to the heritors and say, get that piece of land somehow—it is not explained by the learned counsel who have argued the case at your Lordships’ bar, how, but get it somehow—and it could only be (says the appellant) when the heritors had made default in getting it in some unexplained manner that the Presbytery would have jurisdiction.

My Lords, I am very unwilling upon such a subject as this, with which I am not familiar, to say anything that is unnecessary ; but supposing it was so, and supposing that the heritors had failed in doing what they were required to do—supposing that they had the power, and consequently the duty, to take this piece of land, and supposing that that duty had remained unfulfilled for a year and more, I cannot conceive how it could be said that the Presbytery, who had the jurisdiction of enforcing that duty, ought not to have intervened to enforce it when the heritors, fully a year after it was recognised that facts existed which would have placed the duty upon them, had done nothing towards fulfilling it. It seems to me, therefore, my Lords, that the Presbytery were duly seised of the cause, and should have proceeded to enforce upon the heritors the fulfilment of their obligation in the way in which the law required them to do it.

Now, my Lords, it appears that by the 31st and 32d Vict. chap. 96, the Presbytery having this jurisdiction are finally subject to a particular appeal, which must be brought within twenty-two days. The Presbytery here having proceeded, and the appeal not having been brought within the twenty-two days, what the Presbytery have done cannot be looked into. It was urged, and I think correctly, by the appellant below, that although it is true that you cannot inquire into what the Presbytery has done in the interim, yet the Presbytery must pursue their jurisdiction properly ; and it is the very essence of justice, and runs through the law of every country, that where proceedings are to be taken which may have the result of taking away a man's land, you must intimate to him sufficiently what you are going to do, that he may come and be heard, and shew, if possible, that you ought not to take away his land, or if you do take away his land, you ought to do it upon better terms than those which would otherwise have been offered to him. That lies at the very foundation of the administration of justice.

The real question here seems to me to be, whether the intimation given to Mr Walker of what the Presbytery were going to do was a sufficient intimation to fulfil the requirements of justice ? I do not understand that any of the Judges in the Court below doubt that it was necessary to shew that Mr Walker had such notice given to him as to enable him to come and defend his rights. The question was, whether or not the notice actually given to him was sufficient. Now, let us see what was done in order to see whether that was so or not. The Presbytery having taken into account the petition, which clearly asked them to designate this particular piece of land, determine that they will meet on "the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock p.m., with a view to fix upon a piece of ground suitable for designating as an addition to the churchyard, if they shall find the same to be necessary, and to designate the same." Then they proceed to direct that the minister shall intimate that from the pulpit and elsewhere. Clearly the Presbytery there intended to express in the clearest words possible that they intended to meet at the churchyard for the purpose, amongst other things, of designating the piece of land ; and it is pretty obvious, when you consider the nature of things, that the very purpose for which the Presbytery met upon the ground must have been the purpose of designating the ground. It is very true that upon the undisputed question of whether the churchyard was too small or not a personal inspection by the Presbytery might have afforded them evidence of that, and have shewn them that the churchyard was overcrowded ; but it is quite plain that upon the question of which was the most convenient piece of land to be added to the churchyard the personal inspection which they actually performed was of the greatest importance. The Presbytery themselves had made the most clear statement that they were going there for that very purpose, but unfortunately the intimation which has caused this litigation is in more general words. It is this—"Intimation is hereby given to the heritors of this parish, and all concerned, that a petition has been presented to the reverend the Presbytery of Arbroath, craving them to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north," (I may observe that that included, besides Mr Walker's ground, a part belonging to Lord Dalhousie as well, but he has not made any complaint), "or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors, and all others concerned, or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend."

Now, my Lords, the Lord Ordinary and Lord Ardmillan thought, as a matter of fact, that this notice did intimate to those who were present—and Mr Walker was present and heard it—that the Presbytery were going to meet at the churchyard, but that although the Presbytery, in point of fact, were going to meet at the churchyard for the purpose of viewing and designating the land if they thought proper, with power to adjourn any matter for decision afterwards, Mr Walker had a right to suppose, and would naturally suppose, that they were merely going to look at the land and do nothing more. I think, for the reasons I have stated, that the natural and prima facie impression of any one who read or heard that notice, and knew what the nature of the thing was, would be that the meeting of the Presbytery upon the ground in order to view it must have been principally for the purpose of ascertaining the suitability of the ground on the north for the addition, and of designating that piece of ground. But when we find what the Lord President states as to the styles and forms of the Court of Presbytery, and the manner in which they conduct their business—when we find that, according to his statement, an intimation of this general sort, referring generally to the terms of the petition, has always been held sufficient, and when we consider that Mr Walker, or at all events his advisers, knew what were the styles and forms of the Court of Presbytery, I cannot bring myself to doubt that upon hearing this intimation he ought to have known that the Presbytery were to meet at the churchyard for the purpose of taking steps, then and there, to fix upon this land as the land which was to be added to the churchyard; and if he did not choose to go, and consequences followed, and things passed behind his back, it was his own fault.

I think, my Lords, that that is greatly confirmed by the fact that the Presbytery, not having ascertained the value of this piece of land, adjourned that matter to a future occasion, and there were further steps taken on that day; and although formal notice was given, through the clerk, to the heritors, and amongst others Mr Walker, of that adjourned meeting, still Mr Walker did not attend. I quite agree with what has been said, that that further shews that Mr Walker was to blame, for had he attended then he would have known what they were doing, and he would have had an opportunity of appealing if he had wished to do so. Even if the twenty-two days ran, not from the time when the notice was given to him of the meeting of the 17th of May, but from the 6th of May, they would not have run then. It seems to me, my Lords, that he had complete and sufficient intimation of what the Presbytery were going to do, and consequently he cannot establish the want of such notice as I quite agree with all the Judges below in thinking was necessary. He cannot set up the ground of a want of such sufficient notice given to him as would authorise him to come and defend his own interests. I think that such notice was amply given, and consequently that what the Presbytery did was with full jurisdiction, and if Mr Walker lost his opportunity of appealing it was owing to his own fault, which we cannot now help.

Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

LORD GORDON.—My Lords, the first question which arises is, whether the Presbytery had jurisdiction to do the act which is the subject of complaint here, namely, to designate the land which belonged to the appellant. As to that there appears to be no doubt whatever expressed in the Court below. I do not see any suggestion on the part of the Lord Ordinary that there was any doubt as to that, and I find also on looking at Lord Ardmillan's judgment that he expressed a very clear opinion that he had no doubt whatever as to the jurisdiction. We have had an able argument from my learned friend Mr Duncan, whose skill in these matters is well known, but I think he has not established to your Lordships' satisfaction that the Presbytery were not entitled to act in the manner in which they did act under the circumstances of this case, for although he pushed his argument so far as to say that it was necessary that there should be contumacious opposition on the part of the heritors, I venture to think that that is not correct, and if there has been default and failure to perform a duty incumbent upon them by law, then the duty of the Presbytery to compel them to do so does come into operation. I apprehend, therefore, in the first place, that there is no question whatever as to the jurisdiction of the Presbytery to pronounce the judgment which is the subject of complaint.

But, in the next place, the ground upon which objection was taken to the judgment was that no notice had been given to the appellant of the proceedings intended to be taken by the Presbytery. Now, after what has been stated by your Lordships so very clearly, and with reference to the documents, particularly the intimation of the meeting of the 6th of May, which must have been known to Mr Walker, who was present in the church when the intimation was given, I think it is plain that he did receive due notice that the Presbytery intended to exercise their jurisdiction, and having received such notice it was his duty, if he intended to combat any resolution which they might adopt in the way of taking possession of his property for adding it to the churchyard, to have attended the meeting of the Presbytery; but he failed to do so. And even after the notice of the 11th of May was given to him, intimating that they were about to take further steps in the matter, he failed to appear before the Presbytery on the 17th. He did not avail himself of the opportunity which the law afforded to him of stating his views to the Presbytery, and, if they refused to adopt his views, of taking an appeal to the Sheriff. In having thus neglected to avail himself of the opportunity given to him by the Presbytery of stating his objections to any designation of his land, I think he has put himself out of Court. He is not in a position to say that the land has been taken without due notice, and therefore I venture to think that upon that ground the judgment which was adopted by the Lord Ordinary, and adopted also by the late Lord Ardmillan, is not well founded, but that the opinions of the other learned Judges below are entitled to the greater weight.

I do not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships by going over the details of the documents, because those have been sufficiently brought before your Lordships; but it is of importance to keep in view what has been stated by my noble and learned friend who has last spoken, that there is no allegation of a breach

No. 1. of a statutory form on the part of the Presbytery ; neither is there any allegation of there being any deviation from any customary procedure on the part of the Presbytery. That, I think, has been clearly brought out in the opinion of the Lord President, and has not been challenged by anything which has been stated at the bar.

Walker v.
Presbytery of Arbroath.

That being so, my Lords, I think there was jurisdiction on the part of the Presbytery, and there was due notice given of the intention to exercise that jurisdiction in the way of dealing with this particular piece of land which is the subject of dispute. I do not go into the question as to whether there is not a strong reason for presuming that all the facts were substantially known to Mr Walker. I venture, however, to think that the impression which must be left on the mind of everybody is that it is very difficult to conceive that he was in ignorance of the meetings of the Presbytery with reference to this piece of ground, in which he held so great an interest. Therefore I think, under the whole circumstances of the case, your Lordships will be of opinion that the interlocutor appealed against ought to be affirmed.

Buccleuch, &c.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Respondents.—
Southgate, Q.C.—Cotton, Q.C.—R. Johnstone.

Process—Summons—Joint Pursuers—Joint Defenders.—In an action at the instance of several proprietors of different lands on the banks of a river against several firms of paper manufacturers having their works at different places on its course, concluding for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to have the water of the river transmitted in a state fit for the primary uses, and for interdict against the defenders polluting the same, the defenders pleaded that the pursuers were not entitled to sue jointly or to maintain the action against the several defenders, in respect that the rights and interests of the several pursuers and of the several defenders were different, that the summons did not set forth a joint cause of action, each defender being responsible only for his own acts, and that the calling of the defenders in one action was oppressive.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the action having been brought by persons jointly interested in preserving the stream from pollution alleged to result from the actings of all the defenders, and the conclusions of the summons being merely for declarator of the pursuers' right to prevent that pollution and for interdict, the conjunction of the several pursuers and of the several defenders in one action was competent and convenient.

Process—Contingency—Conjunction.—Three actions raised by riparian proprietors, concluding for interdict against owners of paper-mills upon the banks of a river polluting the water were conjoined by the Court, although some of the parties in one of the actions were not parties in the others. Held (in aff. the judgment of the Second Division) that the conjunction was competent and convenient.

This was an appeal from judgments of the Second Division in conjoined actions at the instance of the Duke of Buccleuch and other riparian proprietors on the river North Esk in Midlothian, against Alexander

Cowan and Sons and other proprietors and occupiers of paper-mills on the banks of that river. No. 2.

The first of the conjoined actions, raised in 1841, was insisted in after 1863 by the Duke of Buccleuch, Viscount Melville, Sir James William Drummond of Hawthornden, and Robert Brown of Firth, against Alexander Cowan and Sons, paper-makers at Valleyfield Mill, William Somerville and Sons, Dalmore Mill, Annandale and Son, Polton Mill.

The summons concluded for declarator that the pursuers had right to have the water of the North Esk transmitted to them in a state fit for the primary uses, and that the defenders had no right to pollute the water, and for interdict against the defenders discharging into the river polluting matter from their respective works.

The pursuers averred that the stream had been polluted by noxious refuse of materials discharged from the defenders' works.

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded ;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) The several pursuers are not entitled to sue this action jointly, or to maintain it against several defenders, in respect that their rights and interests are different. (3) The summons being libelled, and the action laid, at the instance of the pursuers jointly, the action ought to be dismissed, in respect the summons does not set forth a joint cause or causes of action, which the pursuers are entitled jointly to sue and maintain. (4) The causes of action alleged in the summons against the defenders respectively being essentially separate and distinct, and none of the defenders being responsible or liable for the acts or conduct of the others, but each only for his own acts and conduct, it was unfair, oppressive, and illegal to include the whole in one summons, and on this account the action ought to be dismissed.

On 23d January 1864 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) repelled the pleas, and on 9th February 1864 the Second Division adhered.

Thereafter two other actions of declarator and interdict were brought, the one by the Duke of Buccleuch, Viscount Melville, and Sir James William Drummond, against Alexander Cowan and Sons (the partners being different from the original firm of Alexander Gowan and Sons), James Brown and Company, paper-makers at Esk Mill ; and William Somerville and Son, paper-makers at Dalmore Mill ; and the other action by the Duke of Buccleuch and Viscount Melville only against Alexander Annandale and Sons of Polton Mill, Alexander Fullerton Somerville, paper-maker at Kevock Mill, and William Tod and Son, paper-makers at St Leonard's Mill.

The cases were reported on the issues, and the Second Division, on the motion of the pursuers, conjoined the three actions by interlocutor of 23d February 1866.

The conjoined actions were subsequently tried by jury on 30th July 1866 and following days, and the jury returned a verdict for the pursuers on all the issues, and thereafter the defenders, under an agreement with the pursuers, conducted experiments with a view of abating the nuisance. In 1873 the pursuers moved for decree. The Court pronounced decree of declarator ; and the defenders having stated that they had no proposals to make for abating the nuisance, and did not move for further inquiry, the Court further granted the interdict.

The defenders appealed. At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the subject-matter brought under your Lordships' consideration in this case is one the importance of which to the appellants can hardly be overstated. At the same time, your Lordships have had the advantage of a most able argument, which has submitted to you every topic

No. 2. which could be urged on behalf of the view taken by the appellants. You have the unanimous decision of the Second Division, and I think I speak correctly when I say that the arguments of the appellants have not raised in the minds of any of your Lordships any doubt as to the correctness of that decision. Under these circumstances I think your Lordships are prepared, without further argument, to dispose of the question which is now raised.

Nov. 30, 1876.
Cowan & Sons,
&c. v. Duke of
Buccleuch, &c.

The action is one instituted in Scotland with reference to an alleged pollution of the river called the North Esk. A number of riparian proprietors are proceeding against a certain number of owners of paper-mills upon the Esk, and the summons alleges pollution of the river by those owners of paper-mills. The objections which have been urged on the part of the appellants resolve themselves really into one principal objection, and that is that it was not competent, either in the shape of one original action or in the shape of a conjunction of several actions, for different riparian owners to pursue the various owners of paper-mills in one proceeding with regard to the pollution of the same river.

My Lords, this objection is, as your Lordships will at once see, an objection with reference to procedure and practice, and, to a certain extent, an objection with reference to the exercise of the discretion of the Court below. In matters of procedure and practice, and still more in matters of discretion, and, above all, where the Judges of the Court below are unanimous as to a matter of procedure and practice, the uniform practice of your Lordships' House has been not to differ from that opinion unless your Lordships are perfectly satisfied that it is founded upon erroneous principles.

For the purpose of determining the competency of the action we must look at the allegations which are found in the pleadings upon both sides, and I will, in the first place, with regard to the record, direct your Lordships' attention to the particular relief which is asked in the original action in this case.

I can very well understand that there is an inconvenience almost amounting to an impossibility in joining a number of pursuers in an action of damages against a number of defenders. Suppose four riparian owners, A, B, C, and D, commence a proceeding against four owners of separate mills, W, X, Y, and Z, for the pollution of a river—a proceeding in which the pursuers seek to recover damages against the defenders—there the jury or the tribunal, whatever it might be, which would have to inquire into and assess the damages, would have first to take the case of the millowner W, and, having ascertained that he was liable in damages, they would have to find out what damages he had to pay, first to the riparian owner A, then to the riparian owner B, then to C, and then to D. The amount of damage might be, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred would be, different as to those different riparian owners, and a different inquiry and an assessment of a different sum would have to take place as to each of them. So, my Lords, it may be with regard to the defenders; when you had ascertained the sum which would have to be paid by W by way of damages to each of the four riparian owners, you would then have to proceed to the case of X. It is almost impossible that the damage occasioned by W should be exactly the same as the damage occasioned by X. You would have, therefore, in the case of X and of Y and of Z, to ascertain as to each of them the damage which he had done, and again, the damage which he had done to each riparian owner. The inconvenience of a proceeding of that kind is so great that, although it is not a point for your Lordships' decision in the present case, and I do not desire to be taken as expressing any final opinion upon it, I can well understand that by reason of that inconvenience it might well be held that it was incompetent to join together the pursuers whom I have described, and the defenders whom I have indicated, in one and the same proceeding.

But when I turn to the nature of the present proceeding I find that it is as different as anything well can be from a proceeding sounding in damages. Your Lordships find that there are three different subjects to which the conclusions of the summons point—I refer to the summons in the original action, which, in this respect, is the same as the summons in the later actions. The first object is, that it “should be found and declared that the pursuers have good and undoubted right to have the water of the North Esk, so far as it flows through or by their properties, transmitted in a state fit for the use and enjoyment of man and beast; and the said defenders have no right to pollute or adulterate the water, nor to use it or the channel of the stream in any way or for any purpose such as to render the water noxious or unwholesome or unfit for all its natural primary purposes to the pursuers, or in any way to destroy the amenity of the stream”—that is to say, that there may be a declarator that the natural right to the running stream in its natural condition, which prima facie would be possessed by these riparian owners, has not been in this particular instance taken away or abridged, or in any way affected by any right acquired by those who are said to be polluting the stream

The second object of the action is, that the defenders may be “prohibited and interdicted from discharging into the water of the Esk, from their respective paper-works, any impure stuff or matter of any kind, whereby the water in its progress through or along the property of the pursuers, or any of them, may be polluted or rendered unfit for domestic use, or for the use of cattle, or its amenity in any way diminished, or the right of the pursuers therein in any way injured or affected”.—that is to say, an interdict following the declarator, and protecting the right which, in the first instance, is sought to be declared; and then, in the alternative, “it ought and should be found and declared that in the event of the defenders, or any of them, being found entitled to continue the use of the water, or any portion thereof, for all or any of the works mentioned, that they are bound and obliged to make use of the water in the manner least injurious to the pursuers, and to use all necessary and proper precautions, by filtration and otherwise, to restore the water to the stream, after having been used at the works respectively, in as pure a state and condition as possible.”

Along with that conclusion of the summons your Lordships will probably take those averments in the condescendence and in the replies, to which, in the course of the argument, your attention was directed. Those are averments asserting upon the part of the pursuers a course of pollution of the river, uniform in this respect, that it comes from the different paper-mills used by the different defenders in the manufacture of paper, the process of the manufacture of paper being asserted to be of the same or of a similar kind; and the defenders make defences to these averments which are identical in point of expression and in point of allegation.

Now, my Lords, I do not mean to say that even in this case (I am still considering the a priori arguments for or against the united action) there may not be inconveniences in having to try the action which it is proposed to try by the summons to which I have referred. The nature of the case is such that, tried in any way, either in a joint action or in separate actions, great and grave inconvenience and difficulty will be experienced by any Court upon which the task devolves. But I have no hesitation in saying that, as a balance of convenience and inconvenience, it appears to me that, looking at the subjects of relief which are comprised in this summons, the convenience of dealing with these matters of relief in one conjunct action rather than in separate actions preponderates immensely in favour of the conjunct action. Take, for example, the intermediate conclusion of the summons with regard to an interdict; supposing an interdict had been granted in five or six different actions, and it became a question as to whether that interdict had or had not been obeyed, it would be utterly impossible for any Court to answer that question without having before it the whole of the defenders, in order that the Court might know to the conduct of which of the defenders the continued pollution of the river was to be attributed. And, my Lords, so also with regard to the pollution before the interdict was granted. The experience of any of your Lordships who have observed trials of this kind will have shewn you that where the proceeding is directed against one individual simply for polluting a river, it is always a topic of defence with that one person that the pollution either comes altogether from the works of some other person upon the river, or comes from the works of that other person in so great a degree as to render the pollution of the individual actually sued not worthy the attention of the Court. It is therefore only where you can have placed face to face before you the various persons who are said to be polluting the same stream by the same process and by similar acts that you can decide whether they are all culpable or not, and whether there shall be a declarator with regard to all of them or not, and if anything is to be done which bears the aspect of an intermediate course—anything in the way of remedy—how that shall be carried out as between the different persons before the Court.

Those are the considerations which, altogether irrespective of authority, naturally occur to my mind, and which I submit for the approval of your Lordships. We must, however, be regulated by the well-established rules of procedure and practice upon the subject; and however convenient the course which I have indicated may be, if there are rules of procedure against it, those rules must not be departed from.

But, my Lords, are there such rules of procedure and practice in Scotland as render an action, such as I have described, incompetent?

The procedure of the Courts both of equity and of common law in England is very well known, and the procedure in the common law Courts has long been of a very rigid and exact description. That is a procedure generally between one person and another person—between A and B—the one almost always suing the other for damages; a single issue is raised and is adjusted between the two litigants, and the right of the plaintiff is established or is denied as against the particular defendant. So rigid and so inconvenient at times was the course of procedure at common law found to be that in the Court of Chancery it has been very much relaxed, and much greater latitude has been allowed there in the joinder of different parties having an interest in the same subject-matter. Your Lordships were referred, in the course of the very able argument by Mr Davey, to a well-known proceeding in the Court of Chancery, called a bill of peace, a bill not of very common occurrence, but of which there have been instances even within living memory—a bill which brings before the Court a number of persons having, not identical rights, but rights in regard to the same subject-matter, who are making claims and asserting those rights, and who are brought together to have something like a declarator made in the presence of the whole, with regard to the nature and extent of those rights, in order in that way to give quiet and peaceful possession to the plaintiff who brings them before the Court. In one point of view the present proceeding, if we put aside the more active part of the relief sought, namely, the interdict, bears a certain analogy to a bill for a quiet possession. The tendency in this country, as has been pointed out, with reference to recent legislation, has been very much to enlarge the power of bringing parties having several interests, or interests in the alternative, before the Court.

But, my Lords, passing from the English practice, which can only be referred to as an illustration, and coming to the Scotch practice, what do your Lordships find to be the state of the authorities? The competency of joining in an action of this kind several pursuers appears to me to be put beyond all doubt by the authorities which have been referred to.¹ Your Lordships have the case of the river Don, where the upper heritors appear to have maintained an action for the purpose of having removed a fence or weir or impediment of some kind which was placed across the river lower down, and which interfered with the passage of salmon up to the various lands of the upper heritors. Your Lordships have the case of Lord Moray,² where one general act done by the order of Lord Moray, affecting a number of persons, each in his own premises, namely, the carrying of certain drainage from a suburb of Edinburgh to the village of Stockbridge, was made the subject of proceedings, which were maintained successfully by several pursuers of the same character as the pursuers in the present case. And, my Lords, there is no authority produced the other way. As to the question of pursuers joining, therefore, the authorities appear to be quite clear and quite satisfactory; and, indeed, the argument was not directed at all so strongly as against the case of the junction of the pursuers as against the junction of the defenders.

But, my Lords, how do the authorities stand with regard to a joinder of defenders in a case of this kind? In the first place, I must point out what seems to me to be a matter to which your Lordships should give the greatest possible weight. There is no authority produced in any decided case, or in any book of practice, which negatives the right and competency in a case of this kind, of bringing before the Court several defenders. On the other hand, your Lordships have, what I have before referred to, the unanimous opinion of the Judges of the Court in the present case, that such a proceeding is competent and is not at variance with the known and recognised procedure. Now, my Lords, if the practice is one entirely consistent with the whole spirit of the procedure in Scotland, your Lordships will not be surprised to find that there is no case actually decided and recorded upon the subject, because it would not occur to any person to make and record an objection to that which was really a part of the ordinary procedure of the Courts of the country.

But, further than that, your Lordships happen to have a case recorded in which, although it is perfectly true no objection such as is taken here was taken, yet a similar objection might have been taken, and from the fact that the objection was not taken I infer that the joinders in that particular instance, of

I refer to Lord Breadalbane's case¹—the case of the sheep drovers—which came before your Lordships' House. There Lord Breadalbane brought before the Court several persons who were united in interest only in this way, that they all alleged that they had a right, in driving sheep from certain farms in the north of Scotland towards the south, not only to use a roadway, the right to use which, indeed, was not in any way denied, but that they were entitled every ten or twenty miles to halt the droves of sheep and to pasture them in the neighbouring land of Lord Breadalbane, or what were called the stances, which really were parts of the hill-side. Lord Breadalbane united together as defenders seventeen, eighteen, or twenty of those persons who asserted a right of that kind; he brought them before the Court for the purpose of obtaining a declarator and an interdict; he succeeded in doing so, and the objection, my Lords, was never taken that it was wrong or contrary to Scotch procedure to join those various defenders together.

Cowan & Sons,
&c. v. Duke of
Buccleuch, &c.

There is, moreover, an Act of Parliament applying to Scotland, the 48 Geo. III, c. 151, which provides "that where any action, matter, process, complaint, or cause has been brought before one of the said Divisions or the Lords Ordinary thereof, the other Division or the Lords Ordinary thereof shall remit any action, process, matter, complaint, or cause subsequently brought before them relating to the same subject-matter or thing, or having a connection or contingency therewith, to the consideration of the Division or Lords Ordinary before whom the first cause, action, process, complaint, or matter had been previously brought, which remit shall be made in such form and manner as is now used, or as shall be established by future regulations from time to time." Therefore, my Lords, if there had in this case been separate actions brought by these pursuers against the different owners of these mills, it would have been obligatory upon the Division of the Court before which they were brought to send the second and subsequent of those actions to the Lord Ordinary who had possession of the first, and they must all have stood before that same Judge, and it would have been for that one Judge to consider what, under those circumstances, he ought to have done. I took the liberty of asking the learned counsel whether he could shew that it would have been ultra vires of that Lord Ordinary to have joined those actions if he had thought that they were so connected in point of evidence and in point of interest that it would be more convenient that they should be tried on one occasion by one jury than that they should be tried on different occasions before different juries. The learned counsel doubted the power of the Lord Ordinary, but no authority was adduced to shew that the Lord Ordinary had not such a power.

The Act of Parliament evidently indicates that the remit is to be made for some practical purpose. There can be no practical purpose, as, indeed, was pointed out by the Lord Justice-Clerk, except that the Lord Ordinary when he has the different actions before him may consider what is the best course to adopt, whether to join them together or to sist all but one, to wait until that one is tried—that is to say, it is in the discretion of the Lord Ordinary which course he will adopt. But, my Lords, if it is in the discretion of the Lord Ordinary to join together a number of actions brought by these pursuers against each polluter of the river, I ask why is it to be held to be contrary to procedure, or contrary to competency, that in the first instance the pursuers should join the various persons said to be polluting in the same way the same river in one and the same action? It appears to me that there is nothing in reason or in principle which could lead your Lordships to hold that the learned Judges of the Court of Session were wrong when they affirmed that such an action was competent in Scotland. It appears to me to be perfectly clear that the action is competent as regards the joinder of the pursuers. Although the authority is not so distinct for the joinder of the different defenders, there is authority for their joinder; there is the united testimony of the Judges in the present case that such joinder is consistent with the Scottish procedure; there is every argument of convenience for having this whole question decided in one litigation between the different parties, and therefore the objection as to competency must, in my opinion, fail.

Some argument was adduced with regard to the form of the issues, but that came, I think, in the result, not to be really insisted upon before your Lordships. Whether, if your Lordships had now the settling of the issues, some words might or might not, with advantage, be altered, I do not stop to inquire. It appears to me that in substance these different issues presented to the jury the various questions which had to be decided, and there is nothing before your Lordships to lead you to suppose that there has been any miscarriage of justice in the determination which has been elicited from the jury.

Upon the whole, I submit to your Lordships that this appeal fails, and that it must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD PENZANCE.—My Lords, the case has been so completely gone into by the Lord Chancellor, and I so entirely agree with everything that has fallen from him, that very little on my part needs to be added.

A great deal has been said in argument about the convenience or the inconvenience of adopting this or that course; but, after all, I apprehend that the question before your Lordships to-day is not whether it is most convenient that this or that procedure should be adopted, but whether, as a matter of fact, the procedure in the present case is or is not consistent with the existing practice of the Court in Scotland.

When we come to examine that question I admit that we are met with some difficulty by reason of the very meagre materials that are afforded us upon which to form a conclusion as to what the practice of the Court in Scotland is. But, my Lords, I conceive that where the Court has a by unanimous decision affirmed that this proceeding is entirely within the limits of its own practice and procedure something very much stronger than any argument as to such a procedure being inconvenient ought to be required before your Lordships can come to a conclusion that a decision affirming that procedure ought to be reversed. And, indeed, I think that, under the circumstances, the Scotch Court having affirmed the existence of the procedure, the onus is cast upon the appellants to satisfy your Lordships that that conclusion is wrong by referring you to some distinct precedent, decision, or authority to the contrary effect.

The appellants have wholly failed to lay before your Lordships' House anything in the shape of a decision contrary to the decision which is now appealed from; but they have adduced a great deal in the way of argument tending to shew that such a practice might be inconvenient. And here, my Lords, I will observe that there is a constant tendency in the argument of a case of this kind

No. 2. to draw analogies from the law of England, and I think your Lordships cannot be too much upon your guard against importing into a question which is purely a Scotch question, relating to the practice of the Scotch Courts, conclusions drawn from a practice purely English, namely, the procedure of the Courts of this country. As the Lord Chancellor has said, there is no doubt whatever that, as far as common law is concerned, the Courts in this country have been bound, most of them, by inflexible rules, handed down in great measure from the time of the Plantagenets, and until certain modern statutes were passed there was no possibility of altering or improving them.

Nov. 30, 1876.
Cowan & Sons,
&c. v. Duke of
Buccleuch, &c.

But when I inquire in this case as to the Scotch practice I am struck at once by the great dissimilarity that there is between the practice in Scotland and the practice of the Courts in this country, because to take, for instance, one of the cases which have been cited, the case of Revey and Bell v. Murdoch,¹ which was the case where two men were thrown out of a gig by reason of somebody's negligence in leaving a heap of rubbish out in the road, it was held in the Court in Scotland that those two men could join together in an action. That, I need hardly say, is a matter which is entirely inconsistent with any practice in this country. They were independent persons, each having independent causes of action, each having received independent injuries, and each was entitled to a personal action. No doubt the cause of action would be similar in each case, but there was no community between the two plaintiffs, which, according to English practice, would admit of their being joined in one action. The next case cited was the case of Harkes v. Mowat.² That was an action of slander by two pursuers against one defender, who had said that they were robbing, swindling rascals. It was quite consistent with the practice of the Scotch Court that that should be a joint action; but that again is wholly at variance with English notions upon the subject. I think an even stronger illustration is found in the case of Douglas,³ which has been alluded to in the argument. In that case the Lord Justice-Clerk said, after alluding to an Act of Regulations which was passed in 1695,—“It is not pretended that this regulation can receive, or ever has received, literal obedience. On the contrary, the object of the provision, much more limited than the words seem to import, is well known, historically, to have been the prevention of a practice, formerly prevalent, of embracing in one summons actions against debtors more than six in number, each defender being pursued on a separate ground of debt unconnected with the debts of the other defenders called. Strange as this may sound to modern ears, there is no doubt of the fact, for it is distinctly stated by Sir George Mackenzie, writing before the Act of Regulations in the year 1684. In the fourth book and first title of his Institutions he says,—‘Though the accumulation of several actions into one libel was not allowed by the civil law yet it is allowed by ours, in which we may not only pursue several persons for several debts in one libel, which we call by a general name an action against debtors, but we may likewise accumulate several conclusions against one and the same person, though they be of different natures, as reductions, improbations, and

Cowan & Sons,
&c. v. Duke of
Buccleuch, &c.

That, my Lords, is a general statement of what the old law of Scotland was, and it is utterly at variance with the English practice upon the subject. Although it is quite true that this practice with regard to debts, as the learned Judge goes on to point out, has long since been disused, and has not for the last hundred or two hundred years been followed, still here is a statement which shews that the old law of Scotland was, in this respect of joining both plaintiffs and defendants together, so widely at variance with the English law that we need not be astonished to find that in such a case as the present, although this joining of plaintiffs and defendants is a thing which according to the English law we could not support, yet according to the Scotch law it might be the most natural thing in the world.

Now, my Lords, there being no authority whatever against this conjoint proceeding, there being the statement of the Court itself that it is according to practice, and there being, from the authorities I have just alluded to, proof that the procedure in Scotland differs widely from the procedure in England in this respect, I think there can be no more natural conclusion to arrive at than that this conjoint proceeding is quite consistent with the practice of the Court in Scotland; and I venture to say that that is really the whole question before your Lordships upon the present occasion.

But as a very able argument has been addressed to us with regard to the convenience and inconvenience of the matter, and as distinctions have been taken by the learned counsel, according to which, supposing that those distinctions are correct, although the defenders might in some cases be joined, they could not be joined in such a case as this, I will trouble your Lordships with one or two remarks, and one or two only, upon the subject. It has been argued that the cause of action in such a case as the present against each defender is wholly separate and distinct and unconnected with that against the others, and it is upon this proposition that the chief reliance is placed against the competency of the action. But the cause of action in each case is not the mere act of pouring polluting matter into the river, for the quantity might be insufficient to do mischief by reason of dilution, or the water might purify itself as flowing water does, so that the cause of action is not complete until the result of rendering the water unfit for the pursuers' use has been brought about. This result may in some cases perhaps be traced to the individual act of one of the defenders, but in the majority of cases the reverse is the fact, and the extent of deterioration in the water worked by the polluting acts of several other defenders would have to be inquired into. This establishes, I think, a very obvious connection between the several defenders. The cause of action against each of them depends upon the ultimate impurity of the water when it reaches the pursuers' lands, and that ultimate impurity is the joint result of the acts of all of them. The main ground, therefore, upon which the incompetency of the present action is rested appears to me to fail.

But if I turn to the question of convenience I think the case is even stronger for the respondents, for the choice, as a matter of inconvenience, lies between investigating this joint result and determining the share which each defender may have in it in the presence of all the defenders on the one hand,

No. 2. or trying the effect of each defender's acts separately, and in the absence of the others, on the other hand. Even in the case of damages there would be much to be said under such circumstances in favour of a joint trial, but in such a case as the present, which is one not of damages but of declarator and interdict, the convenience and even justice of the case is, in my opinion, best met by a joint proceeding.

Nov. 30, 1876.
Cowan & Sona,
&c. v. Duke of
Buccleuch, &c.

Now, my Lords, I am well aware, on the other hand, of the inconvenience to which the learned counsel adverted. There is no doubt that there are never three prisoners tried, and there are never cases in which there are three defendants in a common law action, whose defences are separate, and there are never cases in which there are three or four parties in the Divorce Court or in the Probate Court, coming before a jury, where great inconvenience may not arise by reason of the several parties having separate interests, so that the defence of one party is not identical with that of the others, and still more, by reason of what is evidence against the one party not being evidence against another. The strongest possible evidence against a man is a letter or paper written by the man himself; but such a letter, which is evidence only against the man who wrote it, may prejudice the jury against the other defendants, who never wrote the letter, and had no concern in it. Notwithstanding this inconvenience which arises where there are several parties joined together, I think the balance of convenience, on the whole, is in favour of a joint proceeding as against a separate proceeding in such a case as the present. But, again I say, I invite your Lordships to decide this question, not upon the question of convenience, but upon the only question which, according to my mind, arises in the case. Aye or no, is this in accordance with the practice of the Scotch Court? And as we have a unanimous statement of the Scotch Court upon that point I would advise your Lordships to affirm that decision, unless you are satisfied that there has been some authority or proof adduced by the appellants that that decision is erroneous.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I have given careful attention to the very able arguments addressed to us, but they have failed to satisfy me that your Lordships would be well advised in disturbing the unanimous decision of the Scottish Judges.

The question is one of local procedure and practice, and most fit to be dealt with by the local tribunals. Many subjects of controversy have been discussed, but they have really resolved themselves into a single one, the competency of the several actions. We have been relieved, by the candid statement of the learned counsel, from the consideration of the sufficiency of the issues; and the suggestion of "acquiescence" and the objection as to "conjunction" has been urged only as affecting the argument on "competency." Indeed it could not have been otherwise judicially pressed, for the right of the Court to conjoin actions in proper circumstances has been established by ample authority, and its exercise being plainly within the discretion of the Judges your Lordships would scarcely have departed from the ground of your ruling in Wauchope v. The North British Railway Company, 4 Macq. 248, or interfered in any way with the decision they have pronounced. The reasoning of counsel on the point of "conjunction" does not appear to me to have aided them in their denial of "competency;" and as to this your Lordships would be slow, without coercive reason, to differ from the Judges in ascertaining the existence and effect of rules of procedure established by no written law, but originating in views of social convenience and the interests of suitors, with which their judicial experience must have made them especially conversant. I think, however, that on authority and principle the ruling of the Court below was perfectly right.

Cowan & Sons,
&c. v. Duke of
Buccleuch, &c.

Our duty is to discover as well as we can what has been the practice in Scotland with reference to the joinder of parties, and in this we have been assisted by many authorities, to which I shall not, after the ample analysis they have undergone, particularly refer. The result of them, to my mind, very clearly is, that at least as to pursuers, what was done in this case was fully warranted. Indeed it was not ultimately denied by the learned counsel that when a single act which affects several persons is the subject of complaint they may together sue the doer of it. In my opinion, this admission decides the case against the appellants. There is here in reality only one matter of complaint, namely, the pollution of the river. One remedy is obtained,—the issue of an interdict. To the single result which injures the pursuers the defendants are contributories in different degrees. But the aim of the proceeding is not to affect each of them apart from the others, but to prevent the one consequence of their combined action. Damages are not sought against them individually. The effort is to abate the mischief they have all wrongfully wrought. Thus regarded, on a fair consideration of the cases, and on the interpretation given to them on behalf of the appellant himself, the junction of the pursuers appears to me unimpeachable. They have a common interest in the stream—in its purity and its amenity. They suffer from a common grievance in its pollution. That grievance is created by the action of men engaged in the same trade using the same machinery and materials, which conduce to the same injurious results, and this the pursuers seek to obviate by a single judicial act equally restraining all who have produced it.

We have had many inapt illustrations and delusive analogies in the course of the argument, and I have been quite unable to appreciate the force of the distinction taken to-day between the case of persons sending pollution through the same pipe and of others sending it, with the same result, into the river. If there may be, as was conceded, joinder of the pursuers and defenders in the one case, I cannot imagine why they should not be joined in the other.

Then, as to the junction of defenders, much the same course of reasoning appears to me to apply. For this there is not, undoubtedly, the same clear authority as warrants the junction of pursuers, and in the absence of it the Judges rely on the want of any rule restraining them from the permission of a proceeding which they deem—and I conceive rightly—for general and individual interest alike, enabling all parties fully to secure their rights in the cheapest and most facile manner. If there be no authority in favour of that proceeding there is no authority against it. In several instances, as in the Breadalbane case¹ and Lord Forbes' case,² we find defenders joined without objection, and there may be many such cases of which we have no account. The very generality of a practice may prevent the record of its common application. And in such a state of things it is not too much to say that the judicial affirmation of its existence and its nature is entitled to the highest consideration.

I do not trouble your Lordships with observations on the expediency of the course of which the appellants complain; it has already been demonstrated by my noble and learned friends. The convenience of having all persons affected by a process of this kind at once before the Court seems very manifest, and the extreme difficulty of working out such a process, in the absence of the majority of them, with justice to all, is equally so. The cases might wear a different aspect if the pursuers sought damages instead of seeking declarator or interdict.

The argument ab inconvenienti, so strongly urged for the appellants, appears to me, as to the Lord Chancellor, to tell the other way. No doubt, if parties are numerous and issues complicated Judges may find their duties onerous, and juries may run the risk of applying for or against one party the evidence properly applicable to another. But these are inevitable incidents, affecting every day the most serious civil and criminal trials, and the evil must be mitigated as best it may by the guidance of the Judges and the intelligence of the jury. On the other hand, as I have said, it is surely for the advantage of the satisfactory administration of justice that those who complain of a common injury, and those who are charged with the commission of it, should all be enabled to assert themselves before the same tribunal, especially when that tribunal has ample power to prevent any individual wrong by the shaping of separate issues and the regulation of the course and conduct of the trial.

On the whole, I have no doubt that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am also of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. I apprehend that the important question is, what is the Scotch law and practice as to joining parties, either pursuers or defenders? And as to that I think this much has been shewn clearly enough in the course of the argument, that the law and practice of Scotland with reference to that matter is different from that of England. If I were called upon formally to deliver an opinion upon it I should be inclined to say that the Scotch practice was better. Certainly it is not at all inconsistent with natural justice; but at all events it is different, and it is by the Scotch law and practice, and not by the English, that this matter has to be decided.

Now, I find that the Lord Justice-Clerk, in delivering judgment upon the point of conjoining the three actions, states, and no doubt perfectly accurately, that from the earliest times in Scotland it has always been the course as much as possible to bring all actions that have any contingentia with one another together, and let them be tried together, and disposed of together. The consequence of such a conjunction must frequently be to unite pursuers, or to unite defenders, who, according to the English practice, would not be united as plaintiffs, and would not be united as defendants.

Then, my Lords, comes the question whether in this particular case it is competent, according to the Scotch law, to join together in one suit these different pursuers, they being several different heritors who have properties on different parts of the river Eak, and claiming a declarator that the river is to be kept clear of pollution, and asking for an interdict to be granted against the defenders, several paper-manufacturers on different parts of the river Eak, who do separately (for I quite agree that there is not the slightest evidence of their acting in concert) pour polluting materials into the river, so that the pursuers are, as they allege, injured by their acts in the process of that manufacture. Now, as to the joining of the different pursuers together, I agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, that the authority is very strong indeed, that where you have different pursuers with one interest as against one defender those several pursuers may unite their cases. No. 2.

Authorities have been produced of instances where several defenders were sued together. But those cases are not nearly so strong or so numerous as the cases of conjoint pursuers; and if I had been called upon before this case was decided to say whether such a rule of practice of Scotch law was made out I should have felt considerable hesitation about it. But when I look at the decision which was come to unanimously by the Court below in this case it is so perfectly consistent, in my mind, with justice, that I have no hesitation in saying that I should act upon it. Nov. 30, 1876.
Cowan & Sons,
&c. v. Duke of

I only wish, my Lords, clearly to guard against being supposed to say that I think that according to the Scotch law it can at all be said that any pursuers may join together. Still less can it be said that a pursuer may join any defenders together. I think what is laid down by the Court below furnishes a very good rule, at least so far as this case is concerned. It is necessary that the cause of action about which the pursuers complain should be, to some extent, a united one—it is necessary that there should be some contingentia. I will not now inquire how much contingentia there must be, but some there must be. In like manner, with defenders, it must be shewn that there is some contingentia in their acts. I think, when you come to look at it, you get the answer to the question what is the test, as far as this matter goes, very well indeed from what was said by the Lord Justice-Clerk, who said—"The object of this action is to protect the river Esk from pollution by the operations of the paper-makers upon the river. It appears to me that that simple statement of fact, and of the object of the action, at once suggests the extreme propriety and expediency of the proprietors who are injured being all here, on the one hand, and the paper-makers who are said to inflict injury being all here, on the other hand. No doubt, if there were any rule in our practice which rendered it incompetent for parties having all a common interest in a stream to pursue an action against parties who all contribute exactly in the same way to the pollution of the stream we must give effect to that rule of practice. But I know of no such rule." I may observe that some part of the argument at your Lordships' bar depended upon the word "exactly" in the sentence. The different paper-makers upon different parts of the river Esk who put refuse into it at places which are miles distant from one another may not, in one sense of the word, be said to be doing "exactly" the same thing, but in the ordinary use of the word it has that effect given to it, and that is the sense in which the Lord Justice-Clerk uses the term. He then proceeds to say—"And therefore I am bound to look upon this as a question depending upon general principles. I think the case will be most fully and fairly tried by having all the parties called who are interested on the one side or on the other."

Now, my Lords, I think, confining that test to the cases to which it properly applies, it enables us to say that the process of the Scotch Courts is perfectly just—that if two pursuers or two defenders are so to be united in one action they must have a contingentia uniting the two, connecting them with each other, and it must go so far as to shew that the whole case will be most fairly and properly tried, and justice will be best done—indeed that it cannot well be done otherwise—by all the parties being brought into the action. Applying that principle to the present case I do not think any one can dispute that the real question raised in it was, whether or no the proprietors of land along the banks of the Esk had a right to prevent the paper-makers from polluting the river, each paper-maker doing it separately at his own mill, but the general effect being to produce one nuisance to the heritors. I think no one can doubt, looking at the nature of the proceeding, that it was one in which justice as well as convenience made it in every way desirable that all the parties interested should be brought before the Court together, and their cases tried in one action. I do not think it necessary to inquire whether there are other cases in which it might be done, but it seems to me that here it was rightly done; and if it is once established that here it was competent to bring the first action, so it seems to me self-evident that the Court were quite right in conjoining the other actions with it. I do not think it necessary to say anything upon any other point.

LORD GORDON.—My Lords, in this case I happened to be counsel for the parties—first for one set of parties, the appellants, and afterwards for the other, the respondents. I do not know, therefore, that it would be expedient that I should take part in the expression of opinion in this case further than by saying that I concur in the views which have been expressed by your Lordships with reference to the import of the opinions of the Judges of the Court below, as to the procedure and practice which ought to regulate these matters. The question is one which depends peculiarly upon Scotch procedure and practice, and it has come before a tribunal composed chiefly of Judges from the other parts of the United Kingdom than Scotland. Due weight has been given to the opinions expressed in the Court below in this matter, which is a matter regulated by procedure and practice, and the result of the opinions expressed by your Lordships is clearly in accordance with the views which have been expressed by the Judges in the Court below. The Judges in the Court below were unanimous upon the point. No difference of opinion existed either on the part of the Lord Ordinary or on the part of the Judges of the Inner-House; and it certainly must be very gratifying to us in Scotland to find that, without expressing entire approval of the views which regulate the procedure and practice in these matters in Scotland, your Lordships are of opinion that there are great conveniences in following such procedure and practice.

I will only observe that in looking over the proceedings I do not find that it is alleged that any injustice has resulted from the combination of parties at the trial. On the contrary, I find that the appellants had recourse to two proceedings, which were open to them for impugning the verdict if they thought proper. The first was an exception to the law as laid down; that, however, was not insisted upon; they apparently departed from their right to proceed in that way, and it is not now before your Lordships. The other was an application for a new trial upon the ground of the verdict being contrary to the evidence, but with respect to that it appears that the order was discharged with the consent of the appellants themselves. I do not find, therefore, upon the papers before the House, any allegation that there was any injustice resulting from the adoption of the course which the Court followed in accordance with the practice which regulates them in these matters.

Mines and Minerals—Incidental Damage from Mineral Workings to adjoining property—Damnum absque injuria—B and C were lessees of the minerals under adjoining lands. A seam of coal, which was worked by both, cropped out to the surface within B's holding, and dipped towards C's holding. B worked out, in the usual course, the whole of the seam let to him, the result of which was that the surface in the neighbourhood of the outcrop, which was previously water-tight, sank into silt and cracked into fissures, through which the rainfall on that part of the surface flowed into the coal waste and thence down into C's workings. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) in an action at the instance of C against B, that B was under no obligation to preserve or restore the surface for the benefit of C, so as to prevent the rainfall from passing into the latter's workings.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, in this case the Lord Ordinary decided in favour of the defender, on the ground that the evidence did not shew that the defender had done anything wrong as against the pursuers. The Second Division of the Court of Session affirmed this judgment, Lord Gifford agreeing with the reason of the Lord Ordinary, but Lord Ormidale and the Lord Justice-Clerk intimating that they were disposed to hold, on the evidence, that the defender had so acted as to make himself liable for the damage sustained by the pursuers, had it not been for the pursuers' own acts, which their Lordships thought to have been of such a description as to bar and preclude their claim for reparation.

Your Lordships, on the 23d November, heard the counsel for the appellants, who argued the whole case fully and ably, maintaining, first, that the conduct of the defender was such as to make him liable to the pursuers for damage; and, second, that the ground on which Lord Ormidale and the Lord Justice-Clerk based their judgment could not be supported, as the pursuers had done nothing to preclude their claim to reparation.

Your Lordships have not thought it necessary to hear the counsel for the respondent, who might have furnished arguments to shew that this second point furnished a good defence. It would not, therefore, be proper to say more than that if it had been necessary to decide this point the counsel for the respondent would have been called upon to argue in support of the ground on which alone these two learned Judges below based their judgment.

But, my Lords, it is not necessary to decide anything on this point if your Lordships are satisfied that what is alleged and proved does not make the defender liable to the pursuers. And after hearing the able arguments of the counsel, and carefully considering the judgment of Lord Ormidale, I think that what is alleged and proved does not establish such a liability; and, I believe, all the noble and learned Lords who heard the case are of the same opinion.

I will now state the facts in the case, which are scarcely in dispute. The pursuers and defender are both lessees under the same landlord—Mr Houldsworth—of the minerals under two adjacent portions of the Coltness estate. The seam of coal called the Ell coal crops out to the surface in the defender's holding. It lies at a high inclination, dipping towards the pursuers' holding, and, where it enters it, is at a depth of many fathoms below the surface, so that any water which fell or percolated into the defender's holding would necessarily, by force of gravitation, descend to the pursuers' holding, unless stopped by the minerals or soil from doing so. The soil above this coal is stiff and impervious to water, so that whilst it was undisturbed the greater part of the rainfall flowed away over the surface, very little of it filtering down towards the seam, which was in consequence a very dry seam, the impervious strata above, whilst undisturbed, forming what may be called a roof practically water-tight over the coal. But the defender altered this state of things. He worked the Ell coal, carrying away the whole of it, and as a necessary result the surface sank. At the upper part, where the seam cropped out to the surface, the subsidence, over a space of about five acres, was so great that the surface sank into silt, and cracked into open fissures, through which the rainfall on these five acres flowed freely down into the defender's workings, and the coal in those workings having been removed, it flowed down towards the pursuers' holding. There is evidence that part of this water was removed before reaching the pursuers, but there seems no doubt that a considerable quantity of water, which whilst the roof remained in its original state—a water-tight roof—flowed away over the surface, did descend to the pursuers' mines, and put them to additional expense in pumping it out.

My Lords, the question in the case seems to me to be whether this was damnum absque injuria, which the pursuers must protect themselves from in such way as they can, or whether the defender when working the upper part of the mine was under any obligation to the pursuers, as owners of the mine on the dip, to preserve or to restore the impervious roof, which, whilst it existed, prevented a great part of the rainfall from descending.

I think it right to observe that it is not shewn that any water goes down these cracks except the natural rainfall on the surface. Your Lordships have not to consider what difference it might make if the bed of a natural stream had been tapped by the defender's operations, and you have no need to form or express any opinion on the points discussed in the recent cases of Smith v. Fletcher, L. R., 7 Exchequer, 305, and 9 Exchequer, 64; and Crompton v. Lea, L. R., 19 Equity, 115.

I may also observe that no point has been discussed at your Lordships' bar as to any difference in favour of the defender in consequence of his holding under the same landlord as the pursuers and by lease prior in point of time to the pursuers'. The case has been argued, and I propose to consider it, as if the pursuers held under a different landlord, or were themselves the owners both of the soil and the minerals towards the dip. And, in this view, the question seems to be, whether there is any servitude on the owner of the upper mines, for the benefit of the owner of the mines on the dip, to preserve either the surface or the adjacent minerals as water-tight as the undisturbed state of the strata?

My Lords, no authority has been cited either in a Scotch or English Court in favour of the doctrine that there is such a servitude.

The general rule of law in both countries is that the owner of one piece of land has a right to use it in the natural course of use, unless in so doing he interferes with some right created either by law or contract; and as a branch of that law, the owner of the minerals has a right to take away the whole of the minerals in his land, for such is the natural course of user of minerals, and that a servitude to prevent such a user must be founded on something more than mere neighbourhood. In Rylands v. Fletcher (L. R., 3 E. and I. Appeals, 338) in this House, the present Lord Chancellor said that the occupiers of a close "might lawfully have used that close for any purpose for which it might in the ordinary course of the enjoyment of land be used; and if in what I may term the natural user of that land there had been any accumulation of water either on the surface or underground, and if by the operation of the laws of nature that accumulation of water had passed off into the close occupied by the plaintiff, the plaintiff could not have complained that that result had taken place. If he had desired to guard himself against it, it would have lain upon him to have done so by leaving or by interposing some barrier between his close and the close of the defendants in order to have prevented that operation of the laws of nature. As an illustration of that principle I may refer to a case which was cited in the argument before your Lordships, the case of *Smith v. Kenrick*¹ in the Court of Common Pleas."

Wilsons v.
Waddell.

I think it unnecessary to cite other authorities, as *Rylands v. Fletcher*² is not only one of the most recent, but is also in this House. And I do not understand Lord Ormisdale to express any dissent from this doctrine, but to proceed on a ground which I will mention presently. I may observe, however, that I cannot see any principle on which an obligation for the benefit of the owners of the coal on the dip to restore the surface to its natural state of water-tightness can be founded which would not equally give rise to an obligation to make the underground workings as water-tight as they were before the coal was removed; nor can I see any distinction between the rainwater falling on the surface and that which filtered down into the coal-seams. Lord Ormisdale, however, does make a distinction. He says—"The water was not the natural product of, and did not arise in, the defender's mine, but was foreign water, so to speak, introduced into his mine from the surface through operations of the defender carried on in an unusual, unreasonable, and improper manner."

My Lords, the evidence was that the coal at the upper part of the seam could not in any way be removed without breaking the surface in the way in which it was broken, and that this was the usual and proper course of working such coal. But there was some evidence which led Lord Ormisdale to the conclusion that, though the defender was perfectly justified in causing the holes and sifs, "yet in not filling up or securing the sifs or holes his operations were not usual, reasonable, or proper." There is no doubt that if a duty was cast on the defender to fill up or secure these holes or sifs he has neglected it.

My Lords, I do not stop to inquire how far the practice of miners could cast an obligation on the owner of the upper mine, which would not otherwise exist; but it is unnecessary to determine anything on this point, as I think your Lordships will agree with me in thinking that the evidence goes no further than to shew that generally the owner of the surface made it matter of bargain, for the benefit of the surface, that when mines are worked out the surface should be restored. Where such a stipulation exists the owner or occupier of the surface has a right to complain if it be not restored, but that gives no claim to anyone else. And, in the present case, the owner of the surface preferred that it should remain unrestored.

My Lords, for these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment complained of should be affirmed, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, at the close of the argument of the appellants in this case your Lordships intimated that you would consider whether you would desire to hear the respondents. The result of that consideration has been that there is no doubt in the mind of any of your Lordships as to the course which should be taken with regard to this appeal. I have had the advantage of considering the observations which have just been made by my noble and learned friend, and I have only to say that I entirely agree in the course which he has proposed.

Afterwards on revival he added a distinct averment of promise subsequente copula. In the course of the action an interlocutor was pronounced allowing him an opportunity of proving the alleged copula, but he adduced no evidence. In 1846 decree of absolvitor was pronounced. In 1875 A raised an action of reduction of the decree of absolvitor on the ground of perjury and subornation of perjury, and of declarator of marriage, founding specially on promise subsequente copula. (In the Court of Session, June 28, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 882.)

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I think that none of your Lordships can view this case, brought forward as it is at this time, and under the circumstances under which it is brought forward, otherwise than with feelings of considerable pain. Upwards of thirty years ago proceedings were taken in the Court of Session in an action of declarator that a certain marriage had taken place between the present appellant and a lady who is now dead. Those proceedings went through various stages, and resulted in a decree against the appellant, in substance determining that the marriage upon which he founded his case had not taken place.¹

I must call your Lordships' attention to the particular mode in which it was sought to establish that marriage. The action did not allege a regular, but an irregular marriage. In the summons certain written documents were alleged to have passed between the appellant and the lady in question, and to have established a contract of marriage; and then the summons averred "that the said acknowledgments were interchanged with the solemn and serious intention of constituting marriage, and marriage was thereby fully constituted between the parties; that the parties when they thus made their mutual declarations of the said marriage, kissed the Bible in testimony of their understanding of the seriousness of the declaration, and their mutual resolution to adhere to it; that the marriage was thus duly completed, and the parties afterwards considered themselves as married, and conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife, although, for the reasons before mentioned, they did not wish to make it public, till the consent and approbation of the other curators, and certain other parties, was obtained to the marriage; that the parties were much together, and when absent kept up a constant and affectionate correspondence, the whole of which was written in a style and manner that could not have been written by a lady to a gentleman in any other character than that of an affectionate wife to an affectionate husband, or an affectionate husband to an affectionate wife." And then, further, the summons alleges,—“That the affectionate intercourse subsisted between the said parties till a comparatively recent period; that notwithstanding what is above set forth the said defender, owing to the arts and importunities of her friends, has recently become estranged from the pursuer, and casting off the fear of God, and forgetting her solemn vows and matrimonial engagements, does now most wrongfully and unjustly refuse to adhere to the pursuer as her husband, and treat, cherish, and entertain him as such at bed and board, and to adhere to and cohabit with the pursuer, and to perform the other duties incumbent on her as his lawful wife.”

Now, your Lordships are well aware that with regard to irregular marriages in Scotland, by the law of that country they may be established either as marriages per verba de presenti, or as marriages by promise subsequente copula. The allegations to which I have referred in the summons in the former action went clearly and distinctly to a marriage per verba de presenti, but the summons also averred a promise of marriage between the parties, and it contained further averments which in some respect were ambiguous, and might be considered as merely confined to a contract per verba de presenti, or as going beyond it.

But, my Lords, the summons being in this form, and I will assume here that the statement at the bar is correct, that as the law then stood it would be necessary to have the whole foundation of the action stated correctly in the summons, and that that foundation could not be enlarged by subsequent pleadings between the parties,—the summons being in the form to which I have referred, it was met in the first instance by a defence on the part of the lady in which, adverting to those allegations in the summons which I have read, she said,—“It is denied that the marriage was thus duly completed, and that the parties afterwards considered themselves as married, and conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife. What the specific acts may be to which the pursuer means to refer as supporting these averments the defender is at present at a loss to conceive, and she can therefore only meet them with a denial as general as the assertions themselves, which are altogether unfounded.” That is to say, the lady replied to this summons by saying—“You allege that we conducted ourselves towards each other as husband and wife. That is a general allegation which may comprehend in it every kind of conduct which can take place between husband and wife ; I desire to know what are the particulars to which you refer ; at present I can only deny generally what you allege generally, and in that form I do deny what you allege."—Being thus challenged a revised condescendence was submitted on the part of the appellant, in which he addressed himself to this particular matter, and having again repeated the promise of marriage which he alleged had passed between the parties, he averred further, in the most positive and distinct way, that the marriage was duly consummated, that sexual intercourse took place, and in his revised condescendence he stated particularly the dates and times when this intercourse, as he alleged, took place. To that revised condescendence there was a pleading on the part of the lady, both by way of answer to the different allegations in the revised condescendence, and by way of statement of facts on her own part, in which she, in the most positive and distinct manner, denied every one of those allegations with regard to sexual intercourse.

My Lords, in that state of things, there having been a summons which, although ambiguous, was in my opinion large enough to have covered and included in it the allegation of cohabitation and consummation of marriage, and the appellant being challenged to condescend more precisely upon the particulars of his general allegation, and having condescended by alleging the consummation of the marriage, and that having been denied, it appears to me it cannot admit of doubt that if the appellant had been so minded, and had been able to do it, he might have entered upon proof to establish that cohabitation which he thus alleged. My Lords, he did not do so ; he adduced no proof whatever upon the subject. Evidence was led, perhaps unnecessarily, on the part of the defender, but upon the part of the appellant no evidence whatever was produced, and as the case proceeded, feeling the weakness of this part of his case, he by his counsel at the bar did not insist upon this part of the case, which would seek to establish a marriage by a promise subsequente copula.

The Court of Session upon the other part of the case, that is to say, upon the allegation of a marriage per verba de presenti, held, that that which passed between the parties, had not passed with any serious intention of creating the relation of husband and wife between them. With the correctness of that decision your Lordships are not at present concerned, but that was the decision both of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court of Session. An appeal was brought against the decision to your Lordships' House, but that appeal was dismissed, it not having been brought on for argument in the proper time.

That being the state of the occurrences at the time I have mentioned, upwards of thirty years ago, the present action was raised in 1875 for the purpose of reducing the decrees in that former action. The appellant now contends, in the first place, that although there was in the former action an allegation of marriage, still no proof having been led upon the allegation in the condescendence of consummation, and it not being, as was alleged at the bar, distinctly averred in the summons that a marriage was completed by consummation following upon a promise, the plea of res judicata is not a valid plea to be set up to prevent the attempt now to assert a marriage by promise subsequente copula. And then it is said further that matters have now come to the knowledge of the present appellant which entitles him to reduce the former proceedings, and to get rid of the effect of the plea of res judicata.

My Lords, as to the first of those grounds I have almost anticipated what I have to say. It appears to me that in the former proceedings, the summons being such as I have mentioned, the condescendence following upon that summons being of the kind it was, if the present appellant had had it in his power to adduce evidence of the consummation of the marriage following upon a promise, he would have been entitled to do so; and if having adduced that evidence, the Court had been of opinion that he had proved his case, and had thereupon pronounced decree of declarator establishing the marriage, that would have been an establishment of the marriage which would have been binding upon both parties, and which could not afterwards have been disturbed by reason of any insufficiency in the pleadings. It might well be that if in the course of the proceedings any want of preciseness in the averments had been noticed steps might have been taken to cure or supplement that want of precision, but I cannot think that there was any such insufficiency in the summons, followed as it was by the condescendence in the shape in which we find it, as should entitle the complainer in that action afterwards to say that he had not the power of raising the whole of the case in regard to this marriage, if he had had evidence to prove it.

I doubt very much whether it is at all necessary in the present case to lay down any abstract rule as to the extent to which a sentence in a declarator of marriage is binding as against any subsequent attempt that might be made to establish the marriage upon any new or different footing. I think it is quite sufficient in the present case to say that no man who shews that at the time of his first action to obtain a declarator of marriage he had in his knowledge the whole of the facts by which he might have raised the case, whether of contract per verba de presenti, or of promise subsequente copula, and who had the power to raise them, who puts upon his record statements which prove that he had the whole of this knowledge in his possession, can be heard, because he does not attempt to prove one part of the case, to say, after the lapse of thirty years, that he is entitled to commence a new litigation, to raise again a portion of the case which, if it had any foundation, was perfectly well known to him at the time of his first proceedings.

But, now, I turn to a consideration of what are the new facts which, the appellant says, have come to his knowledge since the former action, and upon which he now claims to reopen this question. The averments, the relevancy of which is now in question, are extremely vague throughout the whole course of them; but, as I understand them, they amount simply to statements in which, referring to witness after witness who was examined on the former occasion, not by himself (for, as I have pointed out, he led no evidence), but on the part of the lady, he asserts now as to all of those witnesses that they committed perjury; and then, further, with regard to the greater portion of them, he states that they committed perjury either with the connivance or at the instigation of the lady, that is to say, that she was guilty of subornation of perjury; and upon those conjoint allegations of perjury on the part of the witnesses and of subornation on the part of the lady he seeks to have the case retried.

Now, my Lords, I must say that I think the observations of Lord Gifford in the Court of Session are perfectly well founded, that in every case where witnesses are called before a tribunal which is to judge of the facts spoken to by those witnesses, it is for that tribunal to say whether it believes or disbelieves them; if it believes the witnesses it is not for the defeated party afterwards to say,—I assert that those witnesses spoke what was not true, and upon my allegation that they spoke what was not true I ask, as a matter of right, that there should be a new trial before another tribunal so that I may take my chance of what that other tribunal may determine on the facts which may be deposed to by the witnesses. My Lords, there would be no end to litigation if that were held to be a sufficient ground and a relevant ground on which to ask for the reduction of a former decree.

But, my Lords, in this case the matter does not rest there. These witnesses gave their evidence thirty years ago, and spoke to facts as to the truth or falsehood of which the present appellant was a perfectly competent judge, for they were facts which, in one way or the other, were perfectly within his knowledge. He had the full means of judging as to whether the allegations of the witnesses were true or untrue,—he admits that he had that full opportunity of judging,—he does not say he thought their statements were true then, and he has discovered them to be untrue now, but his case is that he knew at the time that the witnesses were saying what was untrue, and that that has been his opinion from that day to the present time. But what has he been doing these thirty years if those witnesses spoke what was untrue? Has he taken any means for bringing the criminal law of the country to bear upon them, and to have it decided by process of the criminal law whether those witnesses were or were not guilty of that perjury of which he says they were guilty? He has taken no step whatever. Let it be granted that he could not in Scotland, as perhaps he could in this country, have moved to bring the criminal law to bear upon them, has he applied to the proper officer, the public prosecutor, in Scotland, to have these persons subjected to the penalties of the criminal law? He has done nothing of the kind; he has rested for thirty years; and he now makes allegations as to the perjury of these witnesses which he was just as competent to have made immediately the former trial terminated. He throws in the additional allegation of subornation of perjury on the part of Miss Sinclair. He says that that lady was either privy to this perjury or was herself one of the persons moving to have it committed; but he says that after the lapse of thirty years, when this lady is in her grave; and I think your Lordships will not consider that the vague and hardly intelligible allegation which is contained in the condescendence to the effect that the lady moved towards having perjury committed can be sufficient to place the case higher than if it stood simply upon the allegation of perjury committed by the witnesses.

My Lords, I therefore submit to your Lordships that the present proceedings instituted by the appellant are met and rightly met by the plea of res judicata in the former action. He has not alleged any new matter whatever coming to his knowledge which should entitle him to get rid of those former proceedings.

My Lords, agreeing entirely with the Lord Ordinary and all the Judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session, I think that the case of the appellant has entirely failed, and I move your Lordships that the present appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I come entirely to the same conclusion, and I think it is impossible for any of your Lordships, notwithstanding the able argument which we have heard, to have the least doubt that the Court below have come to a correct conclusion.

The appellant at the time when he took the original proceedings had a full and complete knowledge of all the facts in the case as far as he alleges them.

As to that important fact which he says now was not adequately raised on the former occasion and which he wishes now to substantiate, namely, the subsequens copula, of course if that were true he had not only a full knowledge in his own breast of the truth of that fact, but he had at that time every interest which a man could have to establish it fully and completely, and if testimony was given which rebutted any such fact as alleged by him he was in a position at that time, and in a much better position than he could be now under any ordinary circumstances, to procure that evidence which would be necessary to establish the fact.

No. 4.

Lockyer v.
Ferryman, &c.

But the case does not stand there. Singularly enough not only did he decline to enter into that proof, not only did he then decline by his counsel at the ultimate hearing in the Inner-House to rest upon that part of his case, but I look in vain throughout the whole of these proceedings for any attempt on his part, during the whole of the thirty years that have elapsed since the former proceedings to make out a case such as he ought to have made out to justify him in attempting the reduction of the former decree, and to enable him to get rid of the effect of the plea of res judicata, such a case as he ought to have taken care to enter upon immediately and with all possible speed. The case is very singular in that respect, because we find first the averment which has been read by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, the averment in the original summons, of the interchange of certain documents which the Court at that time held not to constitute a contract de presenti, and then you have it averred that upon the interchange of those documents "the parties considered themselves as married, and conducted themselves towards each other as husband and wife, although for the reasons before mentioned they did not wish to make it public till the consent and approbation of the other curators, and certain other parties, was obtained to the marriage;" and then you find, lest that averment should be considered dubious in its construction (and perhaps it might justly be said that it is so), it was made clear by what subsequently appears upon the record. The lady then in answer stated that she denied this conduct towards each other as husband and wife as far as she could understand what was averred, but that owing to the vagueness of the statement (I am giving the effect of what she said) she could not answer more positively; and thereupon that vague statement was made clear and precise by a subsequent passage in the revised condescendence (article 16) in which the appellant avers in the plainest terms the intercourse which was necessary to complete and establish the marriage. That having been averred in the revised condescendence, such intercourse is positively denied by the lady. She leads evidence, while he leads none; and this fact, which, if true, must have been within his own knowledge, which he had the greatest interest in establishing, and which it was important for him at the time to prepare himself with evidence to establish, he left wholly unconfirmed by evidence. The lady's evidence disproved it, and he waived it at the hearing, as the Judges say, although the counsel for the appellant says that that statement may be taken to mean no more than that the counsel representing the pursuer was aware that there was a difficulty in proving it upon a record so shaped. One cannot, reading the narrative of the Judges in their judgments, take that view of the waiver by counsel; but at the same time even if it were so, it would make a very slight difference with reference to the position of the present appellant, because the observation still remains that he did not attempt at that time, when all the evidence was fresh, to establish that important fact, a fact as to which he must

No. 4. have known that the witnesses had been perjuring themselves in denying it if the fact were true.

Mar. 6, 1877.

Lockyer v.

Ferryman, &c.

But what do we find when he takes these present proceedings? We find a state of things wholly inconsistent with any such allegation as was made in the former proceedings, of subsequent intercourse and of a course of concealment having been followed owing to the position in which the present appellant stood to his father. When we come to the condescendence we find a most minute account of a most important proceeding on the part of the gentleman and his alleged wife; we have an account of their going on a marriage trip, and a phaeton being fetched by a man whose name is given, and who is now said to be dead. The appellant says,—“Desiring privacy it was arranged that neither carriage nor servant should be taken from Freswick House. Before starting, Maria Sinclair and the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer called in their neighbour and friend, the late Mrs Burns, wife of the Reverend David Burns, Thurso, and told her that the pursuer and the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer had taken each other as husband and wife, and that their marriage had been completed. The place fixed on for their destination was Dunbeath, thirty miles or thereabouts from Thurso, where Dunbeath Castle is situated, then the property of the said William Sinclair. Accordingly on the said 29th August, the said James Olson was sent to Mr William Tod, saddler and post-horse hirer, Thurso, to get him to send a phaeton on the following morning to Freswick House to carry the pursuer and the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer together to Dunbeath. The phaeton could not, however, be had on that day, and was ordered for the next morning early. The said phaeton, however, was not sent at the time expected, and in consequence the said Maria Sinclair caused the said James Olson to go back to Mr Tod's premises and have the phaeton sent at once. The said James Olson went as requested, and presently returned bringing the phaeton with him. When the said phaeton was brought the said pursuer and the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer were dressed in readiness to leave Freswick House. The pursuer and the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer then left together in the phaeton, the pursuer driving. The said Maria Sinclair and the said Mrs Burns saw them away and bade them good-bye; and slippers were thrown at them from Freswick House in accordance with an old fashion. Their intended trip had become known in the place, and their departure from Thurso as married persons was witnessed by crowds throughout the town.” They desire great secrecy, and yet they send this man to get a phaeton, and they drive away in that phaeton in the midst of a crowd of people, and slippers are thrown at them.

My Lords, all this he knew just as well in 1839 as he knew it in 1875 when he revived these proceedings. He knew it from 1839 to 1845 whilst these proceedings were pending and before judgment was pronounced. All these facts were perfectly well known to him, and yet we do not find a single witness produced by him to prove them at that time when everything was fresh in everybody's memory. He waits till Olson is dead—he waits till everybody is dead (except the aunt Maria) who knew anything concerning this transaction, and you now have an application made after thirty years' interval to have the interlocutor reduced on the ground that it was obtained, in the first place, by perjury committed by the witnesses, and, in the second place, by subornation of perjury on the part of this lady, who has now been some time in her grave. As to any averment in this present action of the knowledge of this lady of the subornation of her witnesses to perjure themselves the only statement is this,—that the lady on her deathbed is said to have made certain statements, which, of course, the appellant could not have any personal knowledge of, he not having been present when those statements were said to have been made, and which he cannot know except through the narration of other witnesses. Therefore it comes to this—if an application of this description was to be acceded to, a case might be tried in which a result might be arrived at unfavourable to one of the parties on the testimony of witnesses called on each side in the presence of all the parties, there being all the means of producing evidence that there would be at any subsequent time, and then at the end of thirty or forty or even I might say fifty years, a Court of justice might be asked, on the ground of some deathbed statement or some hearsay statement made by some person who had heard another person say that there had been subornation of perjury or that there had been perjury, without the slightest explanation of no single step being taken or the slightest exertion being made during the whole period of thirty or forty or fifty years on the part of the person making the application, and after the death of all those persons who gave testimony at the time when the facts of the case were established, the Court, I say, might be asked to reopen the case in order that the person who had thus originally had a full and fair opportunity of having his case tried and who had so failed, might say, after that lapse of thirty or forty or fifty years, “I have discovered since the time when the case was originally tried that some false testimony was given,—I assert that some statements have been made to me which can only be proved by the oaths of the persons making those statements,—I know nothing more of the transaction,—statements made to me after this long interval of time by which I shall be able to establish a connection between my opponent, by whom I was defeated, and some of the witnesses, by which they were induced to yield to the pressure of my opponent and swear falsely.”

It has been well established, and one is thankful that it is so well established, that there is nothing that can protect the perpetration of a fraud. The perpetration of a fraud in the obtaining of a judgment or in the obtaining of a private Act of Parliament, or in any transaction in which solemn instruments are obtained or solemn acts are done, will vitiate the whole proceedings, where it is alleged by one of the parties that the transaction was a farce, that it was not a bona fide transaction but a fraudulent one, no time probably would be held to be too late to open up such a transaction where it could be made out clearly and distinctly that the circumstances connected with that fraud had recently come to the knowledge of the party. But I apprehend that in that as in every other case the necessity of the rule as to noviter inventa applies, and a solemn decision come to after the case has been heard in the presence of all the parties, and after the testimony of the witnesses has been given, cannot be reopened unless it shall, to the satisfaction of those who are applied to to reopen the case so long ago decided, be made out that there is reasonable ground for believing that if the case were reopened facts could be established which could not have been established by any reasonable diligence by the party making the application before the time of his making such application.

My Lords, character, fortune, and all that is dear to a man, may be put in jeopardy if after such a long interval it be permitted for any pursuer to come, without any reasonable ground whatever being alleged, and ask to deal with a res judicata, after the deliberate settlement of it upon a fair hearing to which he was a party, and at which hearing he might, had he been so minded, have done all that he says now he is able to achieve, namely, the obtaining of certain statements from certain individuals as to what they might be able to depose, and had he had any reasonable ground for supposing that they could depose to those statements he might have had them examined and cross-examined in the presence of the witnesses who had deposed to the contrary, and brought the matter at that time to a fair issue, which at this distance of time can scarcely be supposed to be possible to be done.

I do not apprehend that in this particular case with which we have to deal we need go further than to say that this appellant, who had the opportunity of having the case fairly heard, who upon the very facts of the case itself, if his case be true, was acquainted with the truth of that case, who if his case be true knew perfectly to whom he had to apply to to get information from to contradict those witnesses who denied its truth, who averred a certain most important fact at the time, and whose counsel were obliged to waive any attempt to establish that fact, which was all-important to his case, and which he failed to establish, who has stood by from that time to this, cannot now, after the death of the person principally concerned, be in a position to ask at your Lordships' hands that the principle of res judicata should not be pressed to its fullest and furthest results. Therefore, my Lords, I am opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friends who have addressed your Lordships, and upon the first branch of the case I do not think it necessary to add anything to what they have said. On the second, I have but a few words to add. This is not an action to which the law of prescription applies. When there is res judicata the original cause of action is gone, and can only be restored by getting rid of the res judicata. There is no law of Scotland (nor I should hope of any other country) which gives forty years or any other specified period for this purpose; and it would be most unreasonable and destructive of all certainty in the administration of the law, in the status of families, and in the enjoyment of rights of any description, if it were not held incumbent on any one attempting to get rid of a solemn judgment of a competent Court on such grounds as are here alleged, to shew that he comes forward to do so with reasonable promptitude and diligence, instead of deliberately allowing such a time to elapse as must make it unjust to reopen the question, because any satisfactory investigation of it would be now impossible. In every such case the nature of the allegations, the presence or absence of such a specification of particulars as may enable a Court to judge of their value, the time at which and the circumstances under which they are brought forward, are, and necessarily must be, material upon the question of relevancy. Here, as to the greater part of the allegations, no excuse whatever is offered for the delay in bringing them forward; others are discredited by the appellant's own statement that the persons on whose assertions he relies were not willing to speak what they now allege to be truth, while those were living who could contradict them; and the rest are too vague and indefinite to be accepted as constituting grounds prima facie sufficient, at this distance of time, to set aside the judgments of 1843 and 1846.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I entirely agree in the opinions expressed by the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me. I take it that when a competent tribunal having had a case before them have given a final judgment upon it, it is res judicata, and there must be strong grounds to set it aside. After the verdict of a jury, or the finding of a Judge, there may be an application for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or that the parties were taken by surprise, or that there was false evidence given, but I apprehend that it never is enough simply that the party against whom judgment has been given should say, he is dissatisfied with the verdict, and that the witnesses have stated that which is false. I do not think that would be held to be sufficient even in moving for a new trial at the proper time to do it—it is necessary that enough should be shewn to make the tribunal which is to consider whether there should be a new trial think that the trial was unsatisfactory. In the present case, I think that if every averment now upon the record had been made by the pursuer on an application for a new trial at the time of the reclaiming note in 1845, the proper judgment of the Court on the application then brought before them would be, this is not a case in which we need call upon the other side for an answer.

The application is made on the broad assertion that every one of the witnesses called was perjured, on broad assertions that Miss Sinclair must have known that they were perjured, and further assertions, without proof, that Miss Sinclair must have given them money or induced them to commit perjury. All these are mere assertions without the slightest ground given to shew that they were reasonable or such as to justify a tribunal in granting a new trial in respect of them, if asked to do so. There is more than that however. The allegation in the original condescendence specifically stated that there had been sexual intercourse at particular times and places there mentioned. Mr Lockyer must have known then as well as Miss Sinclair how many times, in how many places, and at what times it took place. He now, in his new condescendence, starts statements that there was sexual intercourse at times and places which he did not mention then.

The noble Lord opposite (Lord Hatherley) read one passage in the new condescendence in which it is stated that they went to Dunbeath under circumstances which are singularly alleged as being arranged for the purpose of securing privacy, for certainly if the object had been to make the thing as public as possible means could hardly have been better devised for that purpose; but the appellant asserts that all this took place then, and that sexual intercourse took place at Dunbeath, and he asserts that the witnesses who could have proved all that are some of them dead, some of them having been, as he suggests, kept out of the way at the time. But it is a singular thing to be remembered that though he must have known that at the time of his former condescendence there is not a word alleged in that former condescendence about any living together at Dunbeath or having intercourse there, and had he come to the Court for a new trial in 1846 and said, "I want a new trial because though I alleged everything that happened on a particular day at Thurso House (which, I take it, is the same place as that called Freswick House in the present record) I now want a new trial, because I was taken by surprise and deprived of my power of proving that a vast deal happened at Dunbeath which I then perfectly well knew," the Court would not have listened to for a moment.

Then there are other things alleged. We have it alleged that in 1840, just before the appellant and Miss Sinclair separated, he brought a Lieutenant Medley over to Freswick House that he might be a witness that they were liv-

No. 4. ing together as man and wife. In the former condescendence he never asserted anything about their living as man and wife in 1840 at Freswick House. He now asserts as a ground for a new trial that when Lieutenant Medley came over for that purpose Lieutenant Medley became aware that they were living as husband and wife, which the counsel at the bar has explained to mean that he looked through a crack in the door. Is it for a moment to be supposed that not having stated that at the time he prepared his original condescendence, but having brought it out as an afterthought, he could with any chance of success have applied for a new trial, supposing the application was made immediately after the case had been tried? I apprehend the answer would have been, if a man is taken by surprise the Court will grant a new trial, but you tell us nothing which you did not know at the time,—why did not you put that forward about Lieutenant Medley, whom you brought forward on purpose to be a witness, why did not you put that in your condescendence and let issue be joined upon it?

Lockyer v.
Ferryman, &c.

It is somewhat late in the day for the appellant to say that he was taken by surprise, because I find that it is most pointedly and indignantly denied that there was any sexual intercourse at all. I find the lady persisting in her denial; that is all the surprise he gets. He did not bring forward any evidence, and he could not have asked for a new trial. Every other averment is of the vaguest and loosest description—statements of deathbed confessions and so on,—none of them coming to more than this: Somebody has told me that somebody said that Miss Sinclair expressed repentance on her deathbed; somebody has told me that somebody said that James Olson also expressed repentance. Those are not matters which, if they had happened, would be for a moment listened to. He also says that there were witnesses kept back by terror. Why the Sinclairs should produce such an extraordinary terrorism in the neighbourhood I do not know. He says,—There were witnesses who were kept back by terror of Sir John Sinclair and Miss Sinclair, who prevented them coming during their lives, who are now willing to come forward, but I cannot tell you their names. If it were a matter in which he was moving for a new trial he would not be listened to in making such averments.

That being so, if nothing is put forward which would be a ground for a new trial, or even for granting what in England is called a rule nisi to shew cause why there should not be a new trial (I suppose in Scotland there is something similar to it), nothing that would require the Court to call on the other side for an answer, can it be said that now after a lapse of thirty years a party in the position of this appellant is entitled to demand further proof?

I think Mr Smith put it very well at your Lordship's bar in this way—"I do not say that what I put forward proves that I am entitled to set aside the judgment; but what I say is enough to give me the right to go to proof and to go to trial." That was the argument used, but I cannot agree that after res judicata, after judgment has been obtained, it is enough to aver that the thing was wrong.

The object of the rule of res judicata is always put upon two grounds, the one public policy, that it is the interest of the State that there should be an end of litigation, and the other, the hardship on the individual, it being a hardship that a man should be vexed twice for the same cause. It seems to me that both these grounds equally apply to sending down a case like this for fresh proof. Supposing Miss Sinclair were still alive it would be quite as vexatious to her to have this case tried over again in the shape of going to proof, to see whether the pursuer could prove all these things as it would be to enter into the question de novo. No. 4.

Lockyer v.
Ferryman, &c.

I will not say that there never might be a case in which after thirty years, from the death of the parties, the allegation might be such that it might be proper to say, go and prove it, without requiring more. I am not quite able to shape such a case, though I will not take upon myself to say there never could be such a case; but I think your Lordships will agree with me in the opinion that when after this lapse of time a person makes an application to set aside a judgment which was obtained thirty years ago, he ought to put before the tribunal to whom he makes that application at least as much as would have made a proper case for the granting of a new trial before judgment was pronounced. I think it would be safe to say that much, and, in my opinion, that is enough to decide the present case, for, as I have already said, it seems to me that nothing is here alleged that would have been ground for a new trial before judgment was pronounced, and a multo fortiori there is nothing alleged that would be ground for a new trial after judgment pronounced thirty years ago.

Compensation—Bankruptcy—Bill of Exchange.—Where certain bills were discounted by A, an indorsee, for value, and subsequently retired by him at maturity after the bankruptcy of the acceptor, partly with funds supplied by C, a person who had guaranteed B, a prior indorser, against loss upon the bills, held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that A, the holder of the bills, was entitled to plead compensation upon them against a debt due by him to the bankrupt, and that the special objections (1) that A, the holder, was not the holder at the date of sequestration, nor the drawer, but only an intermediate indorsee, and (2) that the plea of compensation was really stated for behoof of C, the guarantor, who had no debt to compensate, had been rightly repelled.

Observed by Lord Blackburn,—"It has for many years been decided, both in England and in Scotland, that if the indorser became a party to the bill before the bankruptcy in the one country or the sequestration in the other he may set it off on becoming holder afterwards."

Observed by Lord Blackburn,—"There is neither authority nor principle for saying that the estate of the bankrupt acceptor of a bill has a right to require the holder of the bill to have recourse to any prior indorser before availing himself of his right to protect himself by compensation and retention in Scotland, or under the mutual credit clauses in England."

This action was raised by the trustee on the bankrupt estates of Hannay and Sons, ironmasters, Glasgow, which were sequestrated on 28th March 1874, against Armstrong Brothers and Company, ironmerchants, Glasgow, the partners of which were W. J. Armstrong and T. N. Armstrong.

v. Armstrong

The pursuer claimed payment of a balance of £9000.

The defenders pleaded compensation in respect of bills for £13,000 accepted by Hannay and Sons, of which the defenders were the onerous indorsees and holders.

On 26th June 1872 Armstrong, Müller, and Company sold to Hannay and Sons 6000 tons of pig iron at £4, 12s. per ton.

On the same day Armstrong, Müller, and Company entered into negotiations with Thomas Vaughan and Company, which some weeks after resulted in an agreement by the former to purchase from the latter 6000 tons of pig iron at £4, 5s. per ton. The agreement was antedated 26th June 1872, and set forth the terms of payment to be "nett cash on last cash-day of the month for quantity delivered during previous month, or by Messrs Hannay and Sons' acceptance (payable London) at four months' date."

Some difference of opinion having arisen when the first payment of price became due as to the meaning of this last stipulation, and Thomas Vaughan and Company declining to draw upon Hannay and Sons direct, it was agreed that Armstrong, Müller, and Company should draw upon Hannay and Sons, and either hand over the bills indorsed to Thomas Vaughan and Company or discount them, Thomas Vaughan and Company giving them this letter of indemnity:—"October 23, 1873—In consideration of your having to-day agreed to draw upon Hannay and Sons for all pig iron delivered and to be delivered under our contract of June 26, 1872, with you, and hand such drafts over to us when accepted, we hereby agree to indemnify you from any loss in respect of such drafts handed over by us or discounted by you."

The firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company was dissolved on 31st December 1873, and the firm of Armstrong Brothers and Company was formed on 1st January 1874, and thereafter carried on the business formerly carried on by Armstrong, Müller, and Company. The two firms were composed of different partners, although Mr W. T. Armstrong was a partner in both; Mr T. N. Armstrong was only a partner in Armstrong Brothers.

Seven bills drawn by Armstrong, Müller, and Company were accepted by Hannay and Sons for the price payable by them. These bills were indorsed for value by Armstrong, Müller, and Company to Armstrong Brothers.

Armstrong Brothers subsequently discounted the bills with the Clydesdale Bank. On 28th March 1874, before the bills came to maturity, Hannay and Sons were sequestrated.

The seven bills for £13,057, 10s. 4d. were subsequently retired at maturity by Armstrong Brothers. Two of these bills (amounting to £4339) were retired on 1st April 1874. Vaughan and Company advanced £4207, 10s. on 3d April 1874, and £4207, 10s. on 3d June 1874, to Armstrong Brothers to enable them to retire the bills.

The nature of the action and the proceedings are fully narrated in the opinion of Lord Blackburn.

LORD BLACKBURN.—In this case the appellant as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Hannay and Sons sued the respondents in the Court of Session for a debt due by them before the sequestration to Hannay and Sons. It is not disputed that the appellant proved a debt exceeding £11,000, and it is not disputed that the respondents proved a cross claim exceeding £2000. The controversy is as to the difference, which amounted to £9000.

As to this the respondent set up two defences. One was as to a part of the claim only, viz., £7461, 10s. 1d. It is not necessary to notice this partial defence further than to say that there was such a defence, and that the appellant denied it.

The other defence on which the House has now to decide went to the whole cause of the action. It was to the following effect:—Hannay and Sons had, while still carrying on business, accepted seven bills of exchange drawn on them by Armstrong, Müller, and Company, payable to the drawers' order. These seven bills were all drawn and accepted for iron sold and delivered to Hannay and Sons in the course of the year 1873, whilst Armstrong, Müller, and Company were still carrying on business. Armstrong, Müller, and Company dissolved partnership on the last day of December 1873, after which date the firm only existed for the purpose of liquidation. Armstrong, Müller, and Company, in liquidation, indorsed these bills, and Armstrong Brothers, the respondents, also indorsed them and delivered them to the Clydesdale Bank, who discounted them for Armstrong Brothers. On the 28th of March 1874, before any of the bills arrived at maturity, Hannay and Sons, the acceptors, were sequestrated, the bills at that date being in the hands of the Clydesdale Bank.

The respondents' contention was that under the Scotch law of compensation and retention in bankruptcy they were entitled to set off these acceptances, or so much of them as might be necessary, against their own debt to the sequestrated estate of Hannay and Sons. And as the amount of these acceptances considerably exceeded the amount of the respondents' debt, this, if made out, was a complete answer to the claim of the appellant. The appellant contended that the position of the respondents was not such as to entitle them to this set-off.

The Lord Ordinary gave judgment for the appellant for the amount claimed. The Second Division assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action. It is against this last interlocutor that the appeal is brought.

It appears from the opinions of the Judges that they were of opinion that the defence depending on compensation and retention was made out, but that the partial defence, going only to £7461, 10s. 1d., was not made out.

Your Lordships have not heard any argument as to the soundness of the decision in the partial defence, nor has it been at all considered by your Lordships.

Your Lordships heard an exhaustive argument from the appellant's counsel upon the other defence, at the end of it intimating that you did not think it necessary to hear the counsel for the respondents.

My Lords, the law of Scotland on the subject of compensation and retention in bankruptcy and the history of it is clearly explained in Bell's Commentaries.¹ It is in effect very nearly if not precisely the same as the law of England as to mutual credit, though there is no enactment in the Acts relating to bankruptcy and sequestration in Scotland similar to those relating to mutual credit, which, since 4 Anne, c. 17, sec. 11, have been inserted in the English Bankrupt Acts. If there be any difference between the law of the two countries there are at least none on such a state of facts as exist in the present case. I think your Lordships refrained from giving judgment at once more from a desire to make sure that the facts as appearing in the evidence were accurately apprehended

(His Lordship then proceeded to give in detail the facts.)—If I have correctly stated the facts, Armstrong Brothers were indorsers of the two bills which became due on 1st April 1874, and who, on the sequestration of the acceptors, were compelled to take them up. They had a right of recourse against Armstrong, Müller, and Company, who were indorsers prior to themselves. They had an unadjusted account with those indorsers, on which the balance might or might not turn out to be in favour of the indorsers. And those indorsers held a letter of indemnity from Vaughan and Company to which Armstrong Brothers were not parties, but under which Armstrong, Müller, and Company might recover from Vaughan and Company at least part of any loss which Armstrong, Müller, and Company might ultimately sustain from the discount of the bills.

I fail to see, in this state of facts, anything that could prevent Armstrong Brothers then from setting off the bills, of which they were now holders, against their debt to the estate of the acceptors. In the Court of Session an attempt seems to have been made to argue that an indorser of a bill not in his hands and not due at the time of the sequestration, and who therefore at the time of the sequestration was not a creditor of the bankrupt, could not, on taking up the bill and becoming a creditor subsequently to the sequestration, avail himself of that set-off, but at your Lordships' bar that attempt was properly abandoned. It has for many years been decided, both in England and in Scotland, that if the indorser became a party to the bill before the bankruptcy, in the one country, or the sequestration, in the other, he may set it off on becoming holder afterwards. See as to the English law, Collins v. Jones, 10 B. and C. 777; as to the Scotch law, 2 Bell's Com. 5th ed. p. 128.

If indeed the holder receives payment from a prior indorser to him and hands over the bill to him, he ceases to be a creditor, and can, of course, no longer set off what is no longer a debt to him. For this,—if an authority were wanted,—Belcher v. Lloyd, 10 Bing. 310, is an authority. And the same effect would follow if it was made out that, though the bill was retained in the hands of the indorsee it had really been paid by a prior indorser, the fact that the indorsee retained possession of the bill being prima facie evidence that it was his property, and so casting the burden of proof on those who maintain the contrary, but not being conclusive.

But there is no pretence for saying that in the present case there was any evidence that on 1st April 1874 Armstrong, Müller, and Company, or their liquidating partner on their behalf, had taken up the bill in the hands of Armstrong Brothers. And, though there was an unsettled account between Armstrong Brothers and Armstrong, Müller, and Company in liquidation, which, if the balance was in favour of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, would have afforded facilities for enforcing, by compensation and retention, the claim of Armstrong Brothers against their prior indorser, that would not amount to payment; and there is neither authority nor principle for saying that the estate of the bankrupt acceptor of a bill has a right to require the holder of the bill to have recourse to any prior indorser before availing himself of his right to protect himself by compensation and retention in Scotland, or under the mutual credit clauses in England.

All these remarks apply, mutatis mutandis, to the other bills which became due subsequently.

But Vaughan and Company did on the 3d April and the 3d June 1874 pass to Armstrong Brothers two cheques of £4207, 10s. each, on account of Hannay and Sons' unpaid acceptances for the iron delivered in October and December 1873. And it was contended that this had the effect pro tanto of satisfying the claim of Armstrong Brothers on the two sets of bills which from that time became in part the property either of Vaughan and Company or of Armstrong, Müller, and Company. The counsel did not care which, and if they could have made out either it would have raised their point. And they further said that though Armstrong Brothers never parted with the possession of the bills yet that it was enough to defeat their right to a set-off if they had parted with the property in them.

Hannay and Sons' Trustee
v. Armstrong Brothers and Company.

My Lords, it would be enough to say that the burden of shewing that such a change on the property in the bills had taken place lay on the appellant, and that he has failed to satisfy that onus, but I think that when the evidence is examined on this point it is made out affirmatively that no such change in the property did take place. It is to be remembered that T. Vaughan and Company were not, and never had been, parties to the bills, and Armstrong Brothers had not, and never had, any right of recourse against T. Vaughan and Company. Armstrong, Müller, and Company were parties to the bills, and Armstrong Brothers had a right of recourse against them; and Armstrong, Müller, and Company held the letter of 23d October 1873, under which they might call on T. Vaughan and Company to indemnify them from at least a part of any loss sustained by them in respect of the drafts discounted by them. T. Vaughan and Company were under no obligation to prevent the bills coming back upon Armstrong, Müller, and Company, but they had a strong interest to prevent the bills coming back, and by so doing they could prevent Armstrong, Müller, and Company from sustaining loss, and they had a right to require Armstrong, Müller, and Company to do all that lay in their power to prevent any loss to them from occurring.

Mr W. T. Armstrong was called as a witness for the pursuers, and Mr George Neesham, the managing partner of T. Vaughan and Company, was called as a witness for the defenders, and both swore that the two sums were advanced by T. Vaughan and Company because Armstrong Brothers required some assistance to enable them to retain the bills and set them off against the claim of Hannay and Sons' trustee, and so prevent any loss. And it is quite clear that the second payment, on 3d June 1874, must have been made with that view, for the present litigation had then commenced, and the respondents were defending the action with a view of preventing any loss, which would in part fall ultimately on Vaughan and Company, and neither party could have been so absurd as to intend to defeat the very object of the litigation.

The letters of the 2d, 3d, and 4th April 1874 shew that at first Mr W. T. Armstrong did not take the correct view of the effect of the letter of 23d October 1873, and that Armstrong Brothers (or perhaps rather their clerk, who wrote the letter of 4th April 1874) thought that the two bills were to be delivered over by Mr W. T. Armstrong to T. Vaughan and Company when he met them on the Tuesday at Middlesborough. Had this been done there would have been ground for contending that T. Vaughan and Company had become purchasers of the bills, and that Armstrong Brothers had ceased to have any interest in them. But this was not done—there is no evidence on the face of the documents that T. Vaughan and Company ever intended this, far less had bound themselves to this. As soon as parties understood their real position they would wish not to do this, and I see no reason at all to doubt the veracity of the two persons who managed the transaction, and who both swear it was not done.

It is quite true that the action is defended in the interest of T. Vaughan and Company, in so far that if Armstrong Brothers were obliged to prove these bills on the estate of Hannay and Sons they would come upon Armstrong, Müller, and Company for as many shillings in the pound as the difference between 20s. and the dividend, and then T. Vaughan and Company might be called upon to make good to Armstrong, Müller, and Company a part of this loss. And the Lord Ordinary seems to think that this prevented Armstrong Brothers from being interested in the bills.

My Lords, the whole Judges in the Court of Session were of a different opinion, and I think the reason is tersely and accurately expressed by Lord Ormisdale, who says—"I am not aware, and can neither find authority nor see any good reason, in equity or otherwise, for holding that the circumstance of a party having a cautioner or collateral security for his debt is destructive of his right of compensation or set-off, supposing it to be otherwise well founded."

My Lords, if your Lordships take the same view of the facts as that which I have above expressed I think you will come to the same conclusion, namely, that the interlocutor of the Court of Session should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

His Lordship added that the Lord Chancellor, who had been obliged to leave the House, and Lord Selborne, who heard the argument, authorised him to say that they agreed in his Lordship's reasoning and conclusions.

THE MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF ABERDEEN, (Defenders)

Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Cotton, Q.C.—Keir.

THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN, (Pursuers) Respondents.—

Southgate, Q.C.—Asher—W. A. Hunter.

Property—Trust—Prescription—Mortification—Act 1696, c. 25.—By deed of mortification the granter assigned certain sums to the town-council of a burgh to be invested and the proceeds applied towards the maintenance of two professors in a university. The funds were invested in lands, which were managed for many years by the master of mortifications, an officer of the corporation, in whose name the title was taken. Afterwards the town-council appointed a portion of the lands, including a strip of land on the sea-coast, to be exposed for sale by public roup. The subjects were sold for payment of a feu-duty, and to a person who afterwards declared that he had purchased on behalf of the treasurer of the town, and the latter was infeft upon charter in his favour for behoof of the magistrates, council, and community. Soon afterwards the town-council, upon a representation that they were proprietors of the ground, obtained from the Crown a grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the strip of land.

In an action of declarator and accounting brought more than forty years afterwards by the university, with concurrence of two professors interested in the mortification, held (aff. judgment of the First Division) (1) that the town-council still held the lands in trust for the mortification, and that they could plead no prescriptive right against the trust ; (2) that, having acquired the fishings in the character of proprietors of the trust-property, they were bound to communicate the benefit to the trust, and hold them for behoof of the trust ; (3) that the consent and concurrence of the two professors gave the university a sufficient title and interest to sue for arrears ; but remitted to the Court of Session to allow the parties to amend their pleadings, and to proceed with the cause with a view to ascertain how far back within forty years the accounting should extend, and on what principles it should proceed.

The town-council of Aberdeen were the trustees of certain mortified funds directed to be applied to the maintenance of two professors in the Aberdeen University. They invested the funds in the purchase of lands in 1704, the title being taken in the name of the master of mortifications, an officer of the corporation. After feuing out a considerable portion of the lands they, in 1797, exposed the remainder, which included a strip along the sea-coast, for sale by public roup. It was sold for a feu-duty of £50 to a person who declared himself to have purchased on behalf of the treasurer of the town, and the treasurer was infeft in the lands upon charter in his favour for behoof of the magistrates, town-council, and community. Shortly afterwards the town-council, on application to the Crown setting forth that they were infeft in the lands, obtained a grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso.

In 1874 the University of Aberdeen raised this action, with concurrence of the two professors interested in the fund. They concluded for declarator that the lands and salmon-fishings were held by the defenders in trust for the pursuers as beneficiaries under the mortification, and that the sale in 1797 was null. There were also petitory conclusions for accounting.

The Lord Ordinary (Young) found that the lands were held by the defenders in trust, but assoilzied them with respect to the fishings, and farther found that the pursuers were not entitled to an accounting, reserving to the beneficiaries themselves and their representatives to sue for arrears.

The pursuers reclaimed.

This interlocutor was pronounced by the First Division on 18th July 1876 :—" Recall the said interlocutor : Find that the lands specified in the conclusions of the summons were purchased in 1704 by the corporation of Aberdeen with funds belonging to the mortifications mentioned in the first and second articles of the condescendence, and to four other mortifications : Find that the said lands were held by the said corporation till the year 1797 on titles expressing in gremio the several trusts subject to which the lands were so held : Find that in the year 1797 the said lands were sold by the corporation, as trustees for the mortifications, to the said corporation for its own behoof, in consideration of a feu-duty of £50 : Find that the said sale was illegal and void, and that the said lands, notwithstanding the said sale, are held and possessed by the defenders on the subsisting title thereto in name of the treasurer of the burgh of Aberdeen, subject to the trusts of the said mortifications : Find that the corporation in entering into the illegal transaction aforesaid acquired or attempted to acquire the said lands as the estate of the corporation itself, for the purpose of being thereby enabled to apply to the commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury for a grant in favour of the corporation of the salmon-fishings in the Dee ex adverso of the said lands, according to a practice then prevalent of the Crown granting rights of salmon-fishing in the sea to proprietors whose lands were bounded by the shore, merely on the consideration of their being proprietors of such lands : Find that, in pursuance of such purpose, the corporation, in the year 1801, presented a petition to the Lords of the Treasury setting forth that they were absolute proprietors of

No. 6. the said lands in their own right, and on that ground praying for a grant of salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of the said lands for the benefit of the corporation : Find that the prayer of the said petition was granted, and a crown-charter in favour of the corporation conveying the said salmon-fishings was expedite, which is written to the seal and registered 27th February 1804 : Find that the corporation have ever since possessed and do now possess the said salmon-fishings in virtue of the said charter : Find that the corporation, being the trustee for the said mortifications, having thus used the trust-estate, and the title thereof vested in them, for the purpose of obtaining a benefit to themselves, are bound to communicate that benefit to the trust-estate and the parties interested therein, and are bound to hold and administer the said salmon-fishings as part of the said trust-estate, and to apply the revenues and profits thereof to the benefit of the parties interested as beneficiaries in the said mortifications : Therefore find, declare, and decern, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons : Find under the petitory conclusions that the concurring pursuer, Dr W. R. Pirie, is entitled to a share of the revenues and profits of the trust-estate corresponding to his tenure of the professorship of divinity and church history from December 1843, the date of his appointment, till the date of citation : Find also under the petitory conclusions that the late John Cruickshank, as concurring pursuer, was, and his representatives, who have been sisted in his place, are entitled to a share of the profits and revenues of the trust-estate corresponding to his tenure of the professorship of mathematics from or about the year 1833 till the year 1858 : Find that the said shares of the profits and revenues of the trust-estate for the said period may competently be ascertained and decerned for in the present action : Find the pursuers entitled to the expenses hitherto incurred by them," &c.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Your Lordships, having heard the argument addressed to us, desired time to consider this case further—not, I venture to think, from any doubt you entertained as to the conclusion at which you should arrive, upon, at all events, the main question involved in it, but in order that you might be better able to dispose of a subsidiary question which was raised, and, I think, raised for the first time, by the argument at your Lordships' bar.

The action, which was raised in the Court of Session against the Aberdeen town-council was an action which had both declaratory and petitory conclusions. So far as the declaratory conclusions were concerned the nature of the case may be very shortly described. The principal officers of the corporation of Aberdeen, whom I will call for brevity the town-council of Aberdeen, were the trustees of certain mortified funds which were intended to be applied for the maintenance of two professors in the Aberdeen University. These funds were laid out with others in the purchase of certain property in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, to the south of it, and lying along the sea coast. Of that property, so far as it represented the mortified funds, the town-council were undoubtedly trustees for the university and its professors. A considerable time ago—about the end of the last or commencement of the present century—a transaction occurred, the nature of which may be described in this way : A considerable part of the property having been feued off by the town-council to various persons, one portion of the property—that adjacent to the sea coast—remained in their hands ; and as to it what I would call little else than a ceremony was gone through, by which they professed to sell it to a gentleman, who immediately afterwards declared that he had bought it as and held it as a trustee for the town-council. The result therefore was this, that the town-council being, as we should say, the trustee of a charity land, went through the form of selling that charity land to the corporation itself, feuing the land which was capable of producing an uncertain sum of profit for the certain sum of £50 a-year. Very shortly after that occurrence this took place—the town-council thus having become the owners of this land, applied to the Crown to grant to the town-council as the proprietors of the land, the right of salmon-fishing in the sea ex adverso to the land in question; and they based their application upon a narrative which represented that the town-council had acquired this land for, among other purposes, the purpose of asking for the right of salmon-fishing from the Crown; that the Crown was in the habit of giving the right of salmon-fishing to the proprietors of adjacent or riparian land; and that they supplicated the favour of the Crown as the owners of the adjacent land. Accordingly, and following the practice of the time, an Exchequer grant was made by the Crown of the salmon-fishing ex adverso of nearly the whole, though not quite the whole, of the coast to which I have referred.

From that statement of the case, on which I do not enlarge at greater length, because it was fully described in the able judgment of the Lord President, I think your Lordships could have no doubt that the case is one which does not admit of argument. The acquirement of the land is a transaction which could not for a moment be maintained in any Court. It is a dealing with trust-property by a trustee. The feuing out of the land counts for nothing as against those who are beneficiaries of the trust. They are entitled to disregard it, and treat it as if it never had happened. Then, again, with regard to the salmon-fishings, it is one of the first principles, founded upon no technical rule of law, but upon the highest principles of morality, that wherever a trustee, being ostensibly the owner of a property, acquires any benefit as owner of that property, that benefit cannot be retained by himself, but must be surrendered for the advantage of those who are beneficiaries under the trust. Now, it is perfectly apparent that this right of salmon-fishing was claimed by the town-council because they were the owners of the land; it is perfectly apparent that it was granted to the town-council because they were the owners of the land; it is perfectly apparent that it would not have been granted to them if they had not been the owners; and, under these circumstances, it appears to me clear to demonstration that their reception of the grant of the salmon-fishings is exactly one of those benefits which came to them as owners of the land, and must be surrendered for the advantage of those who really are the persons interested in the land. I do not delay your Lordships longer on that part of the case. I agree with every word which fell from the Lord President in describing the case, and I do not really think that the very able counsel who appeared at your Lordships' bar on behalf of the town-council were otherwise than impressed with the difficulty of the case they had to offer.

But, then, there remain the petitory conclusions of the summons. These are conclusions in which the two professors, for whose advantage these funds were mortgaged—or, rather, I should say, one of the professors and the representatives of the other, who has died—claim in their own persons to have an accounting and payment of the real value of the lands and of the salmon-fishings, over and above the feu-duty which has been paid. With regard to these petitory conclusions, one of the questions—and, as it seems to me, only one—was really argued

No. 6. in the Court below. It was doubted whether the professors could join in this
 Mar. 23, 1877. suit for the purpose of maintaining these petitory conclusions, and the Court of Magistrates of Session held that they could so join ; and I own it seems to me that no real or Aberdeen v. substantial reason can be alleged to shew why they could not join. With regard University of to the practice of this country, your Lordships are well aware that it is an every-Aberdeen. day occurrence to find an information dealing with a charity filed by the Attorney-General as representing the charity, and coupled with that—the whole proceeding being styled an information—a bill is filed by the individuals connected with the charity who conceive that they have some claim to personal and pecuniary advantages from the charity. In principle it seems to me that exactly the same thing is done in the present case. In Scotland, where it is not the habit for the Lord Advocate to sue as the Attorney-General does in this country with regard to charities, the university may be taken as representing the general claim on behalf of the charity, and the professors joining in the petitory conclusions as representing the individuals who ask for the specific relief to which they are entitled. Therefore, so far as the Court of Session held that these petitory conclusions were rightly joined, I think your Lordships will be disposed to agree with that view.

But then, there is also pressed upon your Lordships this further view of the case :—Here is an accounting directly for the profits of this land and fishing asked for, and there is no limit assigned to it beyond the Scotch limit of prescription, which is forty years ; and it was said that if the petitory conclusions were granted it might involve great hardships. Here, it was said, is a public body, the town-council, and, whatever may be said of the conduct of those who were the authors of this transaction in the first instance, their successors are not affected by any personal culpability as to what took place, and they have been dealing from year to year with the property of the town-council on the footing of this transaction.
 It may be that they have spent the money honestly, thinking they had a right to do so,—it may be that there is no property in the town-council to satisfy the judgment which may be given against it in reference to the arrears ; and it may be that the result will be that the members of the municipality and the community generally will have to be taxed to make good money which was spent, not by them, but by those who went before them. I do not find that any argument upon this subject took place in the Court below. I do not find any reference to it in the condescendence or pleas. I do not find even in the pleadings or in the reasons of appeal before your Lordships' House that any specific reference is made to the subject. There is no doubt that in England there have been cases where, upon reclamations made for the recovery of charity property which has been improperly applied, some consideration has been shewn in the decree with regard to the past expenditure of the charity money ; and there have been cases in which the accounting of the charity funds, of back rents or back receipts, has been limited—sometimes to the period when first misappropriation was challenged, and sometimes to the filing of the bill for the recovery of the charity estate. I do not find, as far as I have been able to investigate the subject, that there are any authorities—and none were cited at the bar—in Scotch law on this subject ; and I do not wish to indicate any opinion whatever as to whether the doctrine, which, in the way I have described, has prevailed in England, has ever been extended, or ought to be extended, to Scotland. But, I think, certainly, it was your Lordships' feeling, that it might be desirable, without in any way prejudicing this question, or in any way using expressions which would indicate that your Lordships had formed any opinion on the subject one way or the other, that this matter shall if possible be left open for the further consideration of the Court of Session, in case it might appear to the Court of Session, on their attention being specifically directed to this point, that any modification in the general accounting should be made in view of the considerations to which I have adverted.

No. 6.

Magistrates of Aberdeen v.
University of Aberdeen.

Any mode your Lordships adopt for effecting this purpose ought not, in my opinion, to affect in any way the costs of the litigation in this House. It appears to me that the appeal, on the grounds on which it is brought, has entirely failed; and I should submit that the interlocutor of the Lords of Session should be affirmed, with costs; but, in order that the Court of Session may have the opportunity of having their attention drawn to the question of the accounting, I should propose to your Lordships, in affirming the interlocutor of the First Division, with costs, to remit to the Court of Session with directions, before proceeding with the accounting ordered, to allow the appellants to amend the record and the pleas with reference to the question of the liability in the accounting; to allow the respondents to make such alterations in their pleadings as may be rendered necessary by those made by the appellants, and thereafter to proceed further in the case as shall be just; with power to dispose of all questions of expense incurred under this remit. My Lords, I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, with the exception of the last part of this case, as to which the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack has proposed that there should be a remit to the Court below, there really could not be entertained any doubt whatever, as soon as the facts were disclosed in the opening address of counsel. The corporation of Aberdeen appear to have been trustees for certain endowed professorships of certain funds which were placed within their control for that purpose, just as in this country many corporate bodies, notably the corporation of London, are trustees for many great public charities, holding funds entirely distinct for that purpose. The corporation of Aberdeen appears to have an officer to take charge of these funds, who is called the master of mortifications, and in him the property purchased with the sums of money granted by endowment were invested. In process of time it seemed to be thought desirable to dispose of some of the property, and other parts remained on hand. The portion remaining on hand was dealt with in this way:—The corporation, qua municipal corporation, fixed an upset price, and settled all the arrangements for a sale, and, when the forms of selling were gone through a person was appointed to bid on their behalf, and the whole matter was reduced to a mere matter of book-keeping on the part of the corporation. They handed over the property from their master of mortifications to the treasurer, fixing him with the payment of a certain sum yearly for the tenure of the property. That could not possibly be legal. There is, I think, no difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England in this respect. The law rests on the broadest principles of justice, and it is well settled that a person who holds a fiduciary position cannot acquire an interest of any description in the trust-estate until he has entirely denuded himself from the trust, and placed himself at arm's length from those whose interests he once represented. Therefore as regards the first and main portion of the case there can be no doubt.

A subordinate question then arises as to whether or not the fishings, being acquired subsequent to the purchase made, as alleged, out of the municipal funds, could not be held independently of any principle that might be applicable to the general bulk of the property. Something might be said for that, and two cases were cited which seemed to have some degree of bearing on the one before us till all the facts were carefully weighed. But when you come to look at the representations made to the Crown, it is distinctly seen that the very object of obtaining the trust-property was to have from the Crown a grant of these fisheries, because the Crown had laid down for itself the principle that they would make these grants to persons holding the lands adjacent to the sea. It was as owners of the trust-property that the fisheries were given to the council, and the two cases cited at the hearing have no bearing on the case we have now to decide. It was supposed from the special facts of the two cases cited that a distinction had been drawn, taking them out of the general rule that a trustee cannot possibly derive any benefit from the property he holds in trust. But I am sure that the Judges in these cases did not mean to impugn the general principle I have mentioned, and their ruling could not be applied to a case in which, clearly, and from the very statements of the parties, the benefit derived from the administration of the fisheries has been entirely derived from the acquisition of the trust-property, which was obtained for the purpose. The case is one of the simplest and plainest ever brought before us for decision.

The other part of the case would have afforded me some difficulty, for, in truth, we are very little provided with materials with regard to back accounting. We have not had before us any argument on that point before the learned Judges in the Court below, we have not had the point raised in any way clearly or distinctly on the pleadings before us, and, I think, the course proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack the only one well competent for your Lordships to adopt in all the circumstances of the case. As to the main portion of the case I never could have the slightest doubt.

LORD O'HAGAN.—I am in favour of affirming the interlocutor of the Court below in the manner proposed by the Lord Chancellor. I agree with your Lordships who have already spoken that there is no room for doubt on the first part of the case. A trust-estate is in question. The appellants are the trustees, the respondents the beneficiaries. The predecessors of the appellants administered their trust faithfully until 1797, when the officer, called the Master of Mortifications, who acted for them in the administration of the trust-estate, conveyed the lands, in consideration of a feu-duty of £50 a-year, to their own treasurer, after a sale at which their own provost presided. Ever since, the appellants have kept the property, and enjoyed advantages accruing from that possession. A simple statement of the facts of this strange and indefensible transaction is sufficient to stamp it with illegality. The principle forbidding a trustee to traffic in his trusts belongs to the jurisprudence of all nations. In this case, the law of Scotland, equally with the law of England, condemns the abuse of the fiduciary position, and declares that the advantage wrongfully gained by the trustee shall accrue—not to his benefit, but to that of the beneficiaries. It was urged that, whatever may have been the original weakness of the appellants' position, lapse of time has given it validity. But the trust was express. It was broken by the trustees for their own benefit, and to the injury of the cestui qui trust, and there is no principle in the law of Scotland which allows any lapse of time to validate a transaction so illegal. These were the opinions of the Court below, and your Lordships will have no hesitation in adopting their judgment.

No. 6.

The ruling of the first point seems to rule the second, and if the lands are affected by the trust—so as, notwithstanding the nominal transfer of title, and the great lapse of time, to belong still to the beneficiaries—the fishings appear to me to be affected in the same way, and with a like result. It is plain from the statement of the case that the lands were unlawfully purchased by the trustees for the purpose of founding a claim for the fishings. The possession of land was made the ground of the claim, and was admitted as such by the Crown, and without the land, so acquired by breach of trust, no grant of the fishing would have been obtained. It is true the fishings were granted by the Crown, and that the Crown is not seeking, on the ground of misrepresentation, to rescind the grant. But, if the grant was plainly and avowedly made because of the possession of land giving rights to the beneficiaries, but no right to the trustees to whom the land was unlawfully ceded, why should not the restoration of the land to its true owners involve the restoration of the fishings, which the trustees managed to obtain on false representations? The practice of the Crown would have given these fishings to the cestui qui trust as the proprietors of the adjacent land, and not to the trustees, who had virtually no interest, corporate or personal, in the matter. And, if your Lordships should agree in holding that lapse of time does not alter the rights of these persons, and that what belonged to the cestui qui trust in 1801 now belongs to their successors, then the fishings should be held subject to the trust of the mortifications, as well as the land in virtue of which the possession of these fishings was manifestly granted. It would, in my opinion, be a reproach to the law if it were powerless in such a case to prevent a trustee from making a commodity of his own wrong, and holding property claimed only by gross breach of duty. Your Lordships, I trust, will again enforce the doctrine which a distinguished Scotch Judge, once a member of this House, laid down, that “the law will even presume that the trustee intended that the profits should go to the beneficiary, rather than presume that he intended his own aggrandisement, at the risk and expense of the beneficiary.”—(Lord Colonsay in Laird v. Laird, May 28th, 1858, 20 D. 981). It is plain that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. As to the petitory conclusions, for the reasons given by the Lord Chancellor, I think the course he has proposed is a wise one.

Mar. 23, 1877.
Magistrates of Aberdeen v.
University of

LORD BLACKBURN.—I also am of opinion that, on the main question, the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. On that I will say no more than that I think the reasoning in the clear judgment of the Lord President is quite irresistible.

On the minor and petitory question, as to what extent the accounting should go over, I agree with the noble Lord on the woolsack that it has hardly been properly raised on the record. The hardship is, on one side, very obvious, for this fluctuating body, the town-council, being called upon to pay forty years' arrears, is to make the occupiers of heritable property in Aberdeen in 1877 pay for the money which has been spent by their predecessors in 1837 and downwards. It is also obvious that it would be a hardship, on the other hand, if the professors or their representatives, who ought to have their money, lose it, because they did not know they ought to have had it. I do not think that question has been properly raised and considered, and it is very desirable that any rule of law to be adopted should be ascertained and considered by the Scotch Judges; and I therefore entirely agree with the course suggested by the Lord Chancel-

No. 6. lor, which, as I understand it, is to leave the Court of Session at liberty to consider the question, and to adopt what, after considering the principles of Scotch law, and the decisions in Scotland—if there be any—shall seem to them to be the just course.

LORD GORDON.—It is unnecessary for me to detain your Lordships with many observations in a case so fully explained in the Court below. I quite adopt the views which were there expressed by the Lord President in reference to the principles which ought to govern both branches of this case. I am happy to say that your Lordships, in adopting the same view, are acting quite in accordance with the principles of Scotch law. In fact, our law is founded upon the civil law, and has adopted, to the full extent, the restriction upon any dealings on the part of trustees with trust-property. The petitory conclusions may admit of some further discussion, and, I think, an indulgence is conceded to the appellants in this case, in allowing them the opportunity of raising on this part of the case a fuller argument than they have yet prepared. It would have been a mistake for your Lordships to have dealt with that part of the case on the very meagre arguments which have been submitted to you. I therefore think your Lordships are acting correctly in giving power to the Court below to allow amendment of the record, and to decide any question of accounting.

THIS judgment was pronounced :—"That the said interlocutor . . . be, and the same is, hereby affirmed, except as regards the extent of the liability to account; and as to such accounting, and without prejudice to any question, it is ordered and adjudged that the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions, before proceeding with the accounting ordered by the said interlocutor, to allow the appellants to amend the record and their pleas with reference to the extent of their liability to account; and to allow the respondents to make such alterations as may be rendered necessary by those made by the appellants; and thereafter to proceed further in the cause as shall be just, with power to dispose of all questions of expenses incurred under this remit: And it is further ordered that the appellants do pay or cause to be paid to the said respondents the costs incurred by them in respect of the said appeal."*

Parent and Child—Presumption of Paternity.—In an action of declarator and of putting to silence at the instance of a man against a girl who claimed to be his lawful daughter the following facts were proved :—The pursuer had, after a somewhat prolonged courtship, married the mother of the defender when she was, to his knowledge, and on her own confession, far advanced in pregnancy, but, according to her and the pursuer's statement, in consequence of intercourse with another man. When the child was born the husband and wife were living together as married people (in a hotel in Edinburgh, where they had gone for the occasion), and at the time neither of them said to any one that the pursuer was not its father. The child was removed within three days after her birth, and the pursuer paid aliment for her for sixteen years, but she saw neither her mother nor the pursuer till she was twenty-one; she then, in consequence of rumours which had reached her as to her parentage, demanded to be recognised as the daughter of the pursuer and his wife, but this was refused; the pursuer, however, sent her to school at his own expense, and supplied her with money for dress, &c. It was then for the first time stated to the defender that another man was her father. The pursuer and his wife deposed that no connection had taken place between them prior to their marriage.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the pursuer's conduct in marrying a woman whom he knew to be pregnant, and his subsequent actings, had raised a presumption of his paternity which he had failed to rebut.

Ld. Chancellor (Cairns).

Lord Blackburn.

Lord Gordon.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, this case has been argued at your Lordships' bar with very great ability. Everything which could be said for the appellant has been said by the Lord Advocate and Mr Darling. On the other hand, your Lordships have heard from Mr Trayner an argument remarkable not merely for its point and strength, but, what perhaps is more unusual, for its great conciseness.

My Lords, the case itself is perhaps one of the most remarkable that has ever come before a Court in Scotland. The action in the Court of Session is an action known to Scotch procedure instituted by the appellant for the purpose of putting to silence a claim made by the respondent to be his daughter. The Lord Ordinary, before whom the case came in the first instance, gave effect to the conclusions of the summons, and gave the relief which was asked for. On the other hand, the Judges of the Second Division, upon a reclaiming note, were unanimously of opinion that the appellant had failed to establish that he was not the father of the respondent, and therefore assolized the respondent from the conclusions of the summons, and it is against that determination of the Court of Session that the present appeal is brought.

I will remind your Lordships very shortly of some of the matters which are so freshly in your Lordships' minds. The onus of proof in the case lies entirely upon the appellant. He takes upon himself to establish the proposition that he is not the father of the respondent, and if he does not establish that proposition he cannot succeed in obtaining the conclusions of the summons.

Now, my Lords, the history of the case may be conveniently looked at by dividing it into two parts, and, in the first place, I will remind your Lordships of those parts of the case as to which there is no dispute or which are established beyond the possibility of dispute or controversy. I will then place before your Lordships the parts of the case as to which there is controversy. There is no controversy about this: The appellant, and his wife, who is still alive, were married in the month of August 1850; they had been acquainted for some years before the marriage; their courtship had continued for some years; the appellant, and the lady, who is now his wife, were in the habit of associating together, and frequenting each other's company; a short time before the marriage the lady made a communication to the appellant that she was pregnant. If during their intimacy any intercourse in the technical sense of the word had taken place between them that would be a communication which might not take him by surprise. But that which was done was this: With his knowledge, and apparently with his concurrence, the lady went from Tweedside, where they were both living, to Edinburgh, to consult a Dr Thatcher, a physician in Edinburgh of some note at the time. The physician told her, although, according to her evidence, she had herself little doubt before of the matter, that she was with child, and it appears that, being made aware that a marriage was contemplated, he suggested that the sooner the marriage took place the better. The result of the interview with Dr Thatcher was communicated to the appellant. The appellant was not satisfied, but he himself went a day or two afterwards to see Dr Thatcher, and heard from Dr Thatcher that which the lady herself had heard. The appellant says that he gave Dr Thatcher to understand that he was not the father of the child. But, my Lords, I cannot take that as any statement which could be received that he had made to Dr Thatcher any clear and distinct communication on the subject. In the absence of a clear and distinct communication, the circumstances of the case and the manner in which Dr Thatcher was consulted, must have conveyed to the mind of Dr Thatcher that the relations between the appellant and the lady who had come to him were those which would have fixed the paternity of the child upon the appellant. However, Dr Thatcher seems to have told the appellant, as he told the lady, that the marriage had better take place as soon as possible, and the marriage did take place in about six weeks, as I understand it, after this time, namely, in August 1850.

The appellant then took the lady to the farm where he lived, his own home, and about six weeks after the marriage, the time for her delivery being imminent, they went to Edinburgh. They went to a hotel in Edinburgh, the appellant and the lady going there apparently not otherwise than as husband and wife ; and on the morning after they arrived at the hotel the lady was taken with labour of childbirth, Dr Thatcher was sent for, and the child was born. That is said to have been on a Tuesday, and on the Thursday the child was given into the care of a nurse and taken away from the hotel. After some time the appellant and the lady left the hotel, and apparently returned to their own home. From that time until the year 1872, a period of twenty-two years, neither of them saw the child. The child, a girl, grew up. There is not any clear evidence as to what she was generally called, or what she was intended to be called, but from the circumstance apparently of one of the garments, a plaid, which had been put around the child at first having been marked with the name of "Gardner," that name seems to have gone with her, and more or less to have been the surname by which she was occasionally, at all events, called. The appellant, however, regularly, for a period of sixteen or seventeen years, supplied, through Dr Thatcher, the sum requisite for the maintenance of the girl, and the supply of that maintenance was discontinued when the girl was sixteen or seventeen years of age, not from any repudiation of the obligation to supply it, but because at that time it was the expressed opinion of the appellant that she had come to an age when she might be able to support herself ; and accordingly she appears to have supported herself by working in a manufactory. However, in the year 1872, having been led by circumstances to which I need not refer, to suspect that the appellant and his wife were her father and mother, the girl, who was then of the age of twenty-one, went to the place where they were resident, saw her mother, and introduced herself as her child, and apparently laid claim both to the appellant and her mother as her parents.

My Lords, I pass rapidly over what passed during the succeeding three years. It is clear that at that time, the claim being made by the girl to be the daughter of the appellant as well as of his wife, that claim was, in the first instance, disputed ; but there is this remarkable fact, that during those three years, there being repeated meetings with her, and she being placed by the appellant in a school where her education might be improved beyond the point to which it had reached, the appellant supplied during those years ample funds for her education and for her maintenance, funds amounting to between £120 and £130, it is said, in one year. A correspondence continued during that time, in which he directs his letters to her by the surname of "Gardner," and she addresses him as her "father," or her "dear," or "dearest father," and at one of these meetings which occurred, it must be remembered, whilst the controversy still continued as to whether he was or was not her father, it is admitted that he offered to portion her, to provide her with a sum of £1000, payable at his death, and with an income in the meantime of £40 a-year, and that this sum was refused by her because it was not coupled with an acknowledgment of her as his daughter.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

Now, my Lords, if the case rested there, and your Lordships had nothing more to deal with than the facts which I have stated, the marriage to a woman avowedly pregnant, and near the time of her delivery, by a man who had been courting her, and keeping company with her, and her delivery taking place in the way that I have mentioned, and the child provided for by the husband, although reasons for the secrecy might easily be discovered, from the desire of preventing, at all events, in the first instance, a scandal which might be occasioned among the connections of a married woman, still the facts which I have described would raise, I agree, with regard to Scotch law, not a presumption juris et de jure, but a presumption of fact so strong that the man was the father of the child, that it would be a presumption extremely difficult to rebut or controvert. Speaking of Scotch law only, and putting aside the much stricter presumption which in the case of English law would be drawn from those circumstances, I take the expression of Scotch law by Lord Gifford to be one which is accurate in itself, and which, indeed, was not challenged in the argument of this case. Lord Gifford says,—“A certain presumption of paternity arises from the bare fact that a man knowingly marries the mother of an illegitimate child previously born. But this is a very weak presumption. In the absence of all other evidence all that can be said is probably that it is more likely than not that he is the father. Such presumption would be greatly strengthened if previous to the marriage the mother of the illegitimate child had been the mistress or concubine of the man who afterwards married her, and had cohabited with him at or about the time of conception, and the adoption or acknowledgment of the child as his by the husband would probably make the presumption almost conclusive, though still capable of being rebutted by contrary proof. Where, as in the present case, a man marries a woman who at the time of marriage is in a state of pregnancy, the presumption of paternity from that mere fact is very strong, and is, perhaps, in almost all such cases, in entire accordance with the actual truth. Still farther, where the pregnancy is far advanced, obvious to the eye, or actually confessed or announced as in the present case, to the intended husband, a presumption is reared up which, according to universal feeling, and giving due weight to what may be called the ordinary instincts of humanity, it will be very difficult indeed to overcome. The man who marries a woman in the condition in which Mrs Gardner was on 29th August 1850, the date of their marriage, when she was seven or eight months gone with child, says almost as emphatically as he could do by the most express words, ‘I am the cause of the pregnancy, and the father of the expected child.’”

Now, my Lords, those facts to which I have up to this time referred are what I have termed the facts of the case, as to which there is either no dispute or no serious controversy. Now, let me remind your Lordships of what are the statements upon the other side brought forward for the purpose of getting rid of these facts. The statements are those of the appellant and of the mother. They are statements which, when I mention them, will appear to your Lordships to depend entirely in their nature upon the evidence of the appellant and the mother alone, and they are statements which cannot be directly and distinctly, at all events as to the material part of them, checked or controlled by opposite testimony. The material statement of the appellant and of the mother, as to which there is the difficulty which I have referred to of checking their testimony, is this—they say that before marriage they never had carnal intercourse; that is the statement of both. They state, further, that before marriage, and immediately before the consultation with Dr Thatcher, the lady told the appellant that she had met on the moor, near her brother's house, some months before, a man whom she termed a low person or a blackguard, who had, in substance, violated her person, and she attributed to this cause her pregnancy in the conversation which she had with the appellant. My Lords, that is her statement, and that is her husband's statement. She further states, and her husband states to the same effect, that about a year after the marriage, being in a state of weakness and illness, I think upon the occasion of the birth of a stillborn child, she made a further disclosure to her husband not consistent with that which she had made before marriage, that she told him upon that second occasion that she had had before marriage connection with a man whom she knew and named, Laidlaw, a shepherd of her brother's, and that it was Laidlaw who was the father of the child in question.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

Now, my Lords, I must pause here for the purpose of referring to the first of these statements, the statement after which the appellant says he married this lady. It is a statement which I am bound to say appears to me, as it is given, to be one of the most improbable statements, one of the most difficult of belief, that it is well easy to imagine. The statement is this, that a lady, in a respectable position of life, made this statement to the appellant, also in a respectable position of life, before marriage, that she had been forced and ravished, and he made no further inquiries about it than to ask her by whom, and she said she did not know—a low person, a blackguard, and that thereupon all inquiry on his part ceased, and that he in a temper of romantic attachment married the lady under those circumstances, in order to shield her from the scandal which would arise from her pregnancy becoming known, and the birth of her child being made public. My Lords, it does appear to me that upon the mere statement of that story, without more, it is so contrary to the mode in which mankind generally act, that, although it is impossible to say that it cannot be true, it is not too much to say that it is in the highest degree unlikely; and very strong corroboration of that story would be required, or, at all events, it would be necessary to see that those upon whose testimony that story is to be accepted have always spoken with great accuracy, with great consistency, and in a manner which shews that their recollection and their accuracy of speech is entirely to be accepted.

My Lords, I will ask your Lordships to consider the evidence in a moment by those tests; but I am anxious, in the first place, to put aside what appears to me to be of comparatively minor importance in the case, but which yet seems to have occupied a good deal of the attention of the Court below,—I mean the episode, if I may term it so, with regard to Laidlaw. He has been called as a witness in the case, and in form he denies that he had carnal intercourse with the lady, but his evidence is open to considerable observation, and it is said that it cannot be reconciled with the statements which he appears to have made in letters which were put into his hand, and upon which he was cross-examined. My Lords, I should prefer, in the view I take of this case, to assume, although I only put it by way of assumption and not as stating that it is a conclusion at which I have arrived, that there was evidence which might be held to establish that there was intercourse with Laidlaw before the marriage, but I repeat that I do it merely by way of assumption for the purpose of what I have still to say. My opinion is that that is only a part of the case, and by no means the largest part. It may well have been that there was intercourse with Laidlaw, but the question remains, the great question in the case, Was there or was there not intercourse between the appellant and the lady who afterwards became his wife? because, if there was, there is then at once the means of accounting for the chain of circumstances to which I have already referred, and from which would flow the presumption of which I have spoken.

No. 7.

Gardner.

Now, my Lords, I have said that the question of whether there was or was not this intercourse before marriage depends upon the testimony of the appellant and of the lady. There was the possibility of intercourse—there was the opportunity for it, there was everything in the conduct of the parties which would lead you to suppose, unless the contrary is clearly made out, that there had been that intercourse, and the treatment of the child was on the footing of the child having been a child of the appellant.

But is the testimony of the appellant and of the lady to be accepted as negating the fact of that intercourse? Now, my Lords, there unfortunately your Lordships have what I must term the opposite of clear, consistent, and unhesitating testimony. In the first place, I refer to the evidence of the lady. She stands convicted by her own confession of having made before marriage a statement which was not consistent with what she now says was the fact. She made to the appellant the statement that she had been ravished against her will by a person unknown to her. The statement she now makes is that she had a connection which cannot be described by the name of ravishment with a person perfectly well known to her. But not only is there that; there is also this further inconsistency in her testimony. In the condescendence, which professes to give a narrative of this part of the case, and which must emanate from the statements and the instructions of the lady, there is a statement, that she had connection with Laidlaw twice or oftener, and the actual places where the connection took place are mentioned. But in her testimony she recedes from that statement, and says that she had connection once, and only once, with Laidlaw, and denies any further connection.

With regard both to the lady and the appellant himself there is this further observation in regard to their evidence: In the course of that period of three years to which I have referred, between 1872 and 1875, they had frequent meetings, not merely with the girl, but with a minister of the Free Kirk of Scotland, Mr Kay, to whose congregation the young woman belonged, by whom she had been baptised, and who appears to have taken an interest in her welfare. The Lord Ordinary speaks of Mr Kay as being a partisan of the respondent. A partisan undoubtedly he was, in this sense, that he appears to have believed that the respondent was the daughter of the appellant, and appears to have thought that she ought to be acknowledged as such, and that a wrong was being done to her by her not being acknowledged as the daughter of the appellant. But, my Lords, there is nothing whatever that I can observe, either in the course taken or in the expressions used by Mr Kay, which for a moment would authorise your Lordships, or any Court, to hold that there was any reason why the evidence of Mr Kay should not be accepted according to its literal effect, or which could impute to Mr Kay any motives for departing from the strict line of truth in the evidence which he has given. My Lords, if the evidence of Mr Kay is looked at, as I think it must be, as evidence entirely worthy of credit, it appears to me that from that evidence it is proved to demonstration that both as to the appellant and as to the lady they, in the course of the communings between Mr Kay, the appellant, the lady, and the young woman, made at different times during the period that I have referred to statements which are at variance with the evidence which they now give. And when I look at the evidence which they now give, and the cross-examination they are subjected to, I cannot, more especially as to the appellant himself, find that they are prepared to do more than profess a want of recollection as to whether they made to Mr Kay the statements which he says they made, or whether they did not make them.

No. 7.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

My Lords, that being so, the statements of the appellant and his wife being, as it seems to me, in the highest degree improbable, they being statements as to which they have not been consistent at different times, and being statements, especially, which are highly inconsistent with expressions which have fallen from them during the period between 1872 and 1875, when the question of the pater-nity of this young woman was in the first instance raised, I come to the conclusion that I cannot, as against what is the presumption arising from the conduct in this case, accept mere declarations, even on oath, of the appellant and his wife against the legitimacy of this young woman. These, my Lords, are the grounds upon which I arrive at the conclusion which was unanimously arrived at in the Court of Session. I cannot find any fault with that determination, and therefore I submit to your Lordships that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, in this very painful case I have come to the same conclusion as that which has just been expressed by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack. The burden of proof in this case of the proposition that this girl Mary is not the child of Robert Gardner, the pursuer in the action, who seeks to restrain her from claiming so to be, is thrown upon him, and the Judges of the Second Division have come to the unanimous conclusion that he has not discharged that burden, and has not proved that this Mary is not his child. The Lord Ordinary came to a different conclusion. I must confess that I greatly regret that a case of this kind should not rather be submitted to a jury than brought before the Judges sitting as Judges both of fact and of law. However, that is the course of practice, and we have to deal with the case as we best may.

The remark caught my attention once or twice, I think, in the course of the Lord Advocate's able address to us, that we had not the advantage which he said the Lord Ordinary had, of seeing the demeanour of the witnesses; but, my Lords, there is something in this case which, with regard to the more important witnesses, certainly diminishes the regret I might otherwise feel at not having been able to observe their personal demeanour when they were examined before the Court. We know that as regards two of the principal—I may say the two principal—witnesses in the case, Mr and Mrs Gardner, not only is Mr Gardner,

No. 7.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

the pursuer, but both he and Mrs Gardner are, in the circumstances which have occurred in the case before it was brought into Court at all, affected with the deepest possible interest in the result. The most grave interests are at stake as regards them, depending upon the result of the case which they seek to establish, because, not only is it a question concerning the conduct of Mr Gardner before marriage towards the lady who was his affianced spouse, but it concerns also the representations which they have made from time to time, and the conduct which they have exhibited towards this girl, who is the offspring undoubtedly of one of them, the lady. On the other hand, a man has been called named Laidlaw, of whom I think, without having had the opportunity of seeing him, enough appears upon the face of his testimony to make me say that I put him wholly out of the case as a witness of credit with regard to anything to which he may be brought to depose. There are, however, some witnesses whose evidence is undoubtedly of importance, who are not subject, as it appears to me, to any possible impeachment as to veracity; and the only possible impeachment as to the exactness and correctness of statement with regard to one of them, Mrs Hutchinson, rests upon the question whether or not her memory can carry her back with sufficient accuracy to a period of considerable remoteness, namely, 1850, when these transactions to which she deposes took place. But with regard to her, and with regard to the clergyman, Mr Kay, certainly nothing appears upon the face of the evidence for us to consider in respect of veracity. I can hardly conceive what imputation can be made upon Mr Kay's veracity, unless it be an observation thrown in by the Lord Ordinary in the course of his note in deciding upon the case, that he has shewn some warmth as a partisan in the cause of the defender. But he has no interest in that cause, either pecuniarily or otherwise. There was some slight suggestion of a possible motive that might have actuated him if there had been an attachment or an engagement between him and the defender; but that I put aside. I think there is nothing which can be imputed to him which ought to shake our confidence in his veracity.

Then, how does the case really stand when you have thus considered the condition of the witnesses? As regards the law of the case a great deal has been said during the course of the discussion upon presumptions of law and maxims of law. With regard to presumptions as being applicable to this case I think that the presumptions being, as is allowed by the Judges, and as is allowed by the counsel at the bar, certainly not de jure, whatever may be said as to their being presumptions juris, it really comes only to this, that we are to look upon these so-called presumptions simply as deductions which sensible men make from the facts which are laid before them as evidence, open, therefore, to rebuttal by the same class of evidence—that is to say, oral testimony—as that by which the propositions they are supposed to point to are demonstrated and proved; in other words, by a contest of evidence such as I consider there is in this case, and I approach the case with that view.

That being so, my Lords, let us look at what the natural probabilities of the case are with regard to the facts disclosed. The facts disclosed, independently of the oral communications made from one person to another, are these :—You have a gentleman who has for many years been paying courtship to a lady, now his wife, Mrs Gardner. You have the fact that shortly before the period which seems to have been arranged between them for a marriage she is found to be pregnant, at a time when, of course, it was impossible that it could have occurred in an honourable or reputable manner. She is, notwithstanding that, married, having gone before the marriage to consult a medical man, and it being declared by the medical man that she is undoubtedly near her confinement, and after the marriage she is taken first to an out-of-the-way place at the seaside and then to a hotel in Edinburgh, where, with a good deal of privacy, which the landlord describes by the expression that the matter was shrouded in mystery, she is confined. We find that the persons engaged with regard to that confinement, the medical man who was consulted before the marriage, and the person who attended her during the confinement, were all retained, if I may use the expression, and paid, by Mr Gardner, who had married the lady a few weeks before the confinement. We then find a fact upon which too much stress ought not to be laid, but a fact of some little consequence in the matter, namely, that the child, when brought into the world, very scanty clothing having been provided for it, is wrapped up in a plaid, which undoubtedly is known to have had the name of Mr Gardner upon it; there was "R. Gardner" in the corner of the plaid. Being wrapped up in that plaid the child is carried off by Mrs Hutchinson, and is never again seen during childhood by either Mr Gardner or the undoubtedly mother, Mrs Gardner. The child, however, was maintained to the age of sixteen, and by whom? By Mr Gardner, who did not cease to maintain the child until the time had come when she was able to maintain herself. He does not seem to have thought it necessary to proceed after that with her maintenance, but up to that time the child was maintained by him. The child had not obtained, so far as we can see in these proceedings, any repute, either by name or otherwise, as being the child of Mr Gardner. This part of the case is left in some uncertainty still. The child was baptised by the clergyman who has given his evidence in the matter when she was about sixteen years of age, soon after the time when she went to work at a mill in Loanhead, when she became a member of his congregation. She was baptised simply as Mary, but from that time she seems to have commenced writing a series of letters to Mr Gardner, in which she called him first "dear Mr Gardner," and afterwards "dear father," and signed herself as "Mary Gardner," to which he responded, addressing his letters to her as "Mary Gardner."

Now, my Lords, putting all these circumstances together, there would have been very little doubt indeed as to the paternity of the child, if matters had rested there. But then we are met with a very extraordinary story, which is disclosed by the testimony independently of these external and admitted facts.

We are told that before the marriage Mrs Gardner confessed to her intended husband that she was pregnant, and she stated to him (that appears to be the result of the whole of the evidence) that the pregnancy occurred in this way: That she met, as she expressed it, a blackguard, on a certain hill, near the place where she resided, Cademuir Hill, and that this blackguard forced her, and that the consequence of that was the state in which she found herself. He says that she was in such a state of agitation and distress at being obliged to make this communication, and that she was, as he believed, so attached to himself, as he explains it, that he was afraid that if the marriage were then broken off she would destroy herself; and he accordingly made up his mind to the most singular and unexampled piece of heroism to cover her discredit, by marrying her at once, and then endeavoured, in order not to be fixed any more than could possibly be helped with the burden of a child who was not his own, to keep the story secret, and to shroud it from the rest of the world until the time came when by living as man and wife, and not having this child brought before their notice, and the time being come, as he afterwards expresses it, when she could maintain herself, this disgrace of the wife would, as he thought, be obliterated during all the rest of their lives.

No. 7.

May 17, 1877.
Gardner v.
Gardner.

That in itself is an extremely singular story, and what marks the singularity of it more than anything else, I think, is, that he says that when he went to the medical man at Edinburgh and heard what he had to say upon the state of the lady, the appellant gave him to understand that he was not the father, and after he had given him to understand that the medical man recommended him, by way of protecting her, if that were his wish, to hasten the marriage, to lose no time in getting the marriage performed, because she was very near her confinement. I confess that that is a view of the case which I have never been able to follow as consistent with the ordinary rules of probability; but it seems to have received the sanction of some of the learned Judges in the Court below, though not of all, and certainly not of the Lord Justice-Clerk, who appears to have taken the same view as I have taken of that part of the case, namely, that it requires a very considerable stretch of charitable allowance to suppose that this was a really true and correct narrative, namely, that being told that the lady is to have a child which is not his own, the medical man whom he consults tells him the best course he can take is to marry the woman as soon as possible.

Now, what the appellant says he did thereupon is also singular. This is what he states,—“She went in to him” (the doctor), “and I also went in a day or two afterwards to call upon him. (Q.) Did Dr Thatcher say to you that if you were the man you ought to marry her at once? (A.) He advised the marriage to go on”—(observe, this is not cross-examination; it is examination in chief by the pursuer’s own counsel)—“at least I think he did. (Q.) Did he say that the girl was in the family way, and that if you were the man you should marry her at once? Don’t take these words from me, but was anything of that kind said? (A.) He did not say if you are the man, but he recommended that the marriage should go on. (Q.) He recommended that somebody should marry her? (A.) He said that she was in that way certainly, but I led him to understand that I was not the father. I don’t think that at the time when I went to see Dr Thatcher the time of our marriage had been fixed.” Now, one could understand it as it was first put to him in the question by counsel, that Dr Thatcher might have said “if you are the man,” meaning by that, the father of the child, “you had better marry her at once.” But I confess I cannot so easily comprehend the story when he distinctly takes care to say Dr Thatcher did not say “if you are the man,” but he says—“I led him to understand that I was not the father” of the child.

The matter resting there, you are told by Mr Gardner, the pursuer, that he heard, in the first instance, from his wife only, the circumstance of her having been so dealt with and treated by a blackguard on the hill, and that he did not ask any more questions. He does not say whether that was because he thought it hopeless to look after this blackguard or not, nor does he tell us what he said, though he does not seem to have inquired whom she communicated with and told about this which had happened to her. Now, my Lords, I have looked into the evidence to see who were living in the house with her at the farm where she resided, and I find that there was her brother. I find that with her brother there was her sister, and there were two maid-servants, as well as this man Laidlaw, whom she fixes upon now, not a stranger or a blackguard on the hill

No. 7. any longer, but a man with whom she was living in constant and familiar intercourse. But if the story were true, Mr Gardner, in pursuing the inquiries he would be likely to make in such an extraordinary case would have found out that she might have communicated on the subject with her sister if she did not like to communicate on such a matter with her brother, and she might also have communicated with the maid-servants; but no such inquiry was made by Mr Gardner about any such communication.

May 17, 1877.
Gardner v.
Gardner.

Then he says that in the following year Mrs Gardner became very seriously ill, and being alarmed at the condition she was in she named to him the man, and fixed upon Laidlaw as being the man. I need not enter into the details of that part of the case. It is very observable, as my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has remarked, that in the condescendence she not only admits that she had this intercourse with this man, but she states it to have occurred twice or more. Yet, although she must have given that information, for her husband would never have thought of inserting it gratuitously into the condescendence, thereby throwing an additional stain upon her character, nevertheless, when she comes to be examined, she says that some attempt was made in a barn, but it was unsuccessful, and therefore there was only once intercourse with this man. This story having been told to Mr Gardner we do not find then that anything is done upon it. Laidlaw is never communicated with at any time, either by Mr or Mrs Gardner; but matters go on as I have described before,—matters beyond the reach of any cavil at the testimony go on after this second communication made to Mr Gardner. He continues as before to maintain this child, and maintains her up to the time when she is sixteen years of age.

Now, when you come to the other and the later part of the story, from the time when some question was raised by this girl about her paternity, you then come to Mr Kay taking the case up, and when Mr Kay takes up the case you find that he gives a distinct and plain narrative, a very precise and circumstantial narrative, of what took place in the several visits and conversations which he had with Mr Gardner upon the subject. I have read the evidence over more than once, and it does seem to me, my Lords, to be given very naturally—in natural sequence, and in a manner consistent with probability—very contrary, in that respect, to the extraordinary statements which have been made on the part of the pursuer with reference to all that had previously occurred. He mentions that at the first meeting Gardner came to him, saw him at Loanhead, where Mr Kay was living, and said that he “came to affirm nothing, and to deny nothing.” That was an extremely likely position and a prudent position probably for Mr Gardner to take. Then he says,—“As sure’s death, I’m no her father.’ I caught him and said,—‘Then your wife’s the mother, at least,’ and he hesitated, and said ‘Y-y-yes.’ That was the substance of the conversation. (Q.) Was anything said on that occasion about the meeting with Mrs Gardner and somebody else on the hill? (A.) Yes. He said that Mrs Gardner had been met by a man upon the moor”—(having said that he was not the father, and having admitted that Mrs Gardner was the mother he felt it necessary that there should be some explanation of that state of facts)—“and that he was a poor working man, and that he had forced her, and that having forced her she was in this condition. I put the question to him”—(which Mr Kay would be sure to do)—“‘Where is that man?’ He said he did not know. I asked ‘Is he in the neighbourhood of your place, or in the neighbourhood just now?’ He said—‘No, not just now.’ ‘Could he be found?’ I asked—‘No,’ he said. 'Where was he?' I asked. He said he thought he was not in this country at all, and that owing to his conduct with Mrs Gardner he had become a dissipated man."

No. 7.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

Why should I suppose that Mr Kay has been inventing all that conversation? It is in itself extremely probable that the conversation should take that turn—it is what one would expect, that if anything at all was said about the man, Mr Kay would be persevering in his inquiries as to what had become of that man. I am asked to disbelieve Mr Kay, who has no possible interest in the matter beyond the interest he has taken in it as having taken up the case, as it is called, of the girl as a friend; I am asked to disbelieve him in a matter which cannot be a matter of memory, for this took place only a few years ago. It is not a question of memory, and he distinctly and positively states that he put to Mr Gardner a series of questions of the most explicit kind, and he gives the answers which were rendered to those questions, and if those questions were asked and those answers were rendered the statement which Mr Gardner made to Mr Kay was a deliberate falsehood, for he knew (according to his story) that Laidlaw was the man, and he knew where Laidlaw lived; he knew that he had not fled the country, or anything of the kind, but was easily to be met with if necessary.

My Lords, you have, on the one hand, two certainly contradictory stories told by Mrs Gardner,—first, that which she narrated to her husband, and afterwards that which is narrated in the condescendence,—the first being that she was forced by a blackguard, of whom she knew nothing, upon the hill, and the second being that she had had intercourse with Laidlaw, and that indeed she had made an appointment with Laidlaw to meet him upon the hill. That is as regards Mrs Gardner. Then you have, as regards Mr Gardner, these deliberate falsehoods told to Mr Kay with a view evidently of screening himself, and defeating further investigation by an attempt to throw Mr Kay off the scent, and to induce him not to see Laidlaw, if he had been able to find out at that distance of time who the person was. He tried to put him off the scent by what can be called nothing else than a set of deliberate falsehoods.

I do not think it necessary to go further into the case, because you have both Mr and Mrs Gardner contradicted in their testimony.

Balancing the testimony on the one hand and on the other, I cannot think that we could possibly arrive at such a conclusion as would lead us to say that Mr Gardner has proved that he is not the father of the child.

My Lords, the only remaining point is this: If Mr Gardner had been up to the very end of the courtship in Australia as he was before of course the case would have been an extremely different one from that which is now presented to us, but we must remember that during all those months before the marriage, which are important in this inquiry, the courtship was going on, and during all that time Gardner had continual opportunities of visiting this lady in her own house; he says that sometimes he saw her in the kitchen, but more frequently in "the room" in the house. Once he paid a visit there; he says that was in 1847—some time before these events occurred. He also says that he did not often walk out with her; but I think he was walking out with her when the conversation took place in which she first communicated to him the fact of her being pregnant. He says it was not often the case that he was there,—at the same time he was there during the course of this continued courtship with this lady. Now, we know that this lady,—we have been told it by herself,—was a person of very loose character. She was a person who, while receiving the addresses of an honourable lover, could admit the addresses of a person in a very inferior station in life, and therefore it may well be thought that she was not a person of the most delicate feeling. We have the fact that she had most abundant opportunities of acting with Mr Gardner in a way which might result in the production of this child. It is not made out to my satisfaction at all that even supposing there was this connection with Laidlaw it was that connection with Laidlaw which caused the birth of Mary. You have the fact that Laidlaw was never asked to maintain her, and that Mr Gardner always did maintain her up to the time she was sixteen years of age. You find her writing to Mr Gardner—always with contradiction, it is true, but not with the indignant reproof which would have been the case if Mr Gardner's story were true—and calling herself "Mary Gardner" and calling him "dear father." You find decided declarations of his enough, but nothing of that character which one would expect to find when so outrageous an attempt, if the attempt really were outrageous, was made.

My Lords, looking at all the conduct of the persons in the case it is quite impossible for me to come to the conclusion that the pursuer's statements have been proved, and that this action can be maintained by the pursuer on the ground of his having established the facts. The onus of proof was upon him, and that onus he certainly has not discharged.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. I think in the present case the question is not so much one of law as one of evidence, and the conclusions to be drawn from the evidence as to one point, which I will state directly. The question is, whether or no Mr Gardner, who is the pursuer, has sufficiently established that Mary Gardner, undoubtedly and admittedly the daughter of his wife, undoubtedly and admittedly born after wedlock, is not his child. That is the issue which he has taken upon himself to establish. The Lord Ordinary thought that he had established it. The Judges of the Second Division unanimously thought that he had not established it, and the question now upon appeal is, whether it has been established or not.

Now, my Lords, I take it that we cannot express what I think is really the leading point here in better words than those which were used by Lord Gifford, namely :—"Wherever an avowed and open courtship has taken place, and there have been opportunities of access, and thereafter the man marries the woman in an advanced state of pregnancy, knowing that she is so, and hurrying on the marriage, as happened here, for that very reason, I do not say that the presumption of paternity is absolutely conclusive, but I do say it is almost as strong as such a presumption can be." Such are the words of Lord Gifford, and that, I apprehend, is correct. That is my opinion, and I think it is what any man, who knows what would be the ordinary way in which human beings might be expected to act, would say. The inference to be drawn is that a man must, when he married under such circumstances, have believed that he was the parent of the child, and consequently, for otherwise there could be no mistake about that matter, must have known that he had had connection with the mother at such a time that she who was to his knowledge with child when he married her might have been with child by him. I think, my Lords, the conclusion from that is excessively strong—almost irresistible.

In the present case all these circumstances are admitted to exist. Mr Gardner and the lady, Miss Brodie, afterwards his wife, were in the habit of seeing each other during a long courtship, and it is idle to suppose that a woman working on a farm in Scotland, and a man, a farmer in the neighbourhood, had not under those circumstances ample opportunity of having intercourse together. Then she, thinking she is with child, consults him ; that is admitted. He causes her to go and see Dr Thatcher, and upon Dr Thatcher's advice, that she is with child and that they had better hurry on the marriage, they do hurry it on and are married. About seven or eight weeks after the marriage, when she is about to be delivered, they go together to Edinburgh, where they were not known ; they go to a temperance hotel where they sleep together ; they live as man and wife in one room, and there she is delivered of a child, Dr Thatcher knowing that they were married, but, I should think, from the circumstances, the people in the hotel not knowing whether they were married or not, but probably from what happened, especially from the child being removed, believing that they were not married. There she was delivered of a child, which child was, through the instrumentality of Dr Thatcher, carried away and disowned, and the birth kept a secret, as far as they could keep it a secret, from their own neighbourhood. Than that there could not be a stronger prima facie case within the meaning of what I have quoted from Lord Gifford, that Mr Gardner really was the father of the child thus born and sent away, that he and his wife did wish to conceal the fact that that child had been born, and that they, or she at least upon her own confession, for she admits that she was the mother, acted the unnatural part which they did. As to the wife that is clear, and if Mr Gardner was the father he also acted a very unnatural part in concealing his paternity.

My Lords, if the case stood there I think nobody could have doubted that the prima facie presumption that the appellant was the father was fully established. I do not think that that presumption is met merely by proving that some one else had intercourse with the woman, so that that some one else might be the father of the child. That is a very important step, but I am far from thinking that that is sufficient by itself. I think, in order to rebut such a case as this, it is necessary to establish, to the satisfaction of the tribunal which has to try the question, that the husband, the man who has made this very strong case against himself towards admitting that he was the father of the child, had not had intercourse with the mother at such a time that he could be the parent of the child. I do not think that the presumption of parentage is nearly so strong in such a case as it would be or ought to be if the time when the child was begotten was after the parties were married and were husband and wife. But when it is proved (supposing that to be the case) that the man who afterwards became the husband had connection with the woman who afterwards became his wife, so that he might be the parent of her child, I do not think you can in that case, any more than in the case of a child both begotten and born during matrimony, enter into an inquiry, which would be a very indelicate one, and one in which it would be almost impossible to prove the fact as to which of the two was the actual father of the child. Nevertheless, if you shew that another man had connection with the woman at that time, you take a considerable step ; you remove one of the things which would have been a great difficulty in your way in shewing that the man who afterwards became the husband was not the father. As to the husband's not having had connection before marriage, what would be sufficient proof of that must, I apprehend, not depend upon any technical precise rule, but must depend upon whether it is made out upon the facts existing in the particular case.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

Now, here we have the distinct oaths of both the husband and the wife on a matter on which certainly, I think, they cannot be mistaken. They both positively swear that before they were married there never was intercourse between them at all. It is a very painful thing, my Lords, where there are distinct and positive oaths of that sort, for any Judge or tribunal to say,—I cannot believe those direct oaths; nevertheless, it must sometimes be done. There are frequently things sworn to which are so improbable that one does not believe them. It is one of the commonest things in the world in a criminal case to have the most positive oral evidence given on oath to establish a matter which neither the jury nor the Judge can believe although it is sworn to. In this case I cannot act upon this evidence. I do not know that it is necessary to say that I disbelieve the appellant and Mrs Gardner to such an extent that I should find them guilty of perjury, if I were upon a jury trying them on such a charge; but I disbelieve them to this extent,—I cannot believe their testimony so as to act upon it in this case, and I will proceed to state why:—

There is an extremely strong presumption, through the whole history of the case, that Mr Gardner, when he married a woman whom he knew to be with child, believed that he was the father of the child; that he knew that circumstances had occurred which might have made him the father of the child, and therefore believed it. That strong presumption, arising from his conduct, has to be explained away. The story which Mr and Mrs Gardner tell to explain it away is this,—that she whom he had been courting, and whom, according to his account of the matter, he had never ventured to take the least liberty with, came to him and told him she feared she was with child, and that some months before she had been assaulted by a blackguard upon the hill; that she had never mentioned it to anybody (that is what the statement amounts to in effect) up to this time, when she came to him and told him this story. It is a most startling thing for one's notions of human conduct that a betrothed bride should go and say this to her betrothed husband—that she should state this to him who was about to be her bridegroom, of all persons. She had female relatives and others to whom she could have told it. But if she did state it it is a startling story, which must have made an impression upon his mind. One would think he never could have forgotten what passed at that interview. He says upon hearing it he had the very romantic generosity that, in order to save her character entirely, he married her, believing her to be with child by this ruffian who had ravished her.

My Lords, I cannot say that I think that that is a story which one would believe without very strong evidence, and those who tell that story ought to tell it in such a manner as to produce a strong impression of their veracity. Is that so here? The appellant swears that, and Mrs Gardner swears that. Mrs Gardner said it in the first instance, as appears clearly by her own statements. Now, if she told him that story as she said she told it to him, she told him a direct and downright falsehood. There had been no rape or anything like a rape. It was not an unknown man who had assaulted her upon the hill, but her own brother's shepherd, whom she had appointed to meet her there. She was evidently a loose woman, and very likely therefore to have yielded to Mr Gardner if he had wished it. That is no imputation upon him, but it is upon her. It appears, then, that she told a falsehood when she told this story in the first instance to Mr Gardner, upon which, according to their account, he acted, and I think myself that that shakes her credit to such an extent that I can hardly act upon her evidence. I know how constantly it occurs when there is any question as to what women may have done in matters connected with their fame that they do tell falsehoods. There is no one who has ever tried a case of seduction, there is no one who has ever tried a case of criminal prosecution for rape, who can fail to be aware how in such cases there is a prodigious temptation to a woman to stretch the truth. Upon that ground alone I must say that I think I could not act upon Mrs Gardner's evidence.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

Mr Gardner's is a different story. Mrs Gardner admittedly has done the unnatural part of throwing off her own child in the way it was done; he, on the other hand, according to the story, has been rather generously sheltering her, and supporting until up to fifteen or sixteen years of age a child which was not his, and which he had at first reason to believe was produced by a man who had ravished the woman to whom he was engaged. But when he comes to tell his story even now the question is whether he gives it in such a way as to be believed. I think, as I said before, that if a man had received such a communication from his betrothed bride as is stated he never could to his dying day, or at least until he had got into his dotage, have failed to remember minutely every particular which had taken place. He comes now into Court to swear that she did tell him this, and he is cross-examined upon it, and I will ask your Lordships to observe how he meets the questions that are put to him. He says—"My age at that time was about forty-five or forty-six years. She did not at that time tell me who the father was. I asked her. (Q.) What answer did she make? (A.) That she had been waylaid by a blackguard on the hill and abused. I cannot tell whether she gave any description of the blackguard who had waylaid her. (Q.) You must try to recollect. Do your best to recollect the description Mrs Gardner gave you of the man who waylaid her. (A.) She said she had been waylaid by a blackguard on the hill and abused. I cannot say whether she described the man's personal appearance, or dress, in any way. (Q.) Did she tell you that he was a man muffled up in a plaid? (A.) I cannot answer that question? (Q.) Did she tell you that he was a poor labouring man. (A.) She called him a blackguard. (Question repeated)—(A.) She did not tell me, so far as I remember." Now, is it credible that a man should have that state of memory (there is no suggestion that he has got into his dotage) as to such a communication, if it was true. I must own I think he could not.

Then the cross-examination goes on in such a way as to shew what it is meant to be founded on, namely, an account which Mr Kay asserts that he had heard from Mary Gardner as being an account which she says her mother, Mrs Gardner, had given her in an interview she had with her. The Judges in the Court below, I observe, think it so improbable that Mrs Gardner should say anything of the sort to Mary at that time, or under those circumstances, that they disbelieve her having said anything of the kind. I must own, for my part, I think that what Mrs Gardner said when she saw Mary might have been, and probably was, utterly untrue,—might, in fact, have been a romance brought out at the moment. I do not see anything so very improbable in her telling her daughter Mary almost any story which came into her head at the time, and taking a pledge of secrecy from her about it, which is what Mary says she did. However, putting that aside, Mr Kay was told by Mary that Mrs Gardner had told her in confidence that the man who had assaulted her upon the hill was Mr Gardner himself. Mr Kay, having this in his mind, pressed Mr Gardner upon the story of his having assaulted her, and so on. It is upon that that he is pressed in cross-examination, and he describes the state of his memory as to this conversation which he had had with Mr Kay within a year or two, much more recent in date than the other. I do not think that the circumstances would impress it so strongly upon a man's mind as the other. I can more believe that he did not recollect what he had said to Mr Kay two or three years ago than that he did not recollect what his wife had told him before their marriage twenty-four years previously. After being pressed about it he is asked—"Do you recollect a meeting at which Mr Kay turned round to you and said that you and your wife gave different descriptions of the man—that the one said he was a gentleman and well dressed, and that the other said he was a poor labouring man? (A.) I never said that, and I could not say that he was a gentleman. I could not say whether he was a gentleman or not. What she said to me was that she had been met by a blackguard, and I concluded from that that he was some common individual. (Q.) The question I wish you to answer is this, whether on any occasion in Mr Kay's house he checked you and your wife for having given contradictory descriptions or different descriptions of the same person? (A.) I don't remember the conversation with Mr Kay. (Q.) Did any such thing occur, or do you not remember any conversation in which such a thing occurred. (A.) Yes; that is what I mean to say. (Q.) Did you tell Mr Kay that the man who was the father of this girl was out of the country a long way from here. (A.) Well, I can't remember. I don't remember what I may have said regarding the individual. (Q.) Then your mind is a perfect blank as to what you may have said to Mr Kay on that subject? (A.) I can't remember it. (Q.) Did you not admit to Mr Kay, in his house at Loanhead on the 24th March 1874, that you had tried to force your wife. Did you not say that you had once, at least, tried to force Mrs Gardner before your marriage? (A.) I did not say so, nor did I say anything to that effect; and I did not do it; nothing of the kind ever took place. (Q.) Did you ever hear that the man who had met Mrs Gardner on the hill had been muffled up with a plaid? (A.) I cannot say. (Q.) Did she tell you whether she had seen his face or not? (A.) I am sure I cannot say." Now, Mr Kay swears positively that having pressed Mr Gardner at that interview about the story which, according to Mary Gardner, Mrs Gardner had told her, Mr Gardner then admitted that on one occasion he had attacked his wife and attempted to have connection with her by force before marriage. Mr Gardner, it is true, denies that, and denies it in the way which I have read, but I really do not see why Mr Kay should be disbelieved upon that point. The story is a very curious and strange one altogether, but taking the way in which Mr Gardner answers the questions that are asked him (I cannot express it otherwise than as shuffling), and the extreme improbability of the story he tells, I cannot believe that the communication was made to him, and that he believed it in the way that he has said. I cannot believe that before he was married he was told and believed that his wife would be a pure person had she not been ravished by a man whom she met accidentally on the hill.

No. 7.

Gardner.

The question at once suggests itself, why should Mr Robert Gardner, the pursuer, enter into this conspiracy to send this child, whom he believed to be his own daughter, out of the way at the hotel, acting an unnatural part in so doing, and, having entered into it, now carry it on by swearing that which I must, in my view, consider false. I can only say that it is very strange. The motive does not seem to me sufficient; but there was a motive. He is, or was at the time, an elder in the church. That is a position in which the character of a man would suffer very much—as the character of a woman would suffer in England—by the supposition that he ever had illicit intercourse with a person of the other sex. That would afford a motive. I should not have thought that it would afford a sufficient motive, I confess, but I find that it is stated by Mr Kay and agreed in by Mr Gardner that he, in order to keep the secret, offered to give £1000,—no small sum—and that that £1000 was refused unless he accompanied it by an acknowledgment that Mary was legitimate. The offer was refused, and that circumstance was thought by both sides to be of importance. I certainly should not have expected that. That is one of the things they are all agreed upon, and therefore I believe that that must have been the case. I cannot see any reason why he should have offered this large sum and scrupled so much upon the legitimacy unless he thought the imputation upon his character would be extremely severe. It was not for the purpose of protecting his wife's character: that was gone. The very commencing of this process, the bringing out the whole story, shews at once that he could not have any scruples now about protecting his wife's character. The real ground must have been that he wished to protect his own character.

Besides the story he tells, and the story which Mr Kay tells, all agreeing in that, I find an immense confirmation of it in the letter which Mary Gardner writes on the 1st of July 1874. This offer of £1000 was made in March 1874, but it seems to have stood over. It is admitted that the question of legitimacy was the thing that was in the way; and on the 1st July 1874 the girl writes to him a letter which is full of ill spellings; there is scarcely a word in it that is not very ill spelt, shewing to my mind clearly that it was her own composition, and that she had no assistance when she wrote it. Here is what she writes:—
 “My dear father,—I received your note this morning. You say that you cannot submit longer to my doing so-and-so. I do not quite understand you, but if it was for me saying in my note that you did wrong in going to such a man as Laidlaw, I say again that you did more ill to yourself than to me. You say the time will come when I will be obliged to acknowledge Laidlaw as my father, but I say that that time will never come. You nor no man will ever forst me to say the thing I know to will to be falst. John Laidlaw is no more my father than he is yours. Do not think that money will tempt me; no, it is not your money I want; it is the truth, and it will come out, and that ere long. God cannot and will not let such a sin run on longer. However, be things as they may, I hold you as my father; you know you are that by all the laws in Braton.”
 That is the strongest confirmation of the story that is told by both Mr Kay and the girl, and Robert Gardner, that he had offered her £1000, and that it was refused upon the ground that he would not accompany it by an acknowledgment of her legitimacy. It is not what I should have anticipated as being likely, but it seems to have been the fact. Now, what, I ask, could have been his object in offering the £1000 unless it was that he thought the imputation upon his character, separated from his wife's, was a very serious one? And if he did think that, there is a motive for all the course of conduct which he pursued.

My Lords, I do not think it necessary to go further into the case. What I proceed upon is this: I think here there was a strong prima facie presumption of facts made out that this child was the child of the appellant, and I do not think that that is rebutted, for the reasons I have given. I do not think it is a case for the application of any technical rules as to what evidence is admissible.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

I do not think it is necessary to go so far as to hold that Mr and Mrs Gardner must have said that for which one could convict them of perjury, but I do go so far as to say that I cannot act upon their testimony.

LORD GORDON.—My Lords, there is no dispute as to the law applicable to this case, I think, in the Court below, or among any of your Lordships. Lord Gifford, whose judgment has been referred to, says that “the presumption arising from conception, or possible conception, during marriage, is a mere presumption, which may be rebutted and overcome by clear and satisfactory contrary evidence. The law of Scotland has never made or treated this strong presumption as a presumptio juris et de jure. It must yield to evidence, and I think the law of Scotland has always been that the presumption may be overcome, not only by evidence that it was physically impossible that the husband of the mother could be the father of the child, but by every species of moral evidence sufficient to satisfy a reasonable mind that the child was begotten by some else than the husband.”

The question, therefore, comes very much in the shape of an issue, to try whether Mary Gardner was the daughter of the appellant, and, while one may almost regret that the question has not been submitted to a jury, who might have seen the witnesses who gave their evidence, it is right that your Lordships should understand that the reason which, I presume, influenced the Court, was, that according to the old law, these matters were treated before the Judges, acting as a Consistorial Court, and that there was a mere right of appeal to the Court of Session. I have not looked into the Act of 1868 since the present question arose, but it does occur to me that under the Act of 1868 it might have been possible to have brought this question before a jury. At the same time, the Court would be influenced to a great extent by the consideration that it is not desirable that questions of this character should come before a jury, and thereby become the subject of publication and general discussion; therefore they have reserved such questions rather more for the consideration of the Court, as it has been done in this case.

Now, the question is this, whether there has been proof that satisfies the Court which has to dispose of the case that Mary Gardner is not the daughter of the appellant. Upon that point there is no doubt that there is a strong presumption in favour of the paternity, where the child is born after marriage between the parties. In this case there is no doubt whatever that Mary Gardner is the daughter of Mrs Gardner. That is admitted. The way in which it is attempted to be made out that she is not the daughter of Mr Gardner is that an account is given of an occurrence that took place at Cademuir Hill in 1849 or 1850, and it is said that Mrs Gardner was made the subject of a violent rape or attack upon her, and that this child was the result of that. My noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has stated, I think with very great clearness, that in such a case as this it is absolutely necessary that the statement which is placed before the Court, and attempted to be supported by evidence, should be of a very clear, distinct, and consistent character. Now, tested by that consideration, I cannot say that the statements which were made in the first instance by Mrs Gardner to Mr Gardner, or even those placed on the record, are of that character. I think that it is not possible to read Mrs Gardner's evidence, or Mr Gardner's evidence, so as to shew that there was a satisfactory account given to him of the occurrence to which I have referred. Then we come to this, that the case is attempted to be made out by statements and by evidence which are not consistent, and which are contradictory to one another, and that really it is not a reasonable statement or attempt to prove the case of the pursuer, and upon that ground I venture to think that your Lordships are quite right in coming to the conclusion which you have arrived at.

No. 7.

Gardner v.
Gardner.

I am sensible that very great care has been bestowed not only by the Court below, but by your Lordships, in the consideration of this very extraordinary case,—because it is extraordinary in this respect, that the husband and the wife concur in statements which tend to repudiate responsibility for this child. I venture to differ from my noble and learned friend who spoke last (Lord Blackburn) with reference to the perhaps rather strong terms in which he appeared to express himself as regards the import and effect of the evidence of these witnesses. As to Mr Gardner, I have an impression that he did conscientiously believe that Mrs Gardner had, upon the whole, made a disclosure to him of the position in which she was placed, although, looking back upon it afterwards, it does appear incredible to us. But I would rather place the case upon this, as the Court below have done, that this is a case in which the pursuer has failed to prove that he is not the father of Mary Gardner. The Judges below express hesitation. Lord Gifford, in particular, whose judgment has been quoted with such approval, both with reference to the statements in point of law, and also with reference to the evidence in the case, says that he looks upon it as a case of very great difficulty, and that he has arrived at the result after very great hesitation. His Lordship says,—“It is only with great hesitation, and after very anxious consideration, that I have come to concur in the opinion now expressed by all your Lordships.” But I think that, having regard to the very serious consideration it has received in the Court below, and before your Lordships, especially after the able pleadings which we have heard from both sides, your Lordships can have no hesitation whatever in approving of the judgment which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor.

Forrester v.
Warin and

(SEE Court of Session report in the present volume, 190.)

In this case Warin and Craven, sugar merchants in London, sued David Forrester, Glasgow, for damages for breach of contract in failing to take delivery in November 1874 of a quantity of sugar sold to him by the pursuers.

The defender pleaded (1) that the pursuers having failed to implement their part of the contract, he was not liable in damages; and (2) that if he was liable, the measure of his liability was the difference between the contract price and the price of sugar at the date when he refused to take delivery, and that he was not liable for the additional damage occasioned by the pursuers having delayed to resell the sugar till January 1875, when the market had fallen.

The First Division decided the first point against the defender, and the second in his favour.

The defender appealed.

The House, after hearing counsel for the appellant, affirmed the judgment.

In this case appeals were taken to the House of Lords by Sir John Richardson and by Mrs Fleming.

The House affirmed the unanimous judgment of the First Division.

The law Peers did not find it necessary to decide between the alternative views of the Lord President and Lord Ardmillan on the one hand, and Lord Deas and Lord Mure on the other, upon the only point in which there was a difference of opinion in the Inner-House, and in other respects adopted the same grounds of judgment.

Church—Allocation of Area—Excambion—Quoad Sacra Parish.—Where the original parish church, in a parish from which a part had been disjoined and erected into a parish quoad sacra, was excambied for a new church voluntarily erected by one of the heritors, held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that in the absence of stipulation in the contract of excambion the sittings fell to be allocated as in the old church.

This was an appeal at the instance of the Duke of Roxburghe and others against a judgment pronounced on 1st June 1876 by the First Division, with three Judges of the Second Division, by which (diss. Lord Deas and Lord Mure) they affirmed a judgment of the Sheriff (Pattison) of Roxburghshire.

No party appeared to oppose the appeal.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the question in this appeal is as to the propriety of two interlocutors, dated the 30th of April 1875 and the 2d of June 1876. By the second of these interlocutors the First Division of the Court of Session affirmed the former interlocutor which had been made by the Sheriff, and by this former interlocutor the Sheriff had found that in the division and apportionment of the area and sittings of the new parish church of Jedburgh the heritors of certain lands disjoined from that parish and erected into the parish of Edgerston quoad sacra were not to be considered as heritors of the parish of Jedburgh.

Until about the year 1874 the parish church of Jedburgh was in the old abbey of Jedburgh. In this old church the area and sittings had been divided and apportioned, many years before 1855, between the heritors of the parish of Jedburgh and the provost and magistrates of Jedburgh. In 1855 part of the lands of the parish of Jedburgh were disjoined and erected quoad sacra into the parish of Edgerston, but no alteration or re-arrangement of the division and apportionment of the area and sittings being at that time made, or being competent, the church continued to be, as it had been before, the property of the heritors according to the former division, a property which they, of course, held for the benefit of the parishioners. No. 10.

Up to a certain point there does not appear to be any difference of opinion between the learned Judges of the Court of Session. The Judges agreed that if a new church had become necessary, and had been built at the expense of whatever heritors were liable to build it, any heritor would have been entitled to apply to the Sheriff to have the area of the new church divided among whatever heritors had at the time by law the right to that area. On the other hand, the learned Judges appear to agree that if the nature of the work done was merely an extension of the old church, or repairs of the old church, there would not be this right to a division or apportionment de novo; and they further appear to agree that if one church were to be exchanged for another church then already built, a thing which must in practice be of rare occurrence, the area of the church taken in exchange would fall to be divided in the same way as the area of the church given in exchange had been divided and enjoyed. It is necessary to consider with some accuracy the facts of this case, with a view to determine the precise character of what was done as to the old Jedburgh church.

June 29, 1877.
Duke of Roxburghe

v. Millar.

In the year 1868 the church wanted repairs; various estimates were given as to these repairs, beginning with the sum of £900, which was said to be sufficient to repair the church without increasing the number of sittings, and rising to £4500, as sittings might be increased or other work done. In this state of things the late Marquis of Lothian, the owner of Jedburgh Abbey, and of the property on which it stood, and himself one of the heritors of the parish, entered into an agreement with the heritors, with the consent of the presbytery, to build a parish church for the parish, on a site to be acquired by him to the satisfaction of the heritors and of the presbytery, and to enter into a contract of excambion by which Lord Lothian should convey to the heritors the new church, to be held as the parish church of Jedburgh, and the heritors should convey to Lord Lothian the old parish church and the materials of it.

This agreement was carried into execution. The plans of the church were approved, the ground was procured, and the church was built, and a deed, termed a contract of excambion, was executed between the present Lord Lothian, as the successor of his father, and the committee of the heritors of the parish. It is quite clear that this committee was appointed by and represented all the heritors of the parish of Jedburgh, as well those whose lands were disjoined quoad sacra as those whose lands were not so disjoined. The deed is dated the 25th of November 1874; by it Lord Lothian conveys to himself, and the committee of heritors, as trustees for the heritors of the parish, the new church and the ground on which it was erected, and in consideration thereof the committee of the heritors, as representing all the heritors, convey to Lord Lothian the old parish church and the materials, with liberty to remove the materials; preserving, however, the abbey as a ruin, and giving access to the public, and undertaking not to apply it to any ecclesiastical purpose.

It appears to me that this transaction is neither more nor less than a substitution, to all intents and purposes, by Lord Lothian, with the consent of the heritors, of the new church in the place of and in exchange for the old, and that the transaction and its effect is correctly described in the resolution of the committee of heritors passed on the 22d of December following the date of the last deed, which was in these words—"The meeting, after hearing Mr Millar's report as to Sheriff Pattison's difficulties regarding the apportionment of sittings in the new church to the portion of Jedburgh parish attached to Edgerston quoad sacra church, are unanimously of opinion that the excambion would not be carried out as originally intended if that portion of the parish be not allowed sittings in the new parish church in the same manner as in the church in the abbey."

It is an unfortunate circumstance that in this appeal your Lordships have not had the assistance of the argument of any respondent. The judgment of the Sheriff does not appear to have been pronounced on the application of any heritors having an interest to exclude the appellants, and before the Court of Session no heritors appeared to support the judgment of the Sheriff. At the same time, a question of very great and general interest appears to have been raised in the Court below, namely, whether heritors who are the owners of lands disjoined quoad sacra continue liable to rebuild the parish church of their original parish? The Sheriff appears to have held that the heritors of disjoined lands would be no longer liable to rebuild the old parish church. The Lord President, Lord Neaves, Lord Ormisdale, and Lord Gifford treat this point as one which it is unnecessary to decide. Lord Deas considers that the heritors of disjoined lands would continue liable. Lord Deas and Lord Mure, however, considered that in this case there was no ground for a new division and apportionment, inasmuch as Lord Lothian had merely substituted a new church, to be held in all respects in statu quo ante of the old parish church. As Lord Deas says, the question, what would have been the respective liabilities and rights of parties if a new church had required to be erected at the expense of the heritors, did not and could not arise.

My Lords, I concur in the opinion of Lord Deas and Lord Mure. Whenever a case arises of a new parish church being built by assessment in a parish where a part of the lands have been disjoined quoad sacra, it will have to be decided among what heritors the area is to be divided, and the Court will, in that case, have the advantage of knowing, in the first place, that which cannot be immaterial, upon what heritors the assessment for the new church has fallen. That question, in my opinion, does not arise in the present case.

On the whole, I have to advise your Lordships that the interlocutors should be reversed so far as appealed against, and that this House should declare that after setting aside seats for the minister and elders and for the beadle and the poor, the division and apportionment of the seats in the parish church of Jedburgh recently erected ought, so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, to follow and be regulated by the division and apportionment thereof in the former parish church, for which the new parish church was substituted by way of exchange.

LORD HATHERLEY concurred.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, in this case we have not the guidance of any authority in the Scottish law. The very learned and elaborate argument of the Lord Advocate failed to furnish any. Neither have we any proved practice in the legal or ecclesiastical arrangements of Scotland which we might follow safely. The circumstances with which we have to deal are peculiar and abnormal, so far as your Lordships are informed, and do not seem to have antecedents in the past on which to found an authoritative usage. Nor, finally, is there anything in the documents which can be vouched to determine the novel point arising now apparently for the first time. The parties to this exchange did not anticipate the difficulty, and failed to provide for it, as they might have done, by using express words, and we can only gather from their general relations to each other, and the facts out of which the excambion grew, the purposes which they entertained, and the rights they meant to establish. In this state of things the embarrassment of decision is increased by the conflicting judgments of the learned Judges of the Court of Session.

Looking, however, to the reasoning on behalf of the appellants, which unfortunately is here, as it was in the Court below, ex parte, and ascertaining as well as I can the intentions of the parties from the terms of the instrument of the excambion, I have reached the conclusion that the views adopted by Lord Deas and Lord Mure are entitled to the approval of your Lordships.

The parishioners of Jedburgh accepted the offer of Lord Lothian, and agreed to abandon to him the ancient church, then needing repairs, which they were bound to make, and to receive in lieu of it another as commodious for the purpose of public worship, and subject to no necessity of burdening the parish with outlay of any kind. There is nothing in the transaction or the documents which explain it indicating that the new church was not to be to all intents and purposes a substitute for the old, or that any rights which had attached to the seat-holders in the latter should not equally belong to them when the substitution took place. Such rights the appellants unquestionably had. They were ancient rights, and were established, some of them personal and some of them held in trust. They agreed to the excambion, which they might have resisted, but there is no pretence of proof that they ever thought of compromising those rights, or consented to anything beyond the exercise of them in another building at another place. How can we impose a condition which was unknown when the bargain was made? If on the day when Lord Lothian got possession the appellants were entitled to sittings, how did they lose their title to equivalent accommodation in the substituted church? Or how did the accident of their interest in the quoad sacra parish work a forfeiture to their claim to privileges legally vested in them and never surrendered? There was no abandonment of those privileges by contract, and we have heard of no law which would destroy them in invitum.

This is substantially, I think, the view of the dissentient Judges of the Court of Session. It commends itself to me as most in accordance with such evidence as is before us, and with such light as we can gain from an ex parte discussion, as well as with the reason of the thing. I am glad to know that it has the assent of one of my noble and learned friends who has had the opportunity of forming a closer acquaintance with Scotch law and practice than can belong to the majority of your Lordships. His very satisfactory opinion I have had the opportunity of perusing, and it dispenses with further details of the reasons on which it is sustained.

I concur in thinking that it would be inconvenient and hazardous to express an opinion on points not essential to be determined in this case, in which we have only heard a one-sided argument, and I therefore advisedly abstain from offering any opinion as to the principles on which sittings should be allocated to individual heritors in Scottish churches, or as to the extent and nature of their interests in those sittings; or as to their continuing liabilities when their properties or parts of their properties may be brought within the bounds of a quoad sacra parish. These may be important public questions, and should be decided on contentious discussions and full consideration, which they would not receive from your Lordships in this case. I am of opinion, with great deference to the majority of the Court of Session, and such hesitation as must be suggested by their great authority and by the nature of the ex parte argument before your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court of Session should be reversed.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, it seems to me that it is not desirable to decide in this, an ex parte appeal, more than is absolutely necessary; and I take a view of the effect of the excambion which renders it unnecessary to express any opinion on the other points discussed in the Court below.

I take it that the rights and duties of the heritors of a parish in Scotland are not the same with reference to an old parish church repaired and with reference to a new parish church erected de novo. The 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, sec. 33, enacts that parochial assessments are in future to be made on the real rent, “provided always that when the area of any parish church heretofore erected has been allocated among the heritors according to their respective valued rents as appearing upon the present valuation-rolls all assessments for the repair thereof shall be imposed according to such valued rent.” This enactment seems to me to imply that the old allocation shall continue so long as the church is merely repaired. If the church was destroyed by fire, or otherwise it became the duty of the heritors to provide a new one, the assessment would be according to the real rent, and a new allocation would seem to be just; whether it would be required by law or not I do not say. In the present case the old parish church of Jedburgh was not in such a state as to make it necessary to do more than repair it; and consequently, if the heritors had proceeded to do all that they were bound to do and no more, no new allocation would have been required, except in so far as any changes in the arrangement of the church would render it requisite to have a new arrangement as to the way in which the old possessory rights should in future be enjoyed.

I do not think it necessary to form an opinion on the question whether, on the severance of a part of the old parish quoad sacra, without any alteration in the fabric of the old parish church, it would have been competent to anyone to require a new allocation. If that could be done at all it would seem that it could not be done by such a proceeding as the present, under which it was only competent to regulate the possessory rights, not take away those existing. If, in the supposed case of the old parish church being repaired, those heritors whose lands lie exclusively in the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston had wished to raise the question whether they were liable to repairs of the old parish church, they must necessarily have given up their claim to the old allocation, but if they were either compelled by law, or without suit were willing, to pay their share of the assessment to the repairs, I see no reason why they should not do so and keep their old allocation.

The very special circumstances of this case seem to me to raise the question whether the new church erected by the Marquis of Lothian is to be considered as given by him in lieu of the old church such as the heritors were bound to make it, i.e., thoroughly repaired, and subject to all parties continuing to possess rights equivalent to those which they had possessed under the old allocation, or whether the new church is to be considered as given in lieu of a new church, which the heritors were not bound to erect, but which, if they had erected it, would probably have been subject to a new allocation, in which latter case the novel and important points discussed in the Court below and at the bar must be decided. No. 10.

Lord Deas in the Court below dissents partly on the effect of the excambion. Lord Mure bases his dissent from the judgment below exclusively on the effect of the excambion. June 29, 1877.
Duke of Roxburghe
v. Millar.

The majority of the Court below have not bestowed so much attention on this point as I think it deserves. They seem to have thought that as there could be no doubt that what Lord Lothian built was a new church, it followed necessarily that everything was to be the same as in the case of a new church built by the heritors, and that the special circumstances made no difference—that, in short, in legal effect Lord Lothian is necessarily to be taken as building a new church as agent for the heritors.

This, I think, does not follow in point of law. Lord Lothian and the heritors might, with the assent of the Presbytery, have agreed that the new church should be occupied as the old one was, or they might have agreed that there should be a new allocation, and if they had by apt words expressed either intention in the excambion I see no reason why that intention should not have effect.

Unluckily it appears not to have occurred to anyone that any such question could arise till the meeting of the heritors on the 22d December 1874, and the excambion which had been executed in November 1874 contains no express provision on the subject, all that is said being that the new church was “to be held as the parish church of Jedburgh in all time thereafter,” which is quite consistent with either the old allocation being applied to the new church or a new allocation being made.

But on looking at the extraneous facts I think it sufficiently appears that the new church was to be given in lieu of the old church as it then was, or at most in lieu of what it would be when repaired, which would be subject to the old allocation, and not as a new church built by the heritors, who, as far as appears, had no intention voluntarily to incur the heavy expense of building a new church, which they were not bound in law to do. The reports of the architects are made entirely with reference to repairing the old church, not as to building a new one. And the Presbytery, on the 6th October 1868, in giving their assent to the proposed scheme, stipulate that the size of the new church should be such as to contain a number of sittings not less than those contained in the present church, which the Presbytery understand to be 1200. This was a very proper stipulation if the church was to be considered as in lieu of the repaired church. They make no reference whatever to the number of the inhabitants of the parish, which would have been the proper subject for consideration if a church was to be erected de novo; and in fact it appears that, whether the inhabitants of the portion of the parish now disjoined quoad sacra be included or excluded in reckoning the examinable inhabitants, the number for which accommodation ought, according to the usual rule, to have been provided for, if it were a church erected de novo, considerably exceeds 1200.

It is useless to look for authorities on this question. Such liberality as Lord Lothian's is rare, and no question such as this has ever risen before. It must be decided as a case of the first impression; and with every respect for the able Judges who formed the majority in the Court of Session I think they have not given sufficient attention to the special circumstances of this case.

I prefer to say nothing on the general question, as it is unnecessary for the

No. 10. decision of the case ; and the above view of the effect of the excambion is sufficient to justify a reversal of the decision of the Court below and the declaration and judgment proposed.

June 29, 1877.
Duke of Roxburghe
v. Millar.

LORD GORDON.—My Lords, the appellants in this appeal are the Duke of Roxburghe, the Marquis of Lothian, the Countess of Home (who, I regret to say, has died since the cause was heard, but her husband, the Earl of Home, was also a party, for his interest, and may still be held to represent the interests of the deceased Countess in virtue of his right of courtesy), and Mr Rutherford of Edgerston, who are designed as being “all heritors of the parish of Jedburgh.”

The circumstances out of which the appeal arises are these :—In the year 1855 a portion of the parish of Jedburgh along with portions of other adjoining parishes were disjoined quoad sacra from their respective parishes, and erected into a parish quoad sacra under the provisions of an Act passed in 1844 (7th and 8th Victoria, chapter 44), which received the name of Edgerston. All the present appellants are proprietors of lands in this disjoined portion of the parish of Jedburgh so erected into the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston ; but the appellants, the Marquis of Lothian and the Countess of Home, are also proprietors of other lands in the parish of Jedburgh which were not disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh.

For many years down to the year 1874 the parish church of Jedburgh consisted of a portion of the old abbey of Jedburgh. Sittings in the church were about eighty years ago allocated to the then heritors of that parish, and amongst others to the predecessors of the present appellants. There seems to be no doubt that the allocation then made was in all respects regular, and that the predecessors of the appellants were legally entitled to the sittings which were allocated to them. These sittings were retained and were possessed by the appellants and their predecessors as pertinents of their several properties down to the time when the old parish church was excambed for the new church, to be immediately referred to.

In the year 1868 it was found that the old church of Jedburgh required very considerable repairs, and the heritors obtained a report on the subject by architects, with a view to having the necessary repairs executed. It is of some importance to observe that the heritors did not then contemplate the erection of a new church, but only the repair of the existing one. The abbey of Jedburgh, in so far as not occupied as the parish church, belonged to the late Marquis of Lothian, and it occurred to his Lordship that it would be desirable to remove the old parish church, which in its then state interfered with the beauty of the ruins of the abbey, and he proposed to the heritors that if they would convey to him the old church and all their rights therein he would erect a new church on another site, and convey it to the heritors in lieu of the old one. This proposal was acceded to by the heritors of Jedburgh, with consent of the Presbytery of the bounds as the ecclesiastical guardians of the parish, and was carried into effect. The then Marquis of Lothian died a few years after, but his successor, the present Marquis, erected at his own cost a suitable new church, and thereupon a contract of excambion was entered into, by which his Lordship, on the one hand, conveyed to the heritors the new church, and, on the other hand, “in consideration” thereof the heritors conveyed to the Marquis the old church and all their rights therein. The contract of excambion is before the House, but I do not consider it necessary to read it in detail to your Lordships.

The heritors having thus acquired the new church, which, as already explained, was not built at their expense, took into consideration the allocation of the sittings therein amongst those entitled thereto. It does not appear to have been necessary that judicial proceedings should have been instituted for that purpose. The sittings in the old church had been allocated by voluntary arrangement among the heritors and others entitled to sittings in the year 1793; and in 1834 there was in like manner, by voluntary arrangement, a partial rearrangement of the sittings, and it was quite competent to allocate sittings in the new church acquired by the excambion by the same means. But instead of proceeding in this manner the heritors presented a petition to the Sheriff of the county, praying him to proceed with the division of the area or seating of the church amongst the heritors of the parish in terms of law.

The petition, as being a proceeding for the regulation of possessory rights, was undoubtedly competent. But I think that the Sheriff had not power under it to deprive those who had legal possession of sittings in the old church of any share in the allocation of sittings in the new. I think the two cases of Smith and The Magistrates of Hamilton, referred to by the Sheriff in the note to his interlocutor, shew that, as Mr Duncan expresses it in his work on Parochial Law, p. 222—"When the result of a division, if made, would be to invert a long-continued adverse possession, the action should not be brought in a summary form, as by petition." Then the proper form in which to investigate and determine an adverse claim, and the right of adverse possession, is not by way of petition to the Sheriff, but of summons, it may be of declarator simply, or of reduction and declarator combined. In Smith v. Crawford, 22d June, 1826, 4 Shaw, 738, the Lord Ordinary (Lord Eldin) held "that the application to the Sheriff to invert the possession, after the long possession that had followed on the division of the church, was incompetent," and this judgment was confirmed by the Inner-House. And in the case of The Magistrates of Hamilton, 23d June 1846, 8 Dunlop, 844 (18 Scot. Jur. 456) Lord Medwyn said (p. 854) that the long possession of a gallery by the magistrates "gave them a right to occupy this position in the present church till at least they are dispossessed by a much more formal process than a petition to the Sheriff to divide the area of the existing church on account of its being new seated."

In the course of the proceedings before the Sheriff in the present case a question was raised, whether those heritors whose lands were disjoined quoad sacra from the parish of Jedburgh, and now formed part of the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston, were entitled in the division to a proportion of the area of the church and sittings corresponding to the valuation of the lands so disjoined from Jedburgh and forming part of the quoad sacra parish. The Sheriff held "that in so far as regards the dividing and apportioning of the areas and seatings of the new parish church of Jedburgh recently erected the heritors of the lands so disjoined and erected into the parish of Edgerston quoad sacra are not to be considered as heritors of the parish of Jedburgh," and that the sittings "fall to be allocated and divided among the other heritors of the parish (excluding as aforesaid) according to their valuations as appearing in the valuation-rolls." The Court of Session affirmed the Sheriff's judgment, and your Lordships are now called on to decide whether the Sheriff and the Court of Session were right in the judgments so pronounced.

There seems to have been much discussion before the Sheriff and in the Court of Session, and there was also a learned argument before your Lordships' House, on the general question whether heritors in the position of the appellants, who were proprietors of lands which had been disjoined quoad sacra from one parish and erected into a parish quoad sacra, remained liable for the expense of repairing or re-erecting the parish church of the original parish, and were entitled to a proportion of the sittings therein? But it occurs to me that the decision of this question is not necessary to the decision of the point before your Lordships; and further, that in an ex parte case such as the present (for as such the cause was treated by the Court of Session and also at your Lordships' bar, there being no party at your Lordships' bar to resist the appeal), it would not be right to decide a question of so much importance. I therefore suggest that it is not advisable to express any opinion whatever on that question.

I may, however, remark that the judgment of the Sheriff was founded upon the decision of the case of Drummond v. The Heritors of Monzie, Moneidie, Crieff, and Others, in 1773 (Morison's Dictionary, p. 7920), in which the Sheriff held it to have been decided "that the heritors of lands annexed quoad sacra are not liable to contribute for upholding the fabric of the parish kirks from which they are disjoined." But the Judges of the Court of Session, who had carefully examined the proceedings in that case, were of opinion that it was not properly reported, and was inapplicable as an authority in the present case.

There was another point discussed at the bar of your Lordships' House, viz., that on which the Lord President and some of the other Judges in the Court below rest their opinions. His Lordship held that the allocation to heritors of sittings in a parish church is not an allocation for their own behoof, but merely in trust for behoof of the parishioners residing on their respective estates; that these parishioners have themselves no civil right to such sittings, but are only entitled to the use of the parish church for the purposes of worship and administration of ordinances, these rights, in his Lordship's view, being merely inter sacra; and his Lordship holds that where, as in the present case, lands have been disjoined from one parish and erected quoad sacra into another, the persons residing on these disjoined lands lose all their rights in the original parish church, and have no right to church accommodation except in the church of the parish to which they have been annexed; and that therefore, there being no persons in the disjoined portions to be benefited by an allocation of sittings, the heritors thereof are not entitled to participate in the division.

But, my Lords, the opinion so expressed by the Lord President was strongly controverted by the appellants' counsel, and it was contended that the principle was that sittings in parish churches were allocated to heritors not merely for behoof of those resident on their respective properties, but also for behoof of the parishioners generally, who were entitled to the use of any sittings which might not be required for those resident on the properties of the heritors to whom the sittings were allocated.

My Lords, the point so raised is one of considerable difficulty as well as of importance. I think if it had been raised in a competent process with reference to the allocation of sittings in a new church where subsisting rights were not interfered with, it would have been very fit to be considered and decided. But, my Lords, I am inclined to think that the point cannot be competently raised here, to the effect at all events of depriving heritors of their sittings which they have legally held for a long series of years, and I think that the question cannot be held to have been very satisfactorily raised, considering that it has only been discussed ex parte. I am further of opinion that its decision is not necessary to the disposal of the question before the House, which, in my view, is one only relating to the mere regulation of the existing possessory rights of the heritors. I therefore avoid expressing any opinion on the points so ably dealt with by the Lord President and some of the other Judges.

No. 10.

June 29, 1877.
Duke of Roxburghe
v. Millar.

I may state that I do not consider that your Lordships' judgment in the case of Hutton v. Harper, March 9, 1876 (L. R., 1 Ap. Ca. 464), decided last year (ante, vol. iii. H. L. 9) affects the question raised in the present appeal. In that case the point raised was one relating to the proclamation of banns, which was considered by the Court below, and also by your Lordships, to be a proceeding or right purely inter sacra, and not affecting civil rights.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that as, at the time when the old church was excambied for the new they were in the occupation of sittings in the parish church of Jedburgh, and as their possession of these sittings was to be ascribed to an undoubted legal title, their right to sittings must be regarded according to the fair and legal import and effect of the contract of excambion. I think this contention is entitled to great weight, and that it affords sufficient grounds for the decision of the question before the House.

I think the question must be decided now in the same way as it would have been if it had arisen with reference to a re-allocation of sittings in the old parish church of Jedburgh, if that had been necessary in consequence of the reseating or repair of the church. The appellants were legally possessed of sittings in the old church, which they retained for twenty years after the erection of the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston, and which, I think, they would have been entitled to retain in the old church, and if a re-allocation had become necessary I think they would have been entitled to participate in it in proportion to the sittings they originally held. I think it makes no difference in their rights that the subject of allocation is not the old parish church but the new. The new church was given and accepted in exchange for and in lieu of the old, and the rights of the heritors in the new must, in my opinion, be dealt with in the same way as they would have been if a question had arisen in regard to the old church.

It is stated by the late Mr Dunlop in his work on Parochial Law, p. 43, that "if a certain state of possession have subsisted for a long period, although there be no evidence of a regular division, such will be presumed to have taken place, and the Court will not sanction any alteration notwithstanding a change of circumstances in regard to the property of the parish." And he refers to several cases in which it has been decided that possession of sittings in a church gave the possessors a right on a re-allocation to equivalent accommodation.

It was so held in the case of Smith, before referred to, and in the case of The Magistrates of Hamilton the point was very fully considered. The question there occurred with reference to a gallery which the magistrates had occupied for more than a century under an agreement with the Duke of Hamilton. The heritors contended that the magistrates did not possess an absolute and exclusive right of property in the gallery, and that, on the contrary, any use they had had did not flow from any right of property, but was merely ex gratia of the Hamilton family, of whose portion of the area of the church the gallery formed a part. But the Court held that the corporation could not be dispossessed of their gallery. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) said—"If they got the gallery in this church simply by agreement with the Duke of Hamilton in 1734, still that was by an agreement made known to all, and in lieu of the seats they had in the old church ; and after possession for more than a century I am of opinion that they are entitled to maintain their seats even after such repairs as had been made, and which might give rise to a division of the rest of the area that had been so materially altered." Lords Medwyn and Cockburn expressed views to the like effect ; while Lord Moncreiff, though differing from their Lordships in the result at which they arrived, stated,—“ Where a new division becomes necessary, if specific legal rights had been previously established in individuals or corporations, these will be duly regarded and preserved in the division.”

I so entirely concur in the opinions expressed by Lords Deas and Mure in the present case in regard to this matter that I take the liberty of quoting a few sentences. Lord Deas in his opinion says—“ The one church has been excambied for the other, and the natural result of that excambion appears to me to be, that the parties who were previously in possession of the one should now be entitled to possession of the other. The case is not varied by the fact that the Marquis had to build a church to be conveyed by the excambion in place of being possessed of an existing church suitable to be so conveyed. It is still a case of excambion of one church for another, and nothing can be more expressive of the nature of the transaction than the word excambion itself, which is both the legal and the conventional name of the contract.” His Lordship goes on to say that “ there would necessarily be a change of arrangement rendering judicial regulation necessary, but for this the Sheriff was just as competent where the question arose upon a contract of excambion as if it had arisen in any other way. . . . I think what he should have done was simply to have regarded the new area as substituted for the old, allocating it as nearly as might be as the parties themselves had previously and immemorially allocated it, and making no further changes than the different arrangement of the seats rendered necessary. There was no expense to be allocated either for building or for repairs. All that fell to be done was to modify and regulate the possession so as to give effect to the contract of excambion.”

And Lord Mure, in concurring in the opinion of Lord Deas, says—“ Although there does not seem to have been any express stipulation in the proceedings relative to the excambion, to the effect that the appellants were to have right to seats in the new church, I think that this may be held to be implied in the transaction, because the nature of that transaction as disclosed in the deed of excambion appears to me to be that when the old church was exchanged for the new the latter was to be conveyed to the whole heritors of Jedburgh, including the appellants, as a surrogatum for their right to the old church, which was conveyed by them to Lord Lothian, and that they were thus to acquire in the new church rights equivalent to those which they had in the old. There is nothing in the proceedings to shew that these appellants abandoned or ever intended to abandon their right to sittings in the new church corresponding to those which they held in the old one. And the circumstance that they may be in one view no longer heritors in the parish of Jedburgh is not, I conceive, of itself conclusive against their right to claim sittings in the new church.”

My Lords, entertaining these views, I concur in the judgment which has been moved by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

INTERLOCUTORS, in so far as complained of, reversed, with a declaration “ that, after setting aside seats for the minister and elders, and for the beadle and the poor, the division and apportionment of the seats in the parish church at Jedburgh, recently erected, ought, so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, to follow and be regulated by the division and apportionment thereof in the former parish church, for which the new parish church was substituted by way of exchange," and cause remitted.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said there was no doubt that in receiving in evidence the statements of deceased persons the law of Scotland admitted greater latitude than the law of England, but in the present instance there was a unanimous judgment of the Court in Scotland as to such evidence in the particular circumstances of this case being inadmissible. Even if it were to be assumed that the deal persons were acquaintances of one George Ross it did not follow that an acquaintance should have any special knowledge of the family relationships of George Ross, or that everything that that acquaintance chose to say was to be treated as evidence of those relationships. The judgment of the Court below was quite right, and ought to be affirmed.

Statute—Edinburgh Street Tramways Acts, 1871 and 1874, 34 and 35 Vict. cap. lxxxix. sec. 44, and 37 and 38 Vict. cap. lxxviii. sec. 4.—A tramway company was bound by an agreement, embodied in its Act of incorporation, not to charge passengers more than 1d. per mile or fraction of a mile (the minimum charge for each passenger being 2d.) They afterwards obtained an Act by which they were relieved of their obligation to lay certain lines, and were allowed instead to run omnibuses over these routes. This Act allowed them to charge "a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on omnibus routes and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the second Act did not alter the rates chargeable for tramway passengers who did not use the omnibus routes.

The tramway company having appealed, the House of Lords, after hearing counsel for the appellants, affirmed the judgment, the Lord Chancellor observing that he had seldom seen a more unfounded action, and had certainly never seen a more unfounded appeal.

WILLIAM THOMSON AND ANOTHER, (Respondents) Respondents.—Benjamin, Q.C.—Everitt.

Patent—Disclaimer.—When a patentee alters his patent by a disclaimer he cannot thereafter enforce an interdict which he had obtained upon the patent before the alteration, as the amended patent may be liable to objections which did not apply to the former patent, and what would have been an infringement of the old might not be of the new.

Patent—Infringement.—The patentee of a tool for expanding the ends of boiler tubes in the flue sheet claimed in his specification “the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, viz. the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instruments, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth.” The expanding instrument was described as “a tapering plug, or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube. A manufacturer invented a new tool in which the rollers, being themselves tapered, were fixed at an angle with the axis of the tool, converging towards a point, so as to make the whole tool of a conical shape, and expansion was effected by screwing the tool into the tube, without any expanding instrument or divergence of the rollers. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that there was no infringement.

Jurisdiction—Prorogated Jurisdiction.—In an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Session which decided a question of alleged infringement of patent, the House of Lords, while holding that the proceedings in the Court below were irregular and did not competently raise the question, at the request of parties decided the question of the alleged infringement.

In 1873 Richard Dudgeon, the holder of a patent for “improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes,” presented a petition for interdict against William Thomson infringing the patent by using the improvements described in the specification filed on 30th August 1866, (quoted 11 Macph. p. 864.) The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) granted the interdict, and on 4th July 1873 the First Division adhered.

On 28th May 1875 Dudgeon filed a disclaimer and memorandum of alteration of his specification—(quoted in Court of Session report in present vol., p. 257, note.)

On 30th November 1875 Mr Dudgeon brought a note of suspension and interdict against William Thomson and Company infringing the patent. The petitioner alleged that William Thomson was the sole partner of the firm.

The First Division, on 17th March 1876, sisted the process to give the complainer an opportunity of presenting a petition and complaint for breach of the previous interdict granted by the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie dated 31st January 1873, adhered to on 4th July 1873, which the Court held to be the proper remedy (ante, vol. iii. p. 604.)

Mr Dudgeon then, with consent of the Lord Advocate, presented a petition and complaint for breach of the said interdict against William Thomson and Benjamin Donaldson, whom Thomson had assumed as a partner.

After a proof the First Division, on 22d December 1876, found that there had been no infringement of the patent since the date of the interdict (Court of Session report in present vol., p. 256.)

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The appellant at your Lordships’ bar is the owner of a patent which was dated in the month of March 1866, and the original specification of that patent was modified very largely by a disclaimer and memorandum No. 13. of alteration dated in the month of May 1875. But, my Lords, during this interval of nine years, between the date of the original patent and the date of the disclaimer, proceedings had been taken by the appellant against one of the present respondents in the Court of Session in Scotland, and the result of those proceedings, founded as they were upon the patent as originally specified, was that an interlocutor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary and affirmed by the Court of Session against that respondent.

July 10, 1877.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

My Lords, that interlocutor followed the terms of the conclusion of the summons. The Lord Ordinary sustained the reasons of suspension, and suspended and interdicted in the terms of the note of suspension and interdict. That was on 31st January 1873. Now, the terms of the note of suspension and interdict were these: It prayed that the respondent should be interdicted, in particular, from "making, vending, or using in whole or in part the improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes described in the specification filed on 30th August 1866, in pursuance of the proviso" in the letters-patent, "and, in particular, from making, vending, or using any apparatus for expanding boiler tubes constructed or used in the manner described in the said specification or in manner substantially the same, and from infringing the said letters-patent in any other manner of way." My Lords, that, as I have stated, was in the year 1873. Then came the disclaimer and alteration of the specification in May 1875, and with regard to the particulars of that disclaimer and alteration at present it is not necessary to say more than this, that the disclaimer and alteration modified very largely the original specification, and modified it in matters which were closely connected with, and, indeed, were inseparable from that which is the subject of the present contest at your Lordships' bar.

After the disclaimer and alteration of 1875, Mr Dudgeon, the appellant, considered that his patent was being infringed by the two respondents together, and he applied to the Court of Session upon that subject. In the first instance he appears to have commenced a fresh action against the respondents, but after some time that action was sisted; and, apparently encouraged or recommended by the Court, he proceeded against the respondents, not in the fresh action, but by way of an application to enforce the interdict which had been granted in the former action, and, accordingly, that application came before the Court and was refused upon the merits.

Before I pass to what I shall afterwards consider as the merits of the case I must point out to your Lordships that, according to my judgment, nothing could be imagined more irregular, more contrary to what is the true character of proceedings under a patent and against an alleged infringer, than that which has taken place in the Court below in the present case. According to the statute (15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, sec. 39) after a disclaimer and memorandum of alteration has been filed in the case of a patent, unless the law officer has specially granted permission, no action can be brought by the patentee upon the score of an infringement committed before the disclaimer; but what is here done is what would be still more contrary to natural justice than would be an action for an infringement before a disclaimer. The patentee before his disclaimer had obtained an interdict from the Court. Of course before that interdict could be granted by the Court the person alleged to have infringed had an opportunity of defending himself against the interdict upon every ground of defence which is ordinarily open against a patentee. He had a right of contending, and apparently he did

No. 13. contend, that the patent was invalid by reason that it was not properly specified. He might have contended that it was invalid by reason that the invention was not new or that the invention was not useful. It would not be and could not be until after all these defences were determined against the alleged infringer that the Court could go on and consider the question of fact whether he had actually infringed the patent or not, for unless the patent had all the ordinary elements of validity in itself it could not be made the means of complaint by reason of an alleged infringement. I assume therefore that before the interdict passed all those issues going to the validity of the patent as it then stood were decided in favour of the patentee.

July 10, 1877.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

But then, my Lords, look what happens after the disclaimer and alteration. The specification is altered ; in this particular case it is altered largely and most materially. The invention may have been a new invention as it stood originally, but it may not be new as it appears under the altered specification. The invention may have been useful according to the original specification, it may not be useful according to the amended specification. The original specification may have complied with all the exigencies of the law and been such as is requisite in the case of every patent, but the amended specification may be wanting in all those qualities which are required by the statute. And yet not one of those issues has been decided against the respondents in this case ; nay more, not one of those issues could be decided in the present proceedings, because when the appellant appeals to the Court to enforce its interdict granted in the former action the respondents are obliged to confess that in that former action the questions of novelty, of utility, and of sufficiency of the specification are all res judicata, already decided against them. My Lords, without going beyond that, and pointing out that upon the factum of infringement that which would be an infringement of the old specification may be none whatever of the new specification, the former considerations alone would satisfy your Lordships, I think, how extremely irregular it was in those who were engaged in this proceeding in Scotland to suppose that after the memorandum of alteration and the disclaimer the question of enforcing the old interdict could be entertained by the Court.

My Lords, I have said thus much in order that it may not appear that your Lordships have overlooked the irregularity which has taken place or are satisfied with that irregularity ; but, as the question now stands, both parties have deprecated that the course, which probably would be the strict course, should be taken, namely, that the appeal should be dismissed, leaving the parties to resort to a continuance of the second action which has been commenced in the Court of Session. They ask your Lordships, on the contrary, to determine the question which was submitted to the Court under the old interdict, namely, the question whether, taking the amended specification, there has been by the act of the respondents an infringement of that amended specification. Your Lordships, in mercy to the parties, are willing, as I understand it, to consider that question, and to determine it by way of review of the determination of the Court of Session.

Now, coming to that question of infringement, it appears to me to rest within very narrow bounds, and in order to determine it I must ask your Lordships, in the first place, to satisfy your minds as to what it is which is the principal characteristic, the essential feature, of the invention of the appellant as specified in his patent. So far as we can learn from the materials before us, up to the time when this patent was originally taken out the mode by which the tubes of boilers were securely fastened into what, I think, is called the tube piece or the flue piece, the end of the boiler, was this : There was a circular hole made in the flue piece, and the tube to be fastened into that hole and made steam-tight was placed in the hole at right angles, and then, in order to swell out the tube and fasten it into the hole prepared for it, it appears that a cylindrical or circular wedge was introduced into the tube ; that percussion was used either upon the wedge alone, or upon the wedge in the centre with some further substances placed round it, and by percussion the tube was stretched and expanded in such a way that at last it was brought to fit into the flue piece.

But, my Lords, that operation of course had this manifest inconvenience and defect—it had a tendency, by the straining caused by the percussion, to lacerate the fibres of the metal of the tube, and, in some instances, to burst the tube ; and, in addition to that, the percussion of one tube in the flue piece had a tendency to shake and disarrange the other tubes which were fastened into the flue piece all around it. Well, my Lords, the invention of the appellant was for the purpose of obviating these inconveniences, and he addressed himself to the subject in this way : He states that it will be better in place of applying percussion to apply roller surfaces to the interior of the tube, friction rollers, which will have the effect, not by way of percussion, but by way of rolling, to flatten out and expand, to make thinner, the metal of the tube, and, in that way, gradually to expand it until it fits into the flue piece. Now, my Lords, if, in order to do this, the appellant had taken what I may term a bunch or fasciculus of cylindrical rollers and had placed them in the tube and had inserted in them a centre cylinder to which he gave motion so that the centre cylinder rotating would make the cylinders round its periphery (the cylinders of the fasciculus) rotate also, of course all that might have been done and yet the object of bringing strong pressure to bear upon the tube would not have been accomplished. The rollers would rotate but there would be no point of contact coupled with pressure upon the tube. Therefore it is obvious that the point and gist of the invention must be, not the insertion of friction rollers or circular rollers in the tube, but some mode by which those rollers can forcibly be brought to bear upon the concave surface of the tube all round so as strongly to press out the tube. And, accordingly, your Lordships will find in the specification of the appellant means distinctly pointed out for that purpose.

I will ask your Lordships to look at a few sentences both in the specification as it originally stood and in the specification as it stands after alteration, because some of the expressions in the original specification strongly bear upon the invention as it ultimately appeared. I pass over the introduction which stated “the principle of the invention, which constitutes the subject-matter of this patent, is to expand the tube by rolling the metal by the application of one or more pressure rollers to the interior of the tube.” Of course that does not describe any invention ; it only describes what is the subject-matter which is going afterwards to be explained.

I pass over a number of descriptions of different modes by which machinery might be made for the purpose of attaining the object in view, and I come to the conclusions which are drawn from the whole of these particular details. In the original specification the patentee described a tapering plug, as it was called, which was placed in the centre of three cylindrical rollers, which cylindrical rollers might either be parallel to the plug and to each other or might be placed slightly

No. 13.

Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

No. 13. askew to the centre plug so that they might somewhat vary the effect of the screw. But having described that tapering plug which was to be introduced into the midst of these three cylinders, and as it proceeded and worked its way forward was to expand and push out these cylinders, because these cylinders were to have bearings so arranged that they were not rigidly to be kept in their places but might be forced out radially—having described that, he says “although a tapering or wedge-formed plug is preferred as the expanding instrument.”

July 10, 1877.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

Now, my Lords, I stop there to observe that that must mean the instrument expanding the cylinders, not expanding the tube, because what is spoken of is, not the whole of the tube but the plug and the plug only. “Although a tapering or wedge-formed plug is preferred as the expanding instrument, the invention is not limited to the expanding instrument of that form, as circumstances may render expedient the use of an expanding instrument of different form; when a tool is sufficiently large an arrangement of toggle-jointed levers may be inserted in it for the purpose of expanding the roller in place of a tapering plug.” I read that sentence as saying,—I do not limit myself to the particular expanding instrument in the centre of the cylinders which I have described, the tapering plug; you may have an instrument which will attain the same result, that is to say, the result of expanding or driving out the cylinders, in another way, such as an arrangement of toggle-jointed levers, but the result must be the same as will be achieved by the tapering plug.

I ought to say that that sentence which I have read disappears in the alteration, but this which I am now going to read is continued there,—“In all the above-described modifications of the roller expanding tool at least one roller is combined with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the roller is forced outwards in the tube.)” In the specification as altered “at least one roller” is struck out, and “rollers” substituted, so that it runs—“In all the above-described modifications of the roller expanding tool rollers are combined with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube), and with a stock or holder, by which the roller is prevented from twisting sidewise as they are turned round in the tube.” Then he continues,—“These three instrumentalities” (this is struck out in the amendment) “are all that are absolutely essential to the construction of the roller expanding tool, but the cutter and ratchet handle constitute with the said instrumentality or implements useful combinations which are supplementary to the aforesaid fundamental combination.” Then he proceeds,—“What is claimed, therefore, as the invention to be secured by letters-patent, is the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, viz., the roller, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth.”

Now, my Lords, I pause there for the purpose of pointing out to your Lordships that, in the first place, although, after the mention of a tapering plug there is put by way of alternative its equivalent, the interpretation of that alternative is immediately afterwards given. He says, as it were, by equivalent I mean something by the action of which the roller is forced outwards in the tube. And, then, also, your Lordships have this, under the statement that the “three instrumentalities are all that are absolutely essential to the construction of the roller,” one of the instrumentalities being the tapering plug or its equivalent. As so defined you have implied this further statement, that the tapering plug or its equivalent, as so defined, is absolutely essential to the invention. Thus your Lordships have, when you come to the claim, an interpretation placed upon what he claims, No. 13. namely, the three things in combination, the roller, the roller stock, and the expanding instrument, the three operating in combination substantially as set forth. July 10, 1877. Dudgeon v. Thomson, &c.

Now, my Lords, I must say further, that not only is that, as it seems to me, the legitimate and the necessary construction of the document, but I must add that according to all the information that is before me, and according to my understanding of the subject-matter of this operation, if the patentee had here claimed the rollers and the roller stock, either one or both of them, he would have claimed that which would have made this patent perfectly useless. Nothing would have been done by means of the rollers alone, or of the roller stock alone. Moreover, so far as I am aware, it would have been extremely difficult to say that there was any novelty in a roller stock of that kind, or in rollers of that kind. The point which gave the characteristic to the whole, and which he justly called a point absolutely essential to his invention, was the tapering plug acting as an expander, driving out those cylindrical rollers placed around the plug, and thus producing that which, as I stated at the beginning, must have been the desideratum in this invention, a heavy continuous forcible pressure against the inside of the tube for the purpose of expanding it.

Now, that being the characteristic and the essential feature of the invention of the appellant, as I understand it, it only remains to consider what it is that the respondents do. What is the instrument which they sell? Your Lordships are perfectly familiar both with the appearance and with the description of it. The respondents do not in any way expand or drive out their cylinders from the centre. They have no tapering plug, and in that sense have no expanding instrument. They have not their rollers fixed in radiating slots, so that they would be capable of being expanded, that is to say, driven out from the centre. But what they have is this,—they have also what I have termed a fasciculus of rollers, but their three rollers, in place of being three parallel perfect cylinders, are tapering cylinders placed together, and the centre of the tool is not a tapering plug, but is itself a centre cylinder. The centre cylinder gives motion to the wedge-formed or tapering cylinders, which are placed around the centre cylinder, but the whole is worked, not by way of pressing out the cylinders against the tube, but as a complete wedge inserted in the tube, having the contour of a wedge, and expanding the tube, flattening out the tube, by working its way into the tube like a rotating wedge.

It would have been quite possible for the appellant, when he was specifying his invention, to have specified also a tool, an instrument, which would have the peculiarity of the instrument of the respondents. I have no means of knowing why he did not do so. It may have been possibly because it did not occur to him; it may have been, on the other hand, because he was aware that if he had done so he would in some way, by reason of want of novelty or otherwise, have endangered his patent. It is sufficient for my purpose that he has not described a tool of the kind which I have mentioned. There can be no doubt, as it appears to me, that the instrument used by the respondents is not the instrument described and patented by the appellant.

A great deal of the argument at your Lordships' bar has been to shew that though not the instrument described and patented by the appellant, it is what has been termed in the argument a "colourable imitation." Now, my Lords, the words "colourable imitation" are words which appear to me not very happily chosen, and calculated to create some confusion. I am quite aware that

No. 13. they are words which are used sometimes in the argument of patent cases, but I doubt very much whether the particular expression is one which has any great authority for its use. There is a well-known manner in which the word "colourable" or "colourably" is used in patent cases. I have referred to the ordinary form in which injunctions are granted in patent cases by the Court of Chancery, and I take from Mr Seton's book an example which appears to me to be exactly in accordance with what I recollect to be the practice of the Court in granting injunctions. It is in a case which I think came before my noble and learned friend, as Vice-Chancellor, the case of De la Rue v. Dickinson.¹ The injunction restrains the defendants, their agents and servants, during the continuance of the patent, from "using or employing any machines similar to the machine in the plaintiff's bill stated, or any machinery, mechanism, or mechanical contrivance made or arranged according to the plaintiff's said patent inventions, or differing therefrom only colourably or by the substitution of mere mechanical equivalents for the same."

July 10, 1877.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

Now, my Lords, what I understand by that is this,—if there is a patented invention, and if you, the defendant, are found to have taken that invention, it will not save you from the punishment or from the restraint of the Court that you have at the same time that you have taken the invention dressed it up colourably—added something to it, taken, it may be, something away from it, so that of the whole it may be said, as is said in this injunction,—Here is a machine, which is either the plaintiff's machine or differs from it only colourably. But underlying all that there must be a taking of the invention of the plaintiff. There used to be a theory in this country that persons might infringe upon the equity of a statute if it could not be shewn that they had infringed the words of a statute; and I know there is, by some confusion of ideas, a notion sometimes entertained that there may be something like an infringement of the equity of a patent. My Lords, I cannot think that there is any sound principle of that kind in our law,—that which is protected is that which is specified, and that which is held to be an infringement must be an infringement of that which is specified. But, I agree, it will not be the less an infringement because it has been coloured or disguised by additions or subtractions, which additions or subtractions may exist and yet the thing protected by the specification be taken notwithstanding.

When I look at that which the respondents have in this case done, and the article which they have sold, it appears to me to be a different article from the article specified. It is no doubt a cognate invention—it aims at accomplishing the same purpose—it uses no doubt friction rollers, but it has not that thing which the patentee in this case has chosen (I have no doubt for proper reasons) to describe as one of the characteristic features of his invention, and which, as it seems to me, he might have almost said was the characteristic feature of his invention, because, as it seems to me, it was that without which his invention would have been absolutely nil.

Now, my Lords, those are the grounds upon which, dealing with this case as the Court of Session have dealt with it, and assuming, as your Lordships are willing to assume, that this question of infringement may be decided in these proceedings, I come to the conclusion that the view taken by the majority of the Court of Session was the correct view of the case, and that a violation of this interdict, even as applying to the altered specification of the appellant, has not been made out. I therefore submit to your Lordships that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Dudgeon v.

Thomson, &c.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I entertain the same opinion as that which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

First, with regard to the course which has been taken in this case through inadvertence, I think in the Court below, as to the continuance of the interdict after the disclaimer by the appellant of some portion of his invention, that course is one which we cannot pass by in silence, because, if you look to the very terms of the disclaimer which we have put before us, you will see at once how unjust it is that an interdict granted in a totally different state of circumstances should be continued when such a change of circumstances has taken place. The statute expressly states, with reference to a disclaimer, which in itself was a considerable privilege granted to patentees, that, as a condition of the disclaimer being entered, it should be necessary to take care that there should be no proceeding in respect of any alleged infringement or breach of the patent anterior to the disclaimer unless the Attorney General should certify that it was fit and proper that such proceeding should be had.

In the very disclaimer which we have before us the reasons of the disclaimer are stated to be these: "Whereas it has been alleged that before the date of the said letters-patent certain experimental tools had been made for expanding the ends of boiler tubes somewhat similar in action to those described in the specification," therefore he disclaims them. That, in other words, means that it has been alleged that his patent is not new, and I think one may assume, this disclaimer having taken place, that that which is alleged is not very far from being the fact. At all events, it was an admission on his part that there was that allegation, and that he was not prepared to maintain the contrary, and therefore he thought fit to disclaim.

Now, my Lords, this observation arises upon that with regard to the interdict which has been granted. The interdict had been granted upon a specification of patent which, as the noble and learned Lord who preceded me has said, was not disputed in respect of novelty; but if the Court had been informed of as much as the patentee appears afterwards to have been informed of with respect to these allegations and the nature and substance of them, it might very well have held, and in all probability would have held, that the patent on which it was asked to grant an interdict was a patent which was void for want of novelty.

The patentee's next statement in the recital is,—“Whereas experience has shewn that such tools, in consequence of such disadvantage, are of small practical value;” and then again, “whereas experience has shewn that the supplementary combinations,” which he refers to in words, “are not of any great practical value;” in other words, he has been informed that his patent was for a thing which was useless, and which, therefore, might be avoided upon those two grounds. He says he has been so informed—of course that does not tell you that he acquiesces in that, or that he has acted upon it, but he has acted in making his disclaimer in consequence of apprehensions excited in his mind both as to novelty and as to usefulness with regard to his invention.

However, it is very satisfactory that we have not to determine the case upon these grounds, for our doing so would only put the parties to more expense and inconvenience than they must have been already subjected to, as all parties unfortunately are in these heavy patent litigations. Consequently, with more satisfaction, I approach the substantial merits of the case.

My Lords, I have come to the conclusion that that which the respondents are proved to have done in constructing their machine is not an invasion of that which the appellant has chosen to protect by his letters-patent. Now, let us see what has been claimed by the patent. When the disclaimer has been duly recorded you find the appellant claiming this: He claims that which he describes in full, namely, certain rollers whereby the metal tubes are expanded by rolling. The combination that he prefers is that of three rollers and a tapering tool, which, by its insertion between these rollers, does two things—it communicates motion to the rollers, and it also, by its tapering form, gets “swallowed up,” as it has been termed both by the Court and by some of the witnesses, in the process of its rotating motion, as it proceeds by that rotating motion to enter in between the rollers, and gradually assumes a larger diameter; that larger diameter necessarily presses upon the rollers, which are also at the same time set in motion, and so, pressing against the rollers laterally, forces these rollers from the centre against the sides of the tube more and more as it advances in between them. This appears to have been an ingenious invention, and something, apparently, very superior to the former mode of expanding boiler tubes by the means of swages put in, and the insertion of an instrument in the midst of those swages for the purpose of forcing them out, that forcing being effected by means of a hammer.

The appellant mentions certain modifications in the disclaimer, and having stated what portions of his patent he has disclaimed, he proceeds to state, in one uniform consecutive narrative, what remains of his patent after the disclaimer. He uses these words towards the close:—“In the above described modifications of the roller expanding tool rollers are combined with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube), and with a stock or holder by which the rollers are prevented from twisting sideways as they are turned round in the tube.” Then he says,—“What is claimed, therefore, as the invention to be secured by letters-patent” (it is plain and simple enough), “is the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, namely, the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth.”

Now, my Lords, there can be no doubt whatever that the appellant has described, first of all, a compound thing, namely, an expanding tool,—he has described equally distinctly the three separate parts of that compound thing, and he claims those three separate parts in combination. He does not claim them separately; he would have been very unwise if he had done so, because I apprehend expanding metal by rolling it is a very old process indeed, and the use of friction rollers is also a very old invention. But the ingenuity consists in this case in the introduction of cylindrical rollers capable of being pressed out laterally by means of making the journals to move in a slot, and, whilst so capable of being pressed out, introducing amongst them that which will gradually drive them out from their centre nearer and nearer to the tube to be expanded, because there is a gradual tapering form in the plug which effects this operation. These are three perfectly distinct things, and the expanding instrument is as plainly as possible in that claim distinguished from the thing called the expanding tool in the former part of the patent, which is the whole machine in its complete form. Therefore, the three parts are the rollers, the roller stock which support the rollers in order that they may be so operated upon with safety by the expanding tool, and the expanding instrument, the thing which produces the expansion by forcing them outwards, "these three operating in combination substantially as set forth."

Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

When that is compared with the original letters-patent before the disclaimer if there was any doubt at all about the meaning, that doubt would be at once resolved by seeing that he says something very similar there. In the letters-patent of 1866 he says: "In all the above described modifications of the roller expanding tool" (that is, the whole instrument), "at least one roller is combined with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the roller is forced outwards in the tube), and with a stock or holder, by which the roller is prevented from twisting sidewise as it is turned round in the tube. These three instrumentalities are all that are absolutely essential to the construction of the roller expanding tool." He says there that he has a combination, that that combination is what he describes it as being after the disclaimer, just as he had done before, namely, the three instruments, the rollers themselves, the roller stock (that which holds the rollers together) and the tapering tool. "But," he proceeds to say, "the cutter and ratchet handle" (which are afterwards disclaimed) "constitute with the said instrumentalities or implements useful combinations which are supplementary to the aforesaid fundamental combination. What is claimed, therefore, as the invention to be secured by letters-patent is the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, namely, the roller, and roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth." Those are the very words in the claim in the patent after the disclaimer has been made, and coupled with the preceding portion of that paragraph in the patent of 1866 you see plainly and clearly, if there were any doubt at all on the subject,—to my mind I confess there was no doubt before,—what is the nature of his claim. It is a claim of those three things in combination, and the question now is, whether or not that combination has been infringed by the respondents.

Now, my Lords, I am content, as to that part of the case, to refer to the view taken by the Lord President, which appears to me very neatly and clearly to express what the differences are. He says,—“The question comes to be whether the tool now used by Thomson comes within the description of the original patent. The tool lately used by Thomson certainly differs from Dudgeon's tool in some very remarkable particulars, and the question is, whether these variations take it out of the patent. In the first place, the rollers of Thomson's tool are not made to diverge from the axis of the tool, and therefore it is by no such divergence that they are made to press against the tube,” the fact being that the rollers of the respondent Thomson are themselves made of a conical form, with a varying diameter; and the consequence is that the whole tool itself (as distinguished from the dilating instrument, which is the tapering plug), has a wedge-like form, and is pushed forward in the tube and enters into the tube, instead of a central tapering plug being used which causes the cylinders to diverge, and which tapering plug alone enters into the tube that is to be dilated.

Then he says,—“No doubt Thomson uses rollers, and to make these rollers work he is obliged to use a roller stock, but with these two points the resemblance comes to an end. Thomson's rollers are fitted in a different way for a

No. 13. different purpose, and act in a different way. Thomson in the best form of his tool has a plug in the centre of his tool, but it is not tapering, and does not force out the rollers by its action, and therefore it is not intended to do anything more than communicate a rotary motion to the rollers. The means by which Thomson effects his object of pressing the rollers against the interior sides of the tube is entirely different. He makes his tool a tapering or skew tool. The whole contour of the roller stock and tool is different. It is conical in shape; the effect is that the tool works itself into the tube and gets swallowed by it. The result is that the metal is gradually rolled out, first by that portion of the tool whose circumference is smallest, and then by the parts of greater circumference. It is essential in Thomson's tool that it should constantly work into the tube, not like the roller stock in the patentee's tool, which must always remain stationary." In fact, the form which evidently the appellant laid the greatest stress upon was that form in which the tapering plug alone should advance, and a collar be applied for the express purpose of preventing the rotating cylinders which were making the direct pressure from advancing with it.

July 10, 1877.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

A good deal of ingenuity has been used upon a model which was shewn to Mr Bramwell by picking out parts of the patent (I do not intend to enter into it in detail) with a view to shew that you may so arrange matters that, according to the patent which the appellant has now obtained, you may, by some contrivance, also take care that the tapering plug itself should, under certain modifications, be swallowed up as it were into the body of the tool, that is to say, between the cylinders, and that the tool as a whole should be pushed forward, as is done in Thomson's arrangement. But that evidently was not the form which was ever adopted or has ever been used by the appellant, and, in fact, as far as there is any evidence on the subject some of the witnesses appear to say that they do not think such a form could be made useful. It is enough for me to say that there is nothing of the kind shewn to have been practically used, and that I do not think that such a thing could be fairly and properly pieced out from those portions of the specification which were selected for that purpose.

It appears to me, my Lords, to be plain that all that Dudgeon, the present appellant, has claimed is that combination which he has formed of the three things that he has described, and of which everything is an essential part, the plug being as essential as the rest, and the introduction of a cylinder instead of a plug at once puts an end to any notion whatsoever of its being a tool for the purpose of enlarging the tubes in which Dudgeon's instrument is introduced, because if you were to introduce a cylindrical plug instead of a tapering plug it is quite plain and manifest that you would produce no action whatsoever upon the sides of the tube,—you would communicate what Mr Aston has two or three times told us is life and energy to the machine; but I apprehend if he had taken out a patent merely for the purpose of communicating life and energy to a machine by the introduction of a cylindrical roller between other rollers he would have found that the patent would have been of very little use or service to him. That patent would have been for an invention which, I apprehend, has existed for many years, indeed long before the existence of this patent. It could only be pieced out in the way I have mentioned by saying,—If you take off the collar and do that which the rest of my patent rather indicates is not the course to be taken, you may, by putting the rollers on cylinders which you use as rollers askew, so contrive as to form a combination by which, when the cylindrical plug is swallowed up by the others, and the others are askew, you may get an instrument something like that which Thomson has invented, or at least has used. I am not speaking of its novelty,—novelty is not necessary to Thomson,—but something which Thomson has used, and which he seems to have used very effectively.

No. 13.

Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

It appears to me that nothing of that kind is contemplated in the original patent. The original patent over and over again, both before and after the disclaimer, states that this tapering plug is the great and necessary ingredient or one of the three necessary ingredients of the combination. That plug has not been taken by Thomson; Thomson therefore has not made the same combination, neither that combination nor anything like it in fact, in his arrangement. His is a totally different arrangement—that by which the whole tool itself as distinguished from the tapering instrument is made to have a wedge-like or conical bearing, and having that wedge-like or conical bearing is introduced into the tube and is so made to have the effect and perform the operation required. The circumstance that you may by the introduction of that cylindrical roller set the whole in motion does not make it an infringement. The appellant cannot say to Thomson, You are not at liberty to use a well known means of propelling any cylinder or roller with both a progressive and an expanding motion, and my patent is a protection against your adopting that form of communicating motion to rollers. I apprehend there is nothing of that kind claimed in the patent. If there had been anything of that kind claimed, the patent certainly, as it appears to me, could not have been sustained. I think therefore it is quite clear that what Thomson has done is no invasion of anything that the appellant is entitled to claim as being within the protection of his letters-patent.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am also of the same opinion, and I agree with what has been said by the noble and learned Lords who have spoken before me, that there has been a mistake or misapprehension in the manner in which this question has been raised in the Court below. Whilst the old specification remained as it originally was there was an interdict against infringing it in any way, and as long as it remained as it originally was it would have been a very idle and vexatious thing to commence a new action in the same Court for an infringement of that patent for which an interdict had already been granted; and therefore the right course would have been to say, that interdict standing, raise your question upon an action for a breach of that existing interdict, and to that it would have been a perfectly good answer to say,—What I have done is no breach of that interdict for it is no infringement of the patent as then explained and defined by the existing specification. But there had been a disclaimer which altered the specification, and by altering that specification altered the patent for which it had been granted. I will not repeat the reasons which have been given by both the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me for saying that when that was the case it was not right to make an application for a breach of the interdict which prohibited the infringement of the old patent with the old specification, but that there ought to have been a proceeding for a new breach of the new specification of the patent in which the same question which has been now raised, which seems to have been the real question between the parties, could have been raised, namely, whether or not what was done by the defenders was really a breach of the patent as defined and ascertained in the new specification. The same question was really raised but it was raised in an irregular manner, and I perfectly agree with what the noble and learned Lords have said that we ought not to allow it to pass with the supposition that the House of Lords sanctions that irregular manner of proceeding, although, at the application of the parties, we give an opinion and advise the House as to what the decision in law should be upon the question which goes to the merits, and which, if it had been properly raised, would have been still the same question, namely, whether what the defenders have done is or is not an infringement of the patent as defined and ascertained by the existing specification.

Now, my Lords, as to that I agree with what was said by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, that the question is whether it is an infringement of the patent, a taking of a part of the property in the use of that invention which has been given by the letters-patent. The phrase "colourably" is very apt to mislead in these cases. If part of the property in the invention be really taken, there is an infringement, however much that may be disguised or sought to be hidden. If that is detected by the patentee, and if what is taken is really part of his property, given to him by the letters-patent, he has a right to proceed against the infringer, however ingeniously the colours may have been contrived to try to conceal the fact that there has been a taking of part of the property. But for all that it is not correct to say that doing anything that answers the same object is necessarily an infringement of the specification; we must look at what is shewn in the specification. The term and condition of the patent is that the patentee shall "particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the invention and in what manner the same was to be performed." Accordingly, we look at the specification to see what is the nature of the invention for which the patent has been taken out as described and ascertained by the specification.

It may be that the question arises whether the particular thing is or is not within the specification. That question arises in the present case. It is said that the tool made by the respondents comes within the specification and is an infringement of the patent. In such a case it is the interest of the patentee to give the specification as wide a meaning as he can give it, in order to make it take in the thing done by the alleged infringer. It might have been that it was the other way, and that the thing was known to be old, and then of course the patent might have been upset by shewing that it included an old thing. Then the position of the parties would have been reversed, and the interest of the patentee would then have been to argue that the true construction did not include this. But whether it is for the interest of one side or the other I apprehend the duty of the Court is fairly and truly to construe the specification, neither favouring the one side nor the other, neither putting an unfair gloss or construction upon the specification for the purpose of saving a patent if it is said that the patent is void, nor putting an unfair gloss or construction upon it in order to extend the patent and making it take in something which you may think was an unhandsome taking of the fruits of his invention from the patentee, if it is not really an infringement of the patent.

Now, my Lords, taking that view, we come to what I take to be the real question upon the merits. Waiving the prior matters which I have previously mentioned the real question upon the merits is, what is the true construction of this specification as it stands. I have already pointed out that the words of condition have nothing about claiming. You may have a perfectly good specification without the word "claim" or the thing "claim" in it at all, but nevertheless a claiming clause is commonly inserted at the end of a patent, and that is of immense importance in enabling us to construe the specification, and to see, looking at the whole specification, whether a thing is included in it or not.

Dudgeon v.

Now, my Lords, I turn back to this passage in the specification. I do not intend to go through much which has been said before me upon the mechanics, for I assume that that is in the minds of the noble Lords already. In every one of the instances which the appellant gave, in every one of the machines which were worked, there was a tapering plug, or in the case where there were toggle-jointed levers which was afterwards disclaimed there was there a matter which forced apart the external pressure rollers which were brought in contact with the sides of the tube. That being so, he says, "in all the above described modifications of the roller expanding tool" (that is the name he gives to his whole tool), "at least one roller is combined;" in his amended specification, having struck out the words "one roller," he says "rollers are combined, with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube), and with a stock or holder by which the rollers are prevented from twisting sidewise as they are turned round in the tube." So it stands in the disclaimer. Then he goes on: "What is claimed, therefore, as the invention to be secured by letters-patent is the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, namely, the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth."

My Lords, I think upon that, as it stands after the disclaimer, there can be no reasonable doubt in construction that what is meant by the expanding instrument is that which was previously called, in the earlier part, "a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube)." That is the meaning of "the expanding instrument" in the combination of those three which he claims, and he claims that combination only. The word "therefore" shews it even there. But when we take, as I apprehend we are entitled to take, the old specification before the disclaimer, in order to see what it means, that becomes still clearer. I say we are entitled to take it, for the object of a disclaimer is merely to take out and renounce part of what had been claimed before, and it would vitiate the new specification if, by striking out that part, you gave an extended and larger sense to what is left, so as to make it embrace something which it did not embrace before. I do not think that is done here. After having mentioned the three, the original specification said,—“These three instrumentalities are all that are absolutely essential to the construction of the roller expanding tool; but the cutter and ratchet handle” (that is, a thing which is disclaimed) “constitute with the said instrumentalities or implements useful combinations, which are supplementary to the aforesaid fundamental combination.” What is claimed, therefore, is the combination. I do not think that, looking at that, anybody could doubt for a moment what he means when he says that the combination he claims is “the aforesaid fundamental combination,” and that aforesaid combination is in express terms said to be the three instrumentalities which are all that are absolutely essential, and the three instrumentalities which are all that are absolutely essential include a tapering plug, or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube. It seems to me that when you look at that, it is said as plainly as it could be said by any words which could be used for the purpose that the person who drew the specification meant to claim these three instrumentalities in combination, one of them being a tapering plug, or some other instrumentality, which forced outwards the external rollers which were in contact with the tube. That is the thing which is described, that is the combination in all the machines which he makes, and it seems to me to be clear, therefore, that that is what the claim is confined to.

Dudgeon v.
Thomson, &c.

Now, what is made by the defender is no tapering plug at all. It does not force the rollers outwards. What he does is having the rollers upon, not a tapering, but a cylindrical plug. He has made those rollers tapering in themselves, and the whole tool is drawn in and produces a pressure, certainly bringing about the same result, in pressing the sides of the tube so as to make it steam-tight. But that was old enough; it had been done long before. The defenders produce that result, but they do not produce it in the same way as the appellants.

I do not mean, my Lords, to overlook an argument which has been used as to something being suggested in the specification, though it is admitted, that it is nowhere in terms pointed out. It is put thus: After having described the machine with a tapering plug, which, as it went in, would force the rollers apart, the appellants says,—“The tapering plug may have a shallow flat screw thread formed upon its surface, so that it will draw itself inwards as it is turned by hand; but such a thread is not essential to the successful operation of the instrument. Or, in place of such a thread, the slots which hold the journals of the rollers may be slightly skewed, so that the axes of the rollers will be slightly skewed to the axis of the tube, the effect of which is to cause the tapering plug, when turned in one direction, to draw into the tube, and when reversed, to loosen itself between the rollers.” Now, there he states, Take your tapering plug, which goes in, and put upon it the thread of a screw, so as to make it what is commonly called a male screw, and it will draw itself in between the rollers. But you need not do that, for if you put the slots so as to make the roller slightly askew the effect of that will be to make the inside of those rollers become what is commonly called a female screw, and they will consequently draw in the plug just as much as a male screw would have done, and probably that would in fact be the effect. With regard to the questions about friction, I think we need not consider what Mr Bramwell says on that point, although it has been repeated in the argument.

It is quite true when you say “I have made the rollers slightly askew so as to form a female screw in the inside,” it necessarily follows to any one who has once thought of the matter that putting a roller in that way will make the outside of it a male screw, and consequently if you think a little further it will follow that if it be put in the tube and turned that male screw outside will draw the whole tool into the tube, just as the female screw inside draws the conical plug into the inside. That is true enough, but I do not think that that suggestion, which very possibly may have given a hint to the defender as to what he was to do, could, taken by itself, be at all said to “particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the invention.” I think this remote hint given in one part of the specification would not be enough to do that. If the person who drew the specification had thought of it, which very likely he did not, he might have brought it in, if he had not been afraid, as very likely he was, with some good reason, that he would make the patent bad by claiming too much. What was in his mind I do not know,—whether he thought of it and deliberately said, “I will not risk making the patent bad by claiming this,” or whether he did not think of it at all, and therefore did not describe it.

I can only say this, when I come to the end of the specification in which he points out in words what he "particularly describes and ascertains as the nature of his invention," I find that he distinctly and pointedly says that he claims the combination, and nothing but the combination, of three instrumentalities, one of which is the tapering plug or instrument which has the effect of forcing the outer rollers asunder. It seems to me that he claims that and nothing but that, and the respondents have done what they had a perfect right to do; having avoided infringing that combination, they have produced the same result by other means, which there was nothing to prevent them from doing.

Ship—Bill of lading—Seaworthy ship.—A bill of lading, after the obligation on the shipowner to deliver the goods, a quantity of wheat, in like good order and condition as when shipped, contained a clause stipulating that the shipowner should not be liable for the negligence of the crew. In an action at the instance of the shipper against the owner, concluding for damages "caused by and through the insufficiency of the hull and appurtenances of the vessel, or by and through the gross carelessness and negligence of those in charge thereof for whom the defenders are responsible," an issue was sent to trial whether the wheat was received in good order and condition, and whether the shipowner had in breach of the undertaking contained in the bill of lading failed to deliver it in the like good order and condition.

The jury returned a special verdict finding that the wheat had been damaged by sea-water, and that through the negligence of some of the crew one of the orlop-deck ports was insufficiently fastened, and "that in consequence the said sea-water was thereby admitted to the hold after the ship had been five days at sea."

The First Division, in applying the verdict, held that the clause exonerating the shipowner from liability for loss caused by the negligence of his servants applied, and entered up the verdict for the defenders.

In an appeal held that the special verdict had not exhausted the case, as it did not find whether the ship was or was not seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and that a new trial must take place.

(SEE Court of Session report in present vol., March 16, 1877, p. 657.)

Steel and Craig, grain merchants, Glasgow, raised this action in the Sheriff Court against the State Line Steamship Company, concluding for damages in consequence of 15,000 bushels of wheat which had been delivered to the defenders in good condition at New York for carriage to Glasgow, "having been, between the 6th and 14th September 1875, by and through the insufficiency of the hull and appurtenances of the vessel, or by and through the gross carelessness and negligence of those in charge thereof, for whom the defenders" are responsible, injured and deteriorated by contact with sea-water, which, from one or other of the said causes, flowed into the main hold of the said vessel.

Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Steamship Co.

The pursuers founded on the terms of the bill of lading, which bore,—“Shipped in apparent good order and condition 15,409 bushels wheat in bulk, &c., and to be delivered from the ship's deck, when the ship's responsibility shall cease, in the like good order and condition, at the port of Glasgow (weight, &c. unknown). Not accountable for leakage, breakage, . . . however caused. Not responsible for the bursting of bags, or consequences arising therefrom, or for any of the following perils, whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or persons in the service of the ship, or for whose acts the shipowner is liable or otherwise,—namely, risk of craft or hulk, or transshipment, explosion, heat or fire at sea in craft or hulk, or on shore, boilers, steam, or machinery, or from the consequences of any damage or injury thereto, howsoever such damage or injury may be caused, collision, straining, or other peril of the seas, rivers, navigation, or land transit, of whatever nature or kind soever and howsoever caused, excepted.”

The pursuers averred ;—(Cond. 5) “The said injury was caused either by the insufficiency of the hull and appurtenances of the said vessel when she left New York, or by the gross carelessness and negligence of those in charge of the vessel for whom the defenders are responsible. When the said vessel left New York she was not in a seaworthy condition, in respect one of her side ports was open, or, at least, not sufficiently secured or fastened to prevent the influx of water into the hold, and the said port was allowed to remain open or insecurely fastened through the gross carelessness of those in charge of the vessel.”

The pursuers pleaded ;—The pursuers having sustained loss “through the unseaworthiness of the defenders' vessel and the failure of the defenders to fulfil the said contract of carriage and safe custody, are entitled to decree for the sum sued for.”

The defenders' answer to art. 5 of the pursuers' condescendence was—“Denied as stated, but explained that, on 6th September, when the ‘State of Virginia’ was about 1100 miles from New York one of her side ports was burst open to some extent by the heavy seas which she encountered, and water flowed into the hold through said port. Admitted also that the cause of the leak was not discovered until the water had got up amongst the cargo to the height of several feet. Quoad ultra denied, and reference made to the defenders' statements.”

The defenders stated ;—(Stat. 5) “When the said vessel left New York she was seaworthy in every respect. The port which was in the course of the voyage partly burst open was provided with proper and usual fastenings to exclude sea-water and prevent damage to cargo.” The pursuers' answer to this article was—“Denied, and reference made to the condescendence.” (Stat. 6) “It was the duty of the master and company of the vessel to see that the said port was properly fastened before the voyage began, and that it was not interfered with thereafter. The defenders have made every inquiry, but have been hitherto unable to discover the cause of the said side port not resisting the pressure of the seas. The defenders' information is, and they aver, that the master and crew of said steamer did use reasonable care to secure and keep secure said side port, notwithstanding which, or from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, or other persons in the service of the ship ^{and} employed in the stowage of the cargo at New York, for whom the defenders, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, would be responsible, the particular person in fault being to the defenders unknown. the port before mentioned, in the course of the voyage, from the perils of the sea or navigation, was burst partly open as before mentioned, and the damage alleged by the pursuers happened to the wheat." And then follows this statement :—" After the cargo was loaded the inside face of the said port could not be seen or got at without taking out the cargo."

The case was appealed to the Court of Session for trial by jury.

The issue adjusted and subsequent proceedings in the Court of Session are narrated in the Court of Session report, post., p. 657.

In the discussion in the First Division on the application of the special verdict the argument turned exclusively on the effect of the exemption clause in the bill of lading, and the question of seaworthiness was not raised.

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Your Lordships have had the advantage in this case of a long and interesting argument upon points which are no doubt of great commercial importance. There is some difficulty in the case by reason of the course which it has taken in the Court below; but I think when your Lordships consider the whole of the facts, so far as they appear, and the arguments which your Lordships have heard, there cannot be much doubt as to the result at which your Lordships should now arrive.

The question arises upon the shipment of a considerable quantity of wheat at New York in one of the State Line steamers named the "State of Virginia." The appellants are the indorsees of the bill of lading of that wheat; but, having regard to the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act (18 and 19 Vict. c. 111, sec. 1), they are onerous indorsees, and they stand in the position of the original shippers. They have whatever right of action the original shippers had, and I may speak of them as if in point of fact they had been the shippers of the wheat. Now, my Lords, on the shipment of the wheat a bill of lading was given, and I will, in the first place, direct your Lordships' attention to that bill of lading. The bill of lading contained in it an affirmative portion and also a portion which we may call a negative portion, or rather a portion which, by way of exception and curtailment of some antecedent liability created by the earlier part of the bill of lading, endeavours to protect the shipowners from certain consequences. The affirmative part of the bill of lading is this—It states that the wheat in question, marked and numbered as in the margin, has been shipped, and is "to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, in the like good order and condition, at the aforesaid port of Glasgow." It is an engagement, therefore, to carry and to deliver at a certain port in this kingdom the wheat so shipped on board. My Lords, what is the meaning of the contract created by those words, supposing they stood alone? I think there cannot be any reasonable doubt entertained that this is a contract which not merely engages the shipowner to deliver the goods in the condition mentioned, but that it also contains in it a representation and an engagement—a contract—by the shipowner that the ship on which the wheat is placed is at the time of its departure reasonably fit for accomplishing the service which the shipowner engages to undertake and perform. Reasonably fit to accomplish that service the ship cannot be unless it is seaworthy. By "seaworthy," my Lords, I do not desire to point to any technical meaning of the term, but to express that the ship should be in a condition to encounter whatever perils of the sea a ship of that kind, and loaded in that way, may be fairly expected to encounter in crossing the Atlantic. My Lords, if there were no authority upon the question it appears to me that it would be scarcely possible to arrive at any other conclusion than that this is the meaning of the contract. I took the liberty of asking the learned counsel for the respondents whether they were prepared to say that if the owner of goods engaged room in a ship of this kind, and bringing his goods alongside at the time the ship was ready for departure, found that the ship was not seaworthy, he could not refuse the fulfilment of his promise to put his goods on board, and whether, on the other hand, he could not maintain proceedings against the owner of the ship for not having accommodation for his goods in a ship that was fit to carry them. I did not understand the learned counsel for the respondents to be able to say that that was not the relative position of the owner of the goods that I supposed and the shipowners,—that, on the one hand, the owner of the goods was not entitled to refuse to put his goods on board, and, on the other hand, the owner of the ship did not incur liability by not having a ship fit to fulfil the engagement he had entered into. But, if that is so, it must be from this, and only from this, that in a contract of this kind there is implied as part of the contract an engagement that the ship shall be reasonably fit for performing the service which she undertakes.

In principle I think there could be no doubt that this would be the meaning of the contract; but, having regard to authority, it appears to me that the question is really concluded by authority. It is sufficient to refer to the case of Lyon v. Mells,¹ in the Court of Queen's Bench, during the time of Lord Ellenborough, reported in the fifth volume of East, and to the very strong and extremely well-considered expression of the law which fell from the late Lord Wensleydale when he was a Judge of the Court of Exchequer and was advising your Lordships' House in the case of Gibson v. Small.² My Lords, that being, as I submit to your Lordships, the effect of the earlier part of the bill of lading, it then becomes material to consider—still upon the construction of the bill of lading—what is the effect of the latter part—the qualified or exceptional part—of the bill of lading. The bill of lading is not very happily expressed as regards its grammar and the collocation of the words, but it is not necessary to be minute in any criticism upon the collocation of the words. I will assume, in favour of the respondents, that everything which is mentioned between the words "not responsible" and the word "excepted" is meant to be matter in respect of which there is to be no liability on the part of the shipowner. But, my Lords, looking at all that is mentioned between those two termini in the bill of lading it appears to me that everything which is mentioned is matter subsequent to the sailing of the ship with the goods on board. There is mentioned there "the bursting of bags, or consequences arising therefrom, or for any of the following perils, whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or persons in the service of the ship, or for whose acts the shipowner is liable or otherwise; namely, risk of craft or hulk" (which was found by the verdict, which I shall afterwards have to refer to, not to mean the risk of the ship herself), "transhipment, explosion, heat or fire at sea in craft or hulk, or on shore, boilers, steam, or machinery, or from the consequences of any damage or injury thereto, howsoever such damage or injury may be caused, collision, straining, or other peril of the seas, rivers, navigation, or land transit, of whatever nature or kind soever and howsoever caused, excepted." My Lords, the only attempt to give to any of those words a meaning which would refer them to what happened antecedent to or at the time of the departure of the ship was to construe the words "peril of the sea," "howsoever caused," so as to make them point to unseaworthiness, ending in a loss at sea. But it appears to me to be obvious that what is here referred to as peril of the seas is, as described, something which happens on the transit, No. 14.

 whether land or sea transit, and that of course does not commence until the ship leaves the port. Therefore, if it be the case, as I submit to your Lordships it is, July 20, 1877.

 that there is in the earlier part of the bill of lading an engagement that the ship shall be reasonably fit to perform the service which she undertakes, there is, in my opinion, nothing in the latter part of the bill of lading which qualifies that engagement.

Now, my Lords, that being the view of the construction of the bill of lading which I shall submit to your Lordships, let me proceed to apply it to what is found to have occurred in the present case. With regard to the pleadings, there is a statement in the fifth article of the condescendence of the pursuers (the appellants), that "when the said vessel left New York she was not in a seaworthy condition, in respect one of her side ports was open, or at least not sufficiently secured or fastened to prevent the influx of water into the hold; and the said port was allowed to remain open or insecurely fastened through the gross carelessness of those in charge of the vessel," and the result was that water flowed into the hold through the said port, and so little care was taken of the cargo that there were about fifteen feet of water in the hold before the fact of the leakage was discovered; and it is the damage done to the wheat in consequence of this influx of water which forms the subject of complaint in the action. There is a denial to that, but it is explained "that on the 6th September, when the 'State of Virginia' was about 1100 miles from New York, one of her side ports was burst open to some extent by the heavy seas which she encountered, and water flowed into the hold through said port." My Lords, that will shew your Lordships sufficiently the character of the allegation on the one side and on the other on that point, and to that I may add, in the statement on the part of the defenders, art. 3, it is said—"When the said vessel sailed from New York on the said voyage she was seaworthy;" and to that there is a denial that the "vessel was seaworthy when she sailed from New York." There is one other statement to which I will refer, in the condescendence; but upon the general averment and denial the first plea in law for the pursuers before the additional pleas was this—"The pursuers having sustained loss and damage to the extent foresaid, through the unseaworthiness of the defenders' vessel, and the failure of the defenders to fulfil the said contract of carriage and safe custody, are entitled to decree for the sum sued for, with interest and expenses."

My Lords, the case came on for a jury trial in Scotland, and the jury found on the issue, which I need not refer to particularly, a special verdict, and that special verdict finds, first, the shipment of the wheat, to be conveyed in terms of the bill of lading set out in the schedule; finds then that the wheat was carried to Glasgow and delivered to the pursuers, "who are the onerous indorsees of the said bill of lading;" that when delivered it was not in the same good order and condition in which it was shipped; then it finds as follows:—That "through the negligence of some of the crew one of the orlop-deck ports of the said steamship was insufficiently fastened, and that in consequence the said sea-water was thereby admitted to the hold after the ship had been five days at sea: Find that, as the ship was loaded, the said port was situated about a foot above the water-line, and that if properly fastened by means of the screws thereto attached, the said port would have been water-tight throughout the voyage: Find that the said sea-water was not admitted to the hold until the morning of the 6th September, and that for the first seven days of the voyage the weather encountered was substantially as set forth in the mate's log," which forms part of the process. And then it finds that if there is damage to be recovered, it is of a certain amount.

Now, my Lords, looking to this special verdict, and looking to that alone, for the facts with which we have to deal, it appears to me that if our attention was confined merely to that special verdict there would be very great incertitude and ambiguity as to what the facts really were. There is mention of a port-hole which at the time the ship sailed was a foot above the water-line. It is stated that there were screws attached to the port-hole, by which it could be fastened, and that if fastened by means of these screws the ship would have been water-tight throughout the voyage. It is found that the port-hole was insufficiently fastened, but when and at what time is not stated in the special verdict. Consistently with this special verdict it may well have been that either of two states of things occurred. Consistently with this verdict, it might have been that there was no want of fastening the port-hole when the ship sailed; that the port-hole may have been unfastened afterwards for any particular purpose, and then left insufficiently fastened, and that all this occurred in the course of the voyage through the negligence of one of the sailors; and if so, probably that would be a matter which would be covered by the exceptions in the bill of lading as a case of negligence occurring during the transit of the goods. Or it may be, that if the port-hole (still looking at this verdict alone) was unfastened at the time of sailing of the ship, the port-hole may have been so situated, and the access to the port-hole such, as that at any moment, in prospect of any change of weather, the port-hole could have been immediately fastened; and that the ship at the time of her departure was perfectly free from any charge of not being adequate for the performance of the voyage which she had undertaken. On the other hand, there is a passage in the condescendence which, if it could be taken along with the special verdict, might raise at all events a suspicion, which in various minds might be more or less strong, that the state of things with reference to this port-hole at the time the ship sailed was such as that the state of the port-hole constituted a degree of unseaworthiness which could not at any moment, without considerable trouble, have been got rid of. My Lords, the passage to which I refer is this:—In the statement on behalf of the defenders in the action, the sixth number, it is said—"It was the duty of the master and company of the vessel to see that the said port was properly fastened before the voyage began, and that it was not interfered with thereafter. The defenders have made every inquiry, but have been hitherto unable to discover the cause of the said side port not resisting the pressure of the seas. The defenders' information is, and they aver, that the master and crew of said steamer did use reasonable care to secure and keep secure said side port, notwithstanding which, or from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, or other persons in the service of the ship ^{and} employed in the stowage of the cargo at New York, for whom the defenders, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, would be responsible, the particular person in fault being to the defenders unknown, the port before mentioned, in the course of the voyage, from the perils of the sea or navigation, was burst partly open as before mentioned, and the damage alleged by the pursuers happened to the wheat." And then follows this statement:—"After the cargo was loaded the inside face of the said port could not be seen or got at without taking out the cargo." Now, my Lords, whether the ship at the time she left New York was or was not in a condition fit to perform the service which she had undertaken with reference to these goods—whether she was or was not “seaworthy” in the sense in which I have used that term—was a question of fact, and in the view which I have taken of the construction of the bill of lading it was a question of fact which lies at the very root of this case. But your Lordships do not find in the special verdict, as I read it, any answer whatever to that question of fact. And, my Lords, although the Court in Scotland thought themselves able to apply the verdict and to enter upon it a judgment for the defenders, and although the appellants in the first instance asked your Lordships here to reverse that judgment and to enter a judgment for them, I think it has come to be admitted in argument on both sides that if the construction of the bill of lading be such as I have submitted to your Lordships it is, there is not here now any finding upon the question of fact whether the ship was or was not seaworthy, upon which judgment can be entered either way. Therefore I fear, although I regret the result, that nothing can be done by your Lordships now but to remit this case to the Court of Session in Scotland, and to direct that a new trial shall be had. On the occasion of that new trial it appears to me that it will be the duty of the learned Judge who conducts it to obtain from the jury an answer to this question of fact, to direct the jury’s attention to those circumstances to which I have referred, and to whatever evidence may be given with reference to those circumstances, and to obtain from the jury an expression of opinion as to whether the ship at the time she left New York was seaworthy in the sense in which I have used the term. Of course, in arriving at that conclusion the precise and accurate consideration of the state of this port will become very material. It may, on the one hand, be that the port, if open when she left New York, was not occasioning any danger whatever to the ship so long as calm or moderate weather prevailed, and it may be that the port was so circumstanced that upon any approaching change of weather it might immediately have been closed and fastened down; or, it may be, on the other hand, that the cargo was so loaded that the fastenings of the port being from the inside, those fastenings were covered over by the cargo and rendered inaccessible, or rendered, at all events, inaccessible without such a removal or change of the cargo as would occupy a considerable time, and could not conveniently take place when the ship was at sea. Those are questions to which the attention of the jury should be directed, in order that they may say, after considering those matters, whether the ship at the time she left was in fact in a condition reasonably fit to perform the service of the conveyance of those goods without danger.

My Lords, the judgment of the Court of Session has been a unanimous judgment, but I do not see that, in point of fact, there was any opinion expressed by the learned Judges in that judgment which is at variance with the law as I understand it, and as I have endeavoured to submit it to your Lordships. What I mean is this;—I do not understand that any of those learned Judges would have said that if the question is, What is the construction of the affirmative part of this bill of lading? they would have placed that construction on any other footing than I have endeavoured to place it. But what it appears to me was the error, if I may respectfully say so, of those very learned Judges was this, that although at one part of the judgment they appear to recognise the construction which I have mentioned of the earlier part of the bill of lading, they seem afterwards to have been entirely occupied with the other part of the bill of lading, with the exceptions in it, and to have assumed

No. 14.

Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Steamship Co.

No. 14. that those exceptions would be sufficient to wipe out or to destroy what was the stipulation in the earlier part of the bill of lading. My Lords, I say that for this reason: I find that the Lord President in the earlier part of his judgment expressed himself thus—"I think it is conceded on the part of the shipowners, the defenders here, that the object of the clause was to save them from all liability implied in the obligation to deliver in like good order and condition, except a liability which might arise from the unseaworthiness of the vessel. If they provided a seaworthy ship, tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and equipped for the carriage of goods, they say that, in consequence of the manner in which the clause of excepted risks is conceived they are free from all other liability." I understand the Lord President to recognise and to approve of that which he calls a concession in argument on the part of the shipowners, and I understand it to be a statement by the Lord President that the shipowners were bound to provide a "seaworthy ship, tight, staunch and strong, well-manned and equipped for the carriage of goods." And, my Lords, that is simply the proposition which I have submitted to your Lordships to be correct in point of law. I do not understand that any of the learned Judges differed from that proposition, and I again say it appears to me that the only miscarriage which took place was that, having so laid down their view of the law, they did not apply it correctly with reference to the verdict which they had before them, and with reference to the exceptions in the bill of lading. My Lords, I submit therefore to your Lordships that this appeal must be allowed to the extent of reversing the interlocutor of the Court of Session, and remitting the case with a declaration that there ought to be a new trial of the case.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I completely concur in the observations of my noble and learned friend. I shall only say that I entirely concur in the view that a shipowner who accepts goods which he is to deliver in good order and condition impliedly contracts to perform the voyage in a ship which is seaworthy. The most persuasive reason and the most conclusive authority combine to establish that which appears to me to be a very plain proposition. In the second place, I have no doubt myself that the words of exception which are contained in the bill of lading in no degree denude the shipowner in this case from the liability so created. There remains a question of fact which is not in any decisive or unequivocal way determined by the special verdict in this case. It is therefore unfortunately necessary that the case should go back, and I entirely approve of the proposal made by my noble and learned friend.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, I also entirely agree with my noble and learned friends who have preceded me as to the law to be applied to this case, and also as to the construction of the bill of lading. It was suggested by Mr Mathew in his able argument that the bill of lading covered risks by way of exception, some of which might occur during the loading of the cargo on board and the stowing of it in the ship. I cannot agree to that construction. It appears to me to be clear on the face of the bill of lading that it represents the goods as already shipped. It is given in duplicate in the ordinary course, and I also find that it is expressly stated by the pursuers in their condescendence that the wheat had been loaded on board the ship before and on the day which is the date of the bill of lading. I therefore quite agree that all the perils which are excepted are perils subsequent to the loading of the wheat on board the ship, and that they are capable of and ought to receive a construction not nullifying and destroying the implied obligation of the shipowner to provide a ship proper for the performance of the duty which he has undertaken. No. 14.

My Lords, I also concur as to the course which it is necessary for your Lordships to take, and in the statement which has been made of the nature of the questions which will have to be investigated when the new jury trial takes place. Of course nothing that is said or done by your Lordships now will preclude the examination of the case upon the evidence of the new trial upon the substance of it. No words which may have been uttered by my noble and learned friends, or, I think, by any of your Lordships, were intended or can be taken to indicate any foregone conclusion as to facts not now before us. But we all agree that, looking to the issues raised and to the nature of the special verdict, those things are not found by the special verdict which are necessary for the satisfactory determination of the case.

July 20, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Steamship Co.

My Lords, my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has submitted his view of the opinions given in the Court of Session. I must own mine is upon that point not precisely the same with that of my noble and learned friend. It seems to me, from the language, particularly of the Lord President and of Lord Shand, that the course which the case really took in the Court of Session was this—It was assumed by those learned Lords, and I should think by all the Lords, that the contract of the shipowner was to provide a seaworthy ship, tight, staunch, and strong, well-manned and equipped for the carriage of the goods, and that if he did not do that there was nothing (I should so read the judgments) in the exceptions in the bill of lading to relieve him from that liability. But what I should myself collect is, that the learned Judges, applying themselves to the special verdict alone, and dealing with the case as if they had nothing to do but necessarily to enter a judgment for the one party or the other, found the special verdict to be insufficient to raise a case of anything more than negligence, default, or error in judgment on the part of the pilot, master, or persons in the service of the ship, and, as consistently with the special verdict that might have been during the course of the voyage, and was not found otherwise, I should conjecture that the learned Lords thought that the onus probandi upon that point lay with the pursuers and not with the defenders, and on that ground entered the judgment in the defenders' favour. Of course, my Lords, I agree with what has been said that that is not a satisfactory or a proper way of dealing with the case where the special verdict does not really find the material fact upon which the whole question turns.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I entirely agree in the course which is proposed to be taken of sending the case down for a new trial, on the ground that this special verdict does not really find the cardinal fact upon which it depends, whether the judgment ought to be for the respondents or for the appellants. I take it, my Lords, to be quite clear, both in England and in Scotland, that where there is a contract to carry goods in a ship, whether that contract is in the shape of a bill of lading or any other form, there is a duty on the part of the person who furnishes or supplies that ship, or that ship's room, unless something be stipulated which should prevent it, that the ship shall be fit for its purpose. That is generally expressed by saying that it shall be seaworthy, and I think also in marine contracts—contracts for sea-carriage—that is what is properly called a "warranty," not merely that they should do their best to make the ship fit, but that the ship should really be fit. I think it is impossible to read the opinion of Lord Tenterden, as early as the first edition of Abbott on

No. 14.

Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Steamship Co.

Shipping, at the very beginning of this century, of Lord Ellenborough following him, and of Baron Parke also, in the case of Gibson v. Small,¹ without seeing that these three great masters of marine law all concurred in that, and their opinions are spread over a period of about forty or fifty years. I think, therefore, that it may be fairly said that it is clear that there is such a warranty or such an obligation in the case of a contract to carry on board ship. In the case of Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company,² which has been referred to, which was the case of a contract to carry passengers upon land, there had been a good deal of reasoning in the Exchequer Chamber to the effect that the obligation there was not to furnish a carriage which was absolutely perfect or land-worthy, but only to furnish a carriage which was fit as far as they could reasonably make it, which is a different kind of contract from what is now supposed. In the case of Kopitoff v. Wilson,³ where I had directed the jury that there was an obligation, I did certainly conceive the law to be that the shipowner in such a case warranted the fitness of his ship when she sailed, and not merely that he had loyally, honestly, and bona fide endeavoured to make her fit. The Court, when it came to be considered, had to see whether that did not clash with the reasoning in Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company, and we all agreed that it was immaterial to decide whether it did or not, because there was nothing in that case to raise the question whether there was an absolute warranty or merely a duty to furnish it as far as could properly be done. Nor, in truth, do I think that here that question would in all probability really arise, for here, if there was such a defect as would make the ship not reasonably fit to carry the wheat across the Atlantic, there can be no doubt that it must have been owing to negligence on the part of the shipowners or of their servants, and cannot be said to have arisen from that kind of latent defect which no prudence or skill could perceive. Now, my Lords, taking that to be so, it is settled that in a contract where there are excepted causes—a contract to carry the goods, except the perils of the seas, and except breakage, and except leakage—it has been decided both in England and in Scotland that there still remains a duty upon the shipowner not merely to carry the goods if not prevented by the excepted perils, but also that he and his servants shall use due care and skill about carrying the goods, and shall not be negligent. That has been determined in several cases, of which *Phillips v. Clark*⁴ is the leading one, and that decision has been followed in several cases. In the case of Moes v. The Leith and Amsterdam Shipping Company,⁵ decided in Scotland, the same thing seems to have been determined, namely, that where there is such an exception, if the shipowner or his servants are guilty of negligence producing the misfortune, they are liable on that account. I think myself that the proper and right way of enunciating it would be, in such a case, to say, if owing to the negligence of the crew the ship sinks while at sea, although the things perish by a peril of the sea, still, inasmuch as it was the negligence of the shipowner and his servants that led to it, they cannot avail themselves of the exception. It matters not whether that would be the right mode of expressing it or not; that is clearly established. They may protect themselves against that, and they do so in many cases by saying—these perils are to be excepted, whether caused by negligence of the ship's crew or the shipowner's servants or not. When they do so, of course that no longer applies.

⁵ 5 Macph. 988, 39 Scot. Jur. 546.

I think that exactly the same considerations would arise here as to the implied duty—the duty which, though not expressly mentioned, arises by implication of law—on the part of the shipowner to furnish a ship really fit for the purpose. If that duty is neglected, and if in consequence of that neglect of duty, and in consequence of the ship not being fit, the ship sinks, as it did in the case of Kopitoff v. Wilson, or as in the case here, as it is alleged—I do not say that it is so, because that is a point not yet determined—the shipowner is liable. If, as is alleged here, a port gives way, and the seas come in and wet the wheat, and if it is in consequence of the ship having started unfit that that mischief is produced, it seems to me to be exactly like the case of Phillips v. Clark, where negligence not provided for by the contract occasioned the breakage or the leakage, which it was said was an exception, but which the Court determined was not an exception of which the shipowners could avail themselves, seeing that it was brought about by their negligence. So here I think that if this failure to make the ship fit for the voyage, if she really was unfit, did exist, then the loss produced immediately by that, though itself a peril of the seas which would have been excepted, is nevertheless a thing for which the shipowner is liable, unless by the terms of his contract he has provided against it.

Now, my Lords, I perfectly agree with what has been said by the noble and learned Lords who have already addressed you on the construction of this contract, that it does not provide at all for this case of an unseaworthy ship producing the mischief. The shipowners might have stipulated if they had pleased (I know no law that would hinder them)—“We will take the goods on board, but we shall not be responsible at all, though our ship is ever so unseaworthy;—look out for yourselves;—if we put them on board a rotten ship, that is your lookout; you shall not have any remedy against us if we do.” I say they might have so contracted, and perhaps in some cases they may actually so contract,—I do not know. Or the shipowner might, and that would have been more reasonable, have said, “I will furnish a seaworthy ship, but I stipulate that although the ship is seaworthy, and although I have furnished it, I shall only be answerable for the vitiation of your policy of insurance, if you have one, in case the ship turns out not to be seaworthy, and I will protect myself against any perils of the seas though the loss should be produced in consequence of or caused by that unseaworthiness.” They might have contracted in that way. I think that when this contract is fairly looked at it appears that they do not so contract as to apply it to this case. I think—and I agree there with the Court of Session—that they have here sufficiently expressed in the contract that they will not be responsible or answerable for the consequences of a loss by perils of the seas, or either of the excepted perils, even though it may be produced by the negligence of the mariners. I think that they have done that, and that is what the Court of Session appear to have thought was all that it was necessary to say. I agree with them that they have done so. But then, my Lords, for some reason or other—I cannot exactly make out what—the Court below lost sight of the fact that if there was a want of seaworthiness in the ship—using the common phrase, which is used as meaning, if the duty or obligation to make the ship reasonably fit for the voyage had not been fulfilled—if there was a want of seaworthiness in that sense, and that want of seaworthiness caused the loss, this contract did not protect the shipowners, and therefore it was incumbent upon them to see whether there was a want of seaworthiness, and whether it did produce the loss. The point was raised on the first plea in law distinctly, and then there were several additional pleas in law in which it was not raised, and it seems to have been lost sight of; and though the issue directed was so worded as to leave this open, it is so worded as to lead me to think that those who drew the issue were not thinking of this point (no doubt it would be open upon the issue, but it is not raised by it), and when there came to be a special verdict it was found that "one of the orlop-deck ports of the said steamship was insufficiently fastened, and that in consequence the said sea-water was thereby admitted to the hold after the ship had been five days at sea;" and then it was found that this port was about a foot above the water-line, and that the weather had been as is described in the mate's log.

Now, I cannot see that this special verdict finds whether or no there was a want of seaworthiness or reasonable fitness to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage or not. I think that is left quite ambiguous and uncertain. I quite agree with what has been said, that it was a question of fact for the jury whether or no the vessel was made reasonably fit to encounter those ordinary perils. I think also that there are some views of the case in which, though it would still be a question of fact for the jury, there could not be much doubt about it one way or the other. If, for example, this port was left unfastened, so that when any ordinary bad weather came on and the sea washed as high as the port, it would be sure to give way and the water come in unless something more was done if in the inside the wheat was piled up so high against it and covered it so that no one would ever see whether it had been so left or not, and so that, if it had been found out or thought of, it would have required a great deal of time and trouble (time above all) to remove the cargo to get at it and fasten it, if that was found to be the case, and it was found that at the time of sailing it was in that state, I can hardly imagine any jury finding anything else than that a ship which sailed in that state did not sail in a fit state to encounter such perils of the sea as are reasonably to be expected in crossing the Atlantic. I think, on the other hand, if this port had been—as a port in the cabin or some other places would often be—open, and when they were sailing out under the lee of the shore, remaining open, but quite capable of being shut at a moment's notice as soon as the sea became in the least degree rough, and, in case a regular storm came on, capable of being closed with a dead light, in such a case as that no one could with any prospect of success ask any reasonable people, whether they were a jury or judges, to say that that made the vessel unfit to encounter the perils of the voyage, because that thing could be set right in a few minutes, and there is always some warning before a storm comes on, so that they would have plenty of time to put it all right, and it would have been put right. If they did not put it right after such a warning that would be negligence on the part of the crew, and not unseaworthiness of the ship; but between these two extremes, which seem to me to be self-evident cases as to what they would be, there may be a great deal of difficulty in ascertaining how it was here. It may very likely be a contested point as to how far the wheat was put against this port. That may be one of the contests, and there may be many others. I agree with what has been already said, that nothing which is said now about unseaworthiness is at all authoritative. Of course it is not laying down the opinion of the House, but what I have said is not even the expression of a final and concluded opinion formed by myself as an individual advising your Lordships. I merely express it as being what I think might be the case. I have no doubt what the result will be; it will be a question, taking the whole circumstances together—was this ship reasonably fit when she sailed to encounter the perils, and was the damage that happened a consequence of her being unfit, if she was unfit? That question will have to be determined upon the whole circumstances and the whole of the evidence. I have merely indicated two extreme cases which I think are quite possible, and in one of which I think it is quite clear that nobody would say she was seaworthy; in the other case I think anyone would say she was seaworthy. These are only two extreme cases; there must be plenty of room for dispute between the two. That being so, my Lords, the special verdict not stating enough to enable us to determine that cardinal fact, upon which, in my mind, it depends whether the appellants or the respondents are entitled to judgment, I think it is impossible to decide either way, and consequently the case must be remitted to the Court of Session to ascertain, in such way as they have the means of ascertaining (a new trial is the only course which occurs to me), whether or no the ship was seaworthy at the time she sailed, and whether the loss was occasioned by the want of seaworthiness, if such want there was.

v. State Line

LORD GORDON.—My Lords, I quite concur with the views expressed by the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me. I think that it is quite impossible for your Lordships to dispose of this case upon the evidence afforded by the verdict of the jury. It is curious indeed, as Mr Benjamin observed in opening the case, that in the very first plea in law this question of unseaworthiness, as affording a ground of claim against the defenders, was stated in the inferior Court—"The pursuers having sustained loss and damage to the extent foresaid through the unseaworthiness of the defenders' vessel, and the failure of the defenders to fulfil the said contract of carriage and safe custody, are entitled to decree for the sum sued for, with interest and expenses." And the very last plea in the case for the appellants, which I see is signed by Mr Benjamin, resumes this plea in the inferior Court, and sets forth that the interlocutor should be reversed, because the respondents' vessel was not, when she started on her voyage, in a reasonably fit condition, as regards a cargo of grain, to encounter the ordinary perils of a voyage from New York to Glasgow; and the damage caused to the appellants was caused by that unfitness. Unfortunately, the advisers of the appellants in the Court below do not seem to have brought before the Court the legal effect of these pleas, and the Court evidently, as it appears from the opinion of the Lord President, took this as conceded; for his Lordship says that—"If they provided a seaworthy ship, tight, staunch, and strong, well-manned and equipped, for the carriage of goods, they say that in consequence of the manner in which the clause of excepted risks is conceived they are free from all other liability." This having been taken as conceded on the part of the defenders, it unfortunately was not made a point of contest, and, as sometimes happens in cases where a keen argument is not submitted to the Court, a point which afterwards turned out to be material was overlooked. That seems to have been what occurred, first, in framing the issue, and, secondly, in framing the special verdict. I think, however, my Lords, that the course which your Lordships have indicated with reference to obtaining further investigation into the facts of the case will enable it to be properly decided. The case will raise some very important principles in point of law, but I do not propose to enter upon these now. I think it is better that they should be reserved for discussion when we have the facts fully before us than that we should state views of the case upon a hypothesis of what may be the result of a future investigation before a jury.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, this case is one in which the pursuers in the action complain of the defenders in respect of their having erected a bridge across the river Leven at a part of that river where they (the defenders) are proprietors on both sides. The pursuers are the trustees of Sir James Colquhoun. The defenders are gentlemen occupying a large manufactory and other works on one side of the river, and they are the proprietors of the land on both sides of the river. Before erecting this bridge they entered into communication with divers persons who might be supposed to be interested in the matter, and amongst others with those concerned with the navigation of the stream. They entered also into correspondence with the author of the present pursuers in respect of title, and from him they obtained a letter, which has been a good deal referred to in the cause, but upon which I think the case will not be found to turn. He said in that letter that provided no injury were done to his fishings and other rights he had no objection to the course they were about to take in erecting the bridge. The bridge was to be erected for the purpose of carrying a railroad over it, and the piers of the bridge were placed in the alveus of the river, and it is, or it was at first, alleged that they were so placed as to injure the rights of the pursuers as to fishings, and their rights also in respect of the navigation of the river. The defenders were said also to injure by these works the towing-path of the river, and in that sense, again, to injure the navigation. I think we may dismiss from our consideration, because it has not been argued at your Lordships' bar—and indeed it made no impression upon the learned Judges in the Court below—that part of the case which referred to damage done to the fishing.

The Lord President, who first gave his judgment in the Court of Session, says—"The only question is, whether the piers of the bridge complained of interfere with the navigation of the river, and upon that ground ought to be removed." And that, my Lords, is the point which, as it appears to me, it is now necessary for us to consider. The Lord Ordinary, and three out of four of the learned Judges who sat in the First Division when they inquired into this matter, were of opinion that injury was either done actually to the navigation of the river, or that such interference had taken place with the alveus of the river as danger might possibly arise to the navigation of the river from the works which had been carried into effect. My Lords, that is a question, as your Lordships will perceive, entirely of fact, and it will only be as such that we can treat it. Lord Mure was of opinion that that matter of fact was established in favour of the defenders, and not against them. When I say "established in favour of the defenders," I apprehend that one may take it to be correct as a point of law, with reference to these works, that the duty is cast upon the defenders of shewing that when they have placed these works in the alveus they will not obstruct that right which is exercised by the public. At all events, I will assume that that burden is thrown upon them, and will consider how far they have or have not discharged it.

The river Leven appears to be a river upon which there is undoubtedly navigation, but not to any very great amount, in the course of the year. The navigation appears to be carried on in what are called scows—large barges I suppose we should call them—the largest being of about 15 feet beam, and the length being some 50 or 60 feet. This navigation has been going on for many years, and two of the witnesses called on the present occasion on behalf of the defenders are persons who have been up and down with every scow or barge which has made the voyage past the place in question since the bridge was erected. The position of the bridge in the river is this—There are upon the river Leven several mills, and arrangements are made at these mills by means of what is called a mill-lade or mill-dam for taking the water off from the river to the works which may require its assistance. That diversion is effected by means of a lade, and the water is guided into its course out of the river and down the lade by means of a weir which is erected for that purpose, of a solid construction, sloping up into the river, and having what the witnesses called a batter or a slope down from its top into the alveus of the river. That is the mode in which these mill-lades are formed. One of these exists some 40 or 50 feet below the bridge, so that anything passing through the bridge would within that short distance find itself abreast of, unless it went into, the mill-lade. That being so, we have further to consider what the navigable channel of the river is; and I think upon that it is established beyond a doubt that except in extraordinary circumstances, such as possibly I may have afterwards to refer to in connection with one piece of evidence, the navigable channel of the river is from a distance of 25 feet, as one of the witnesses for the pursuers, Mr Copland, the engineer, said, to the west of the easternmost pier, which is the particular pier complained of in the progress of this case as interfering with the navigation. Other witnesses, the witnesses for the defenders, said that they put it at a rather greater distance than that; some said 27, others as much as 30 feet distant from the eastmost pier. It is somewhere about that distance. As regards the depth, it is said to be, even when it is not at its highest flow, some 16 feet in that portion of the river I have referred to, which is a depth far greater than that required by any scow navigating the river. That being so, it appears that on the other side—on the eastern side—of the pier, which is the side where the lade is to be found, owing to some effect, I suppose of scour, which may have been produced from the particular arrangements of the lade, or from whatever reason, there is in fact a hole—I can call it nothing else. Some of the witnesses for the pursuers have spoken of that hole as being a portion of the river which they considered anterior to these works a navigable portion of the river. But, my Lords, on the other hand, I think it will be found that the evidence largely preponderates to shew that barges were never in the habit of taking any other course than the course down the western side of the pier and in the deepest channel of the river, and that so far were they from taking any other course, especially towards the east of the pier, that the witnesses tell us that it was considered dangerous to pass by on that side, because if you passed at all near to that portion of the river which would be to the east of the pier, or which the pier itself occupies, you would run a great risk of being carried into the lade, a result which of course would be deprecated by those who were skilled in the navigation of the river.

I shall now briefly refer to the evidence which makes out these points before considering what would be the effect of the law applicable to the state of facts which I consider to be established by the evidence.

I assume, and I consider, the burden of proof to be thrown upon the defenders, and I therefore look to their evidence to see how they have attempted to establish that proof. We first find a witness of considerable importance—one who, I think, is evidently quite impartial in the whole matter—Mr Alexander Neilson. He describes himself as captain of the steamship "Chancellor," belonging to the Loch Lomond and Loch Long Steamboat Company. He says—"I run the 'Chancellor' on Loch Long four and a-half months of the year, and I remain in the service of the company during the winter time in connection with other work. I have been twelve years in the service of the company. For some years we have not required to bring our steamers down from Loch Lomond to Dumbarton for repairs;" and so on. Then he says—"I have been in charge of all the steamers that have been taken down the Leven during the last sixteen years. Before that I owned gabbarts" (that is the same thing as scows) "on the Leven for about twenty years." He is a man of very large experience, and he appears to me to be a very impartial witness. He goes on to say—"I took them up and down very often, and am well acquainted with the navigation of the river. The greatest current I ever saw in the Leven was about six miles an hour. There are a great many catchwaters" (that is what is termed in our southern phrase a weir—the weirs or catchwaters are used to divert the water to the lades) "and erections in the water at the various works along the banks. There are eight separate works down the river, and they all have catchwaters into the middle of the river, and some of them pipes to take off the water. The Leven is navigable on an average for about four months in the year. In September 1875 I examined the new bridge at Dillichip" (that is the bridge in question) "on behalf of the steamboat company, and reported my opinion upon it to the directors. I inspected it two or three times while it was being erected. I measured the bridge, and saw the height of the pillars. So far as they were concerned I saw nothing to interrupt the navigation except that they were two feet too low. I thought that they should be raised to that extent, and reported so to the company. The bridge has since been heightened in conformity with that opinion. I consider that the navigation of the Leven at Dillichip is now as free as ever it was. I think there will be no more risk incurred than was incurred formerly in taking steamboats and scows down the Leven, whatever be the state of the water. The deepest part of the channel" (that I have spoken of) "at the bridge where we used to take boats down was about 27 or 30 feet west of the eastmost pillars." Mr Copland, the engineer examined for the pursuers, does not differ very materially from this distance. He says 25 feet. Captain Neilson continues—"I used to bring steamboats and gabbarts down that way when I navigated the Leven. There is also a deep part near the west pillars" (that is what I call the hole), "but it is out of the channel. In speaking of the deepest part I speak of the navigable channel. (Q.) But it is deeper close in to the bank near Dillichip Bridge? (A.) Yes; I never took a boat down that way, because we could not take the channel at the ford. There is a ford 100 yards below. If we had taken the boat into the deep part near the bank she would have run down into the lade or intake." There is more to the same effect, but I do not think it necessary to weary your Lordships by reading more at length of that evidence, which has been already read and commented upon at the bar. I refer to it as very important, as fixing the point as to whether or not damage is done to the navigation of the river by the works of the defenders.

Now, I think I am justified in saying that as far as this evidence goes upon the matter of fact it appears to me to be established plainly and distinctly that there is no interference with the right of navigation on this river. Mr Neilson spoke of it with reference to the height of the bridge, which was altered on account of his statement that it might interfere with the navigation so far as he was concerned—that is to say, interfere with the top gear of his vessels. And the other witnesses, as well as Mr Neilson, speak positively as to the operations they have performed with the boats in which they have been accustomed to go down the Leven, such as they were. Now, the witnesses on the part of the pursuers state as a matter of opinion—Mr Copland, who is a respectable engineer, no doubt gives it as a matter of opinion—that damage might arise from this occupation of the bed of the river. But I do not set any value upon the evidence given in that direction by the witnesses on the pursuers' side as contrasted with the evidence given by these witnesses who have such a full knowledge of all the circumstances and the facts of the case, and have an actual experimental knowledge of them owing to their having been in every vessel which has been up and down the river since the time when the bridge was built.

Now, the claim made by the pursuers is to have an interdict—that is in fact that it amounts to—or a declarator of their rights. First, they seek by their action to have it declared that the river Leven is a "navigable river, free and open to the public," which it appears to me to be clearly made out that it is. It is open to public navigation in the sense of being open to free navigation on the part of those persons who may require the use of it. Then they seek further to have it declared that the erection of this bridge is an interference with that right. But the point which has weighed most with the learned Judges in the Court below, and which of course your Lordships would feel to be one which will require very great consideration having regard to the very high authority of the learned Judges who have considered the case, is, whether or not the pursuers are entitled to a declarator with reference to the possible damage which may be done to the navigation of the river.

That which appears to have weighed most with the learned Judges in the Court of Session was the case of Bicket v. Morris,¹ decided in your Lordships' House, with reference to obstacles placed in the alveus of the river at Kilmarlock. That case itself was of a totally different character from the case raised here. That was a case of a proprietor on one side of the river having his rights interfered with by the proprietor on the other side making such an erection in the alveus of the river as to effect an alteration of the current of the stream with reference to his own land upon the other side. My Lords, I apprehend that the law applicable to that case would be beyond all possibility of doubt ; neither should I have felt much hesitation anterior to that decision in coming to the conclusion that although each of the two proprietors on the banks of a river is said to have rights up to the medium filum fluminis, neither of those persons may so use those rights with reference to the river, which has been accustomed for all time to run in a certain course, as to alter the course of that river with reference to the property of his neighbour, who is separated from him only by the river, and whose property on the other side of the river is affected by that change.

I think that that case alone would not have weighed so much with the learned Judges in the Court below ; but this consideration weighed much with them : In the course of discussion of that case (Bicket v. Morris) it was more than once thrown out on the one side that there was no appreciable damage done by this change which had taken place in the course of the river, although it was admitted that there had been a change, and that the state of the property on the other side of the river was affected by that change, inasmuch as the river came in a different way to that bank, either more or less abundantly, whichever it may have been. It was affected either by the water being thrown in too great abundance on that side where the land might possibly be wanted for building property or any other particular purposes, and therefore would be rendered unsuitable in its changed condition for those purposes for which it was suitable in its unchanged condition ; or it might be that the water was withdrawn from it, so that that amount of water which the opposite proprietor was entitled to use for various purposes he would not have the means of using. Some extreme cases were put in the course of the argument at your Lordships' bar in that case, and in answer to some of those extreme cases it was said by some of the learned Judges,—How can we say to what extent the mischief may run in case the proprietor may be minded at some future time to exercise his rights in a way in which he may not be exercising them now ?

I have had the advantage of seeing one of your Lordships' opinions upon this case which we are now considering, and I find, not by my own research, but from that opinion, that from a very early period in Scotland—much earlier than in England—that view was taken of the absolute illegality of attempting to alter the condition of your neighbour's property, and that it would not be a sufficient justification of such an alteration to say that your neighbour had never used his property for the purpose which the alteration you proposed to make would interfere with ; the answer being,—You cannot tell for what purpose he may wish to use it at a future time. The case was put in the argument of Bicket v. Morris of putting a pole in the river, and it was asked whether that was interfering with the rights of the riparian proprietors ; and Lord Cranworth said,—“ You must see what effect will be produced by what is done ; the effect of a pole would be inappreciable and de minimis non curat prætor, but if there is any perceptible damage or injury done upon that property then we hold, in accordance with the maxim melior est conditio prohibentis, that the persons who wish to keep things as they are have a right to say, let things stay as they are.

The learned Judges of the Court of Session seem to me to have applied that case of Bicket v. Morris in a manner in which the circumstances of this case and the grievance complained of in this case would not permit it to be applied.

They say, and it appears to me justly, that the right of navigation is a right to be protected like any other right, and you are not entitled to interfere with that right of navigation because what you are now doing may be said not to interfere with any existing mode of navigation or with any existing mode of exercising that right. Now, my Lords, it appears to me that there are two totally distinct and different things—the one is right of property, and the other is the right of navigation. The right of navigation is simply a right of way you must not interfere with in any manner by any course you take. The question seems to be simply this, Does this Dillichip Bridge interfere with that right of navigation as exercised or as capable of being exercised in the stream? A man having a right of way over my field cannot say that I shall not have the power to put swing-gates across his path so as to inconvenience him in walking along it. I cannot set gates to shut up the path in such a way as would interfere with his exercising his right, but if I do not interfere with that it cannot be said that I shall not put up gates. This point is dealt with in the opinion of one of your Lordships which I have had the pleasure of seeing, and therefore I need not dwell upon it. I think we have evidence here which is beyond all dispute evidence of people who speak with regard to the last half century with a perfect knowledge of the river, and they say that the right of navigation has not been exercised to the east of the piers of the bridge. In my opinion the case in your Lordships' House which has weighed very much with the learned Judges in coming to the conclusion to which they have come has no application to this case.

Having come to the conclusion that no injury has been established of which these pursuers have a right to complain, and having had the advantage of the assistance of one of your Lordships in considering the form in which the resolution of this House should be worded, it appears to me that we should do well to find that the river Leven is a navigable river, free and open to the public; that the appellants have no right to execute any works which will interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof, or the free use of the towing-path along the banks of the river for the purpose of navigation; that the works complained of in the summons do not in point of fact interfere with or obstruct the navigation of the river; and with these findings to remit the case back to the Court of Session, with instructions quoad ultra to assoilzie the appellants from the conclusions of the summons, and to find them entitled to the expenses incurred by them in the Court of Session.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, in this case the Lord Ordinary by his interlocutor found that “the river Leven is a navigable river, free and open to the public, and that the defenders have no right to execute any works which will in any way interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof or the free use of its banks and of the towing-path along the banks of the said river for the purpose of navigation,” and “that the piers recently erected by the defenders in the bed of the said river near to the east bank are an obstruction to the free navigation thereof; therefore decerns and ordains the defenders forthwith to remove the said piers.” On appeal to the First Division the Lords by a majority adhered to the interlocutor.

The pursuers (now respondents) had in their summons and condescendence set up a case that there was an obstruction to the towing-path, and also that as proprietors of land on the banks of Loch Lomond, and as owners of the salmon-fishery in the Leven, they sustained a damage, and had a cause of action special to themselves beyond what any other of the public had. This was negatived by the Lord Ordinary, and no appeal having been brought by the pursuers (now respondents) it is, I apprehend, not competent to your Lordships to inquire whether this was right or not. The only appeal is by the defenders from the interlocutors pronounced against them.

The river Leven is an inland stream, and the tide does not flow up to the spot where the piers are erected. And, as is pointed out by the Lord President, the rights of the Crown as regards the soil of the alveus and of the public to navigate are not the same in such a river as they are in the sea or in a tidal estuary.

In the present case, however, there is ample evidence that there had been, at least as long as living memory extended, a user by the public of the navigation in the river during the period of the year when the water was high enough,—that is, according to Mr Smollett, who was called for the defence, on an average, during two-thirds of the year. And the very able counsel who argued for the appellants felt it so impossible to deny that there was evidence of user of this waterway by vessels,—evidence such as, if the question had been as to the user of a land-way by carriages, would have established the public right,—that he abandoned this point; and I do not think any of the noble and learned Lords who have heard the argument entertain any doubt that the interlocutor, so far as it finds that the Leven is a navigable river, free to the public, and that the defenders have no right to execute works which obstruct the navigation, is right.

But the contest was as to the finding of the Lord Ordinary that the piers recently erected by the defenders in the bed of the river near to the east bank are an obstruction to the free navigation of the river, and the conclusion that the defenders should be ordained to remove them. I have come to the conclusion that I ought to advise your Lordships to reverse the finding in the interlocutors on this point.

The nature of the inquiry requires the consideration of two questions, each of mixed law and fact, first, What, just before the piers were erected, was the extent and nature of the public right, and over what space it extended? and when that is ascertained, second, whether the piers are such, and so situated, as to be what in point of law is an obstruction?

I think that the facts are to a certain extent perfectly clear. The place in question is considerably above the highest spot to which the tide ever flows. There is there a curve of the river towards the east or left side of the river, so that the chord of the arc which the river forms is on the west side. The towing-path is, and has always as long back as living memory goes, and certainly for more than sixty years, been on the west or right side. On the east side, from some remote period before living memory, and certainly for at least sixty years, an artificial cut or lade to lead off water to the Dillchip Works (now occupied by the defenders), and a catchwater projecting up the river so as to divert the water into the lade, have existed. This catchwater is between 300 and 400 feet in length.

The present condition of the catchwater is described by a witness, called for the defenders (James Deas) in the following terms:—"That plan was made under my directions. It is an enlarged plan and sections of the river at and near Dillchip Bridge. The catchwater wall is from 8 to 10 feet broad at the base.

It is a rough stone bank, with timber on the inside, and roughly pitched with stones on the outside. It is perpendicular in the inside, and slopes out with a batter to the outside. The water was a little under it the last time I saw it. On the first occasion it was covered. All that was visible was a little broken water on the top cross. I did not measure the perpendicular height of the intake wall, but it would be from 6 to 8 feet." No. 15.

The pursuers' witness, Allan Stewart, on cross-examination, referring to a cross-section made under his directions, says—"On cross-section 17, under the bridge, the deepest part of that is right in front of the lade. If a boat went down there before the bridge was built I think it would be in very great danger of striking the catchwater wall. (Q.) Therefore that was not a part of the channel that could be used for navigation?—(A.) Certainly not exactly at the side of the bridge. It is hard to say how far the pitching of the catchwater wall is carried to the west, as there is very little of it visible, and I have no doubt that for safety it is carried under ground for some distance. I should think the slope of the pitching would come out two or three feet towards the middle of the river. (Q.) Would that bring the edge of the pitching just about the westmost side of the east pier?—(A.) It takes 7 feet to bring the post at the catchwater to the westmost side of the pier. The post is on the east face of the wall. On the same cross-section the deepest part under the main span of the bridge is 50 feet from the west, and 40 feet from the east pier, and the depth is 2 feet 9 inches."

The piers, it is clear, are in water as deep as any part of the channel, and the western side of the lowest of the two piers is about 41 feet from the solid bank as it now is, and about 6 or 7 feet further out than the post which marks the end of the inner wall or the catchwater, and consequently, if the sloping part extends so as to render the navigation impracticable for a distance of 10 feet, the pier is 3 feet to the east side of the impediment; if the sloping part so extends as more than 7 feet, the pier projects on the west side of the impediment. All are agreed that the piers are 30 feet higher up the river than the end of the catchwater, where a post stands. Lord Shand says—"The fact is, that the east piers of the bridge have been put down in a part of this river which is deep enough for navigation purposes at many states of the river, and there can be no doubt that the piers would be an obstruction, and clearly a material and present injury, to the navigation of the river but for the circumstance of the existence of the catchwater, to which reference has already been made. The piers are about 5 feet in diameter, and are solid blocks of masonry from 36 to 41 feet from the west bank, and there is no doubt they are in a depth of water that could be used for navigation. But then it is said that though they would be an obstruction to a great part of the water-way if there was no catchwater there, they are not so in point of fact, because you must take the river as it has existed from time immemorial; and that is, I think, a reasonable contention on the part of the defence."

I do not think it possible to state the point as to which the difficulty arises more clearly than is here done.

If the piers had been placed 20 feet further west than they are it would have been too obvious to admit of argument that they must have been, in point of fact, and at the present time, an obstruction to the navigation. If they had been placed 20 feet further east, so as though in the bed of the river to be quite inside the catchwater, it would, I think, be clear that they would not, in fact, have been at the present time an obstruction to the navigation as it has been used as long as memory goes, but the question of law would have arisen, whether they were illegal because placed in the alveus of the river, where, if (by any possible though improbable change) the catchwater was removed, the space might be useful for navigation. As it is, there is a disputed question of fact which has to be determined on the evidence, viz, whether the navigation was de facto so used and enjoyed that the piers, placed where they are, occasion, at the present time, an obstruction to that navigation.

My Lords, there has been evidence given which renders this a question on which different minds may well come to different conclusions. And, in fact, the Lords of Session have come to different conclusions upon it. The Lord Ordinary did not apparently come to the conclusion of fact which he did without hesitation. He says—"But the defenders maintain that the piers do not obstruct the navigation. On this question the evidence is very contradictory. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary prefers that of the pursuers. The witnesses for the defenders give a very unintelligible account of the manner in which they have been accustomed to conduct their boats between the piers and the right bank of the river. One thing, besides, is very evident, that in descending the river a boat will have less space and time to clear the bridge than to clear the obstruction presented by the defenders' catchwater dyke."

The Lord President says—"The Lord Ordinary's finding, I think, is quite satisfactory in so far as he finds that this river is a navigable river, free and open to the public, and that the defenders have no right to execute any works which would in any way interfere with or obstruct the navigation or free use of its banks and of the towing-path along the bank of the said river for the purposes of navigation, and I need only say, with reference to that last finding, that I should have been inclined to make it a little more extensive than his Lordship has done, because it seems to imply that, in order to entitle the public to complain, they must be in a position to shew that the operations of which they complain do, in point of fact and at the present time, interfere with or obstruct the navigation. I do not think the burden upon the pursuers in an action of this kind is so heavy as his Lordship supposes. On the contrary it rather appears to me that if any man building a bridge over such a river as this fixes his piers in alveo of the river he is in point of fact committing what is an illegality in itself. He has no right to build in the alveus of the river. No man is entitled to build even in the alveus of a small stream, at least without the consent of all the other proprietors who are interested in that stream, and, I think, multo magis, no man is entitled to build anything in the alveus of a stream in which the public have rights of navigation. In short, I am inclined to be of opinion that the doctrine which was applied in the case of Bicket v. Morris is quite as applicable to a river of the description we are now dealing with as it was to a private stream. The principle of that case appears to be, that where there are other parties besides the party complained of who have an interest in a running water it is illegal to build in alveo. It is not enough to say in defence of the operation complained of that it does nobody any harm. It may be that at the present moment the injury may not be foreseen, and yet it may occur, because nothing is so wilful and capricious (if we may use the expression) as a stream of running water, and it is almost impossible to foresee what the effect may be of any interference with the natural flow of such a stream as regards the proprietors further down the stream, or as regards the proprietor opposite to the place where the operation is carried out. Now, in like manner, in the case of a navigable river like this, where there is no great abundance of water, and where the deep part of the channel is but narrow, and there is nothing to spare in the way of room for navigation, it is very difficult to foresee what the effect of any operation of this kind may be in times of flood or in various states of the river. The deep-water channel of a stream like this may shift and vary by the operation of causes with which we are very imperfectly acquainted, and which even experts of the highest skill are unable to foresee, and therefore to put down the pier of a bridge or any other building in the alveus of a river of this kind appears to me to be what I should call a dangerous operation as regards the navigation, even though it cannot be shewn that at the present moment it constitutes an absolute obstruction to that navigation. I have made these observations because I have some little difficulty in saying that upon the evidence before us the preponderance or weight of the evidence is in favour of the pursuers upon the question of fact, whether the piers of this bridge do at the present moment constitute an obstruction to the navigation. It is a narrow case in that respect, and if the pursuers were under the burden of proving as a matter of fact that at the present moment there is an obstruction to the navigation caused by the existence of those piers, I should hesitate to affirm that proposition."

So that it appears that the Lord President would not have found the fact against the now appellants if he had not taken a view of the law which, if correct, rendered it immaterial.

Lord Deas says—"The Crown holds the solum of the tidal part of the river as trustee for the whole public, but in the remaining portion of the river the proprietors of the banks are the proprietors of the solum of the river, and the right of navigation on the part of others requires use to found and support it. In the present case, therefore, I think it incumbent on the pursuers to make out that the works objected to do or may cause obstruction to the kind of navigation which has been prescriptively practised by members of the public; but, on the whole, I think that the proof sufficiently preponderates in that direction. I do not intend to go into the details of the proof. In some respects it is contradictory, but upon the whole, I think the burden of the proof is in favour of there being a certain degree of obstruction at present, and I think it is at all events impossible to say that there is no ground for apprehending obstruction in future. Either of these reasons is quite sufficient to entitle any member of the public interested in the navigation to object to such an erection as we have here, and consequently to justify the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived."

So that he hesitatingly finds that there is a present obstruction, but, agreeing with the Lord President that it is enough if it is impossible to say that there is no ground for apprehending obstruction in future, bases his judgment more on that latter ground.

Lord Mure finds the fact for the defenders.

Lord Shand finds, with some hesitation, that it is proved that in fact there is an obstruction, but, with more positiveness, bases his judgment on taking the same view of the case as is taken by the Lord President.

My Lords, before proceeding to consider what the fact is, I think it expedient to consider whether the law really is as the Lord President and Lord Shand, and to a lesser degree Lord Deas, seem to have thought it was. I have very great respect indeed for the learning and logical acumen of those learned Judges, and I should not differ from them without much consideration. But I have come to the conclusion that they have taken a mistaken view of the principle on which the case of Bicket v. Morris in your Lordships' House, and those Scotch cases which are there affirmed, were decided, or at least have applied it to a case to which, what I think the true principle, does not apply. I think, and submit to your Lordships, that the principle on which they were really decided was, that where any unauthorised erection is a sensible injury to the proprietary rights of an individual, there is injuria for which he might, in a court of law in England, recover at least nominal damages. A Court of equity in England or the Court of Session in Scotland, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, would not order the removal of the erection if convinced that the damage was only nominal, but, where there is an injury to the proprietary rights in running streams, the present injury, now producing no damage, may hereafter produce much. And I understand the principle of Bicket v. Morris to be, that where an erection is a present sensible injuria to the proprietary right of the owner of the other part of the alveus or of the opposite bank of a running stream, he may have it removed, on the ground that there is a present injury to the right of property, if it is impossible to predicate that it may not produce serious damage in future, though the complaining party is not yet in a position to qualify present damage. And, I think, the same principle will apply where the complaining party is not a proprietor ex adverso of the spot where the erection is made, but is a proprietor of land on the banks of the stream below the spot, but so near to it that the erection affects the natural flow of the water on the complaining party's land. But I do not think it was intended to be decided, and I do not think it is the law, that an erection in alveo of a natural stream is illegal per se if all who have property on the banks of the stream consent to the erection. Nor do I think it was meant to be decided, nor do I think it law, that a riparian proprietor on the water of Kilmarnock, or on the water of Irvine, into which it flows ten miles below the town, on whose land the flow of the water would be in no way affected, could have maintained the action against Bicket for altering the line of his building in the town on the waterside, which Morris, the proprietor of the houses and building ground immediately opposite, did maintain, for I think that there would be no injury to the proprietary right of the party complaining, in respect of such land.

Now, the public who have acquired by user a right of way on land or a right of navigation on an inland water have no right of property. They have a right to pass as fully and freely and as safely as they have been wont to do, but unless there is a present interference with that right, or it can be shewn that what is now done will necessarily produce effects which will interfere with that right, there is no injuria, and I think that if there be no injuria the foundation of the right to have the thing removed fails.

My Lords, as the ratio decidendi of this House in Bicket v. Morris is unquestionably binding, I shall proceed to support my view of that decision by argument and authority, and I think it the more necessary to do so as the Lord President, who as Lord Justice-Clerk was a party to that decision, seems now to take a different view of the effect of that decision from that which I take.

My Lords, where the property in the banks of a natural stream above the flow of the tide is in different persons, prima facie, and until the contrary is shewn, the boundary between the properties is the medium filum aquæ. In this respect there is no difference between the law of England and Scotland. And after some diversity of opinion it has, I think, been for many years the settled law of England that the proprietor of land on the bank of such a river has as incident to his property in the land a proprietary right to have the stream flow in its natural state, neither increased nor diminished, and this quite independently of whether he has as yet made use of it, or, as it used to be called, appropriated the water. This can hardly be considered as settled law in England before the case of Mason v. Hill (5 B. and Ad. 1) in 1833. It had been the law of Scotland from a much earlier period. In Bannatyne v. Cranston (Mor. Dict. 12,769, "Property") "it was not found necessary to the pursuer to libel or qualify any use of the burn and water thereof wherein he was prejudiced by the defenders taking in the same, seeing the Lords found that the water running by his land which lay marching contiguous to one side thereof could not be drawn from any part of the land marching thereto without his own consent. For albeit he had no present use thereof, yet he might possibly find thereafter some use for the same." This was in the year 1625. Precisely the same law has been now established in America (Blanchard v. Miller, 8 Greenleaf American Reports, 268) and in England (Mason v. Hill, 5 B. and Ad. 1) without, I think, either the American or English Judges being aware that the Scotch Judges had so long before anticipated their reasoning. This right is subject to the use of the water by those above him, below him, and opposite to him, either acquired by user or such as the general law gives to the riparian proprietors. I refer to the very elaborate judgment of the Court of Exchequer delivered by Baron Parke (in 1851) in the case of Embery v. Owen (6 Exchequer, 367) as containing an exposition of the English law.

In Miner v. Gilmour, in 1858 (12 Moore, P. C. Rep. 156) Lord Kingsdown, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, says,—“It does not appear that for the purpose of this case any material distinction exists between the French and the English law. By the general law applicable to running streams every riparian proprietor has a right to what may be called the ordinary use of the water flowing past his land—for instance, to the reasonable use of the water for his domestic purposes and for his cattle, and this without regard to the effect which such use may have in case of a deficiency upon proprietors lower down the stream. But, further, he has a right to the use of it for any purpose, or what may be deemed the extraordinary use of it, provided that he does not thereby interfere with the rights of other proprietors either above or below him. Subject to this condition, he may dam up the stream for the purpose of a mill, or divert the water for the purpose of irrigation. But he has no right to interrupt the regular flow of the stream if he thereby interferes with the lawful use of the water by other proprietors, and inflicts upon them a sensible injury.”

My Lords, I do not know if the Lord President, in the passage I have already read, means to state that the law of Scotland is that an erection in alveo of a running stream, though in a man's own land, is prima facie illegal, even if it does not alter the flow of the water on any one else's land, nor interfere with the rights of other properties either above or below him, nor with the public right of navigation in another part of the stream. But I think that it was necessary to go so far as this in order to support his conclusion. If such be the law of Scotland it is different from what Lord Kingsdown, in the passage quoted, states to be the law of England and France. I have already read what the Lord President says on this subject, and I cannot agree to it.

The owner of the banks of a non-navigable river has an interest in having the water above him flow down to him, and in having the water below him flow away from him as it has been wont to do; yet I apprehend that a proprietor may, without any illegality, build a mill-dam across the stream within his own property and divert the water into a mill-lade without asking the leave of the propriators above him, provided he builds it at a place so much below the lands of those proprietors as not to obstruct the water from flowing away as freely as it was wont, and without asking the leave of the proprietors below him, if he takes care to restore the water to its natural course before it enters their lands.

It would require strong authorities to lead me to believe that the law of Scotland does give the proprietors on the banks of the stream a right to act the part of the dog in the manger to such an extent as to hinder this. None were cited at the bar, and I find that in the Magistrates of Linlithgow v. Elphinstone (Kames' Decisions, 332), it is laid down that "a man who builds a mill is entitled to make an aqueduct, provided after using the water for his mill he restores it to the river from whence it was taken. This right he has from the law of nature without the aid of prescription." The Lord Advocate admitted that he understood the law of Scotland to be that if the same person is proprietor of the ground on both sides of a river in which there is no right of navigation he can change its channel as he pleases, provided he restores it to its old channel before it leaves his ground. That is of course subject to this qualification, that it flows out of his ground into the lands below as it was wont to flow, neither increased nor diminished in quantity or quality or direction. There have been several Scotch cases in which a proprietor on one side of a river had been held entitled to have a new erection in alveo removed, but in every one of them the person complaining of the erection was one who owned land against which the new erection directed a flow of water greater than had been wont to flow on it before. In Menzies v. Breadalbane (3 Wilson and Shaw, 235), Lord Eldon seems to me to point out with great clearness that it was against such a proprietor who is prejudiced, and as I think against such a proprietor alone, that the erection was unlawful. He first points out that it was clear in fact that if the embankment should be continued as it was projected, it would have the effect of throwing the ordinary flood-streams of the river off the lands of Lord Breadalbane and on the lands of Sir Neil Menzies; and then says (p. 243)—"Now, with reference to the law of Scotland, this is perfectly clear, that a superior heritor cannot divert any part of a stream to the prejudice of an inferior heritor. It is also clear that an inferior heritor cannot do that which shall cause the water to stagnate to the prejudice of the superior; that is acknowledged to be clear law. But it is said, that applies only to the alveus of the course. But it does not appear to me that there is any solid ground for this distinction. The ordinary course of the river is that which it takes at ordinary times; there is also a flood-channel. I am not talking of that which it takes in extraordinary or accidental floods; but the ordinary course of the river in the different seasons of the year must, I apprehend, be subject to the same principle." He concludes that Lord Breadalbane in that case ought not to be allowed to carry on his work in what (if I may be allowed to coin a word to express Lord Eldon's idea) was the flood alveus of the river, to the prejudice of Sir Neil Menzies, but that the interdict as craved was too extensive, and he would prepare a judgment with the proper qualification. That deliberately prepared judgment is as follows:—"That the respondent ought to be prohibited and interdicted from the further erection of any bulwarks or any other opus manufactum upon the banks of the Tay which may have the effect of diverting the stream of the river in times of flood from its accustomed course and throwing the same upon the lands of the appellant." I cannot think that Lord Eldon would have given a similar judgment against works of Lord Breadalbane in the accustomed course, either in times of flood or in summer, in favour of a proprietor whose lands lay on the Tay below Dunkeld, and on whose lands the diverted waters could not be thrown.

It remains to see if there is anything in the judgment in Bicket v. Morris, and above all in the opinions of the noble and learned Lords who advised your Lordships' House on that occasion, inconsistent with this view of the law. I think there is not.

There certainly was nothing in the facts of that case to call for a judgment inconsistent with it. The pursuer and defender were proprietors of the opposite sides of the Kilmarnock Water where it flows through the town of Kilmarnock—where the land is building land, and every foot is or may be of value. The defender had built, and after warning persisted in building, his wall into the course of the stream, and thereby necessarily diverted the water and threw it on the pursuer's land. The point made was, that this could not be held to the prejudice of the pursuer, unless he could shew that damage had actually been occasioned. As to this the Lord Justice-Clerk, now the Lord President (Court of Session report, 2 Macph. 1089), says,—“I entertain no doubt that a party in the position of the defender here is not entitled to make any erection in alveo; but then, at the same time, if it could be shewn that the party complaining of a very slight encroachment upon the alveus was doing so for the mere purpose of annoyance—in emulationem vicini—not under any apprehension of danger to himself or of damage to his property, but merely for the purpose of asserting his legal right up to a definite line—if it could be shewn that the work had been accidentally extended into the alveus, I am not prepared to hold that such a work would be illegal.” My Lords, I pause here to observe that on the view of the facts in the present case which I take, and which I understand the Lord President also to take, this is an apt enough description of the present case. He then goes on—“But then the question comes to be, whether the pursuer in this case, though he cannot (and that is the fair result of the proof) shew that any damage has actually been occasioned by the erection of this wall, is not in a position to say that an injury has been done to him because the operation involves a certain risk of damage. There is nothing the operation and action of which is more uncertain than running water. . . . I think, therefore, looking to the nature of the subject, and to the fact that this is not an encroachment of an inch or two, or any such impalpable encroachment as that, but that it is an encroachment clearly established to be of considerable size, and certainly calculated to effect some deviation in the course of the water, that the opposite proprietor, the pursuer, is well entitled to say, ‘I apprehend risk to my interest; I apprehend that my property may be affected by the consequence of this diversion of the stream.’” And the interlocutor appealed against was as follows:—“Find that the erection complained of by the pursuer is an erection in the alveus of the water of Kilmarnock ex adverso of the pursuer's property, and has the effect of diverting to a certain extent the flow of the water, and is therefore an illegal encroachment on the rights of the pursuer”—a conclusion of law which, if the facts were as stated above, I think irresistible. It then proceeds to order the removal of the erection, the propriety of which would depend on the various considerations stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the passage I have just read.

On appeal, Lord Chelmsford (the Lord Chancellor) says (L. R. 1 Scotch Appeals, p. 53, 4 Macph., H. L., p. 47)—“It is in respect of their property in the land that the pursuers dispute the right of the defendant to encroach on the river;" and afterwards—"The proprietors upon the opposite banks of the river have a common interest in the stream, and although each has a property in the alveus from his own side to the medium filum fluminis, neither is entitled to use the alveus in such a manner as to interfere with the natural flow of the water. . . . It seems to me clear that neither proprietor can have any right to abridge the width of the stream, or to interfere with its regular course; but anything done in alveo which produces no sensible effect upon the stream is allowable. It was asked in argument whether a proprietor on the banks of a river might not build a boathouse upon it? Undoubtedly that would be a perfectly fair use of his rights, provided he did not thereby obstruct the river or divert its course; but if the erection produced this effect the answer would be, that, essential as it might be to his full enjoyment of the river, it could not be permitted" (that is, as I think is implied by Lord Chelmsford, though not expressly said, if the proprietors of that part of the river where the course is impeded or diverted object). He goes on—"A fortiori, when the act done is the advancing of solid buildings into the stream, not in any way for the use of it, but merely for the enlargement of the riparian proprietor's premises, which must be an infringement upon the right and interest of the proprietor on the opposite bank, any operation extending into the stream itself is an interference with the common interest of the opposite riparian proprietor, and therefore the act being prima facie an encroachment the onus seems properly to be cast upon the party doing it to shew that it is not an injurious obstruction"—which I again think must by implication mean an obstruction injurious to the opposite riparian proprietor, with whose rights it is an interference.

Lord Westbury had, in the course of the argument, said—"If I build a boathouse, though it injures no one, it would seem that any riparian proprietor may complain." He seems to have (in my opinion very justly) thought that if the pursuer's argument went so far as this it could not be sound. But on consideration he found that it did not go so far. And he says—"I am convinced that the proposition, as it has been laid down in the Court below, and as it has received the sanction of your Lordships' judgments, is one that is founded in good sense, and ought to be established as matter of law."

In my view of the case, what was laid down in the Court below, and received the sanction of this House, was that the pursuer and defender being owners of opposite properties on the Kilmarnock Water, each therefore was—there being nothing to shew the contrary—proprietor of the alveus up to the medium filum aquæ, and each had, as incident to his property, the right to insist that the regular flow of the water should continue on his side as it was wont to flow, which in ordinary times would be a benefit; and that nothing should be done to obstruct the regular flow of water on the other side of the stream, so as to cast more water on his side than had been wont to flow, which, at least in times of flood, would be a burden. The defender had, without any right, built an encroachment on his side of the river, which necessarily caused more water to flow on the pursuer's side, and though that encroachment was small, it was such as, in a small stream, to make a sensible alteration in the flow. That was an injury to the proprietary rights of the pursuer, but he was not able to qualify present damage. The decision of the Court of Session was that this was an injury to the proprietary rights of the pursuer, whether he could qualify damage or not, and that he was entitled to insist on the erection being removed, it being from the nature of the property (building No. 15. land), and the nature of the right infringed, highly probable that there would be damage. All that was said as to the impossibility of telling what a stream of running water would or might do was, in my opinion, relevant only to the question whether there was such an absence of damage as to lead the Court, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, to refuse to interfere. July 30, 1877.

Orr Ewing
and Co. v.
Colquhoun's
Trustees.

It was said in argument in the present case that whether the stream was navigable or not made no difference as to the rights of the riparian proprietors, and that in England at least, it made no difference whether the tide flowed or not. I agree to this. But on the question whether an erection on the alveus of the stream is of sufficient magnitude to cause a sensible alteration of the flow of the water, I think (though it is unnecessary for this case to consider how that may be) that the magnitude of the stream may be of great importance. The river Amazon is many miles wide, and, assuming the law of Brazil to be the same as that of this country, I think a proprietor of land on the one bank of a stream of that width would not be in a position to require one on the opposite shore to remove an encroachment of one or two feet into the river, for it would do him no sensible injury, though in the narrow Kilmarnock Water such an encroachment did do the opposite proprietor sensible injuria, which, especially seeing it was in a town, and was or might be building land, was very likely to produce substantial damage, though he might not as yet be able to shew present damage.

In the case of Attorney-General v. Lord Lonsdale (L. R. 7 Equity, 377) the obstruction was in a tidal river, but it occupied one-third of the bed of the river. In Attorney-General v. Terry (L. R. 9 Chancery, 423) there was an actual occupation by the piles put in by the defendant of part of what was used for the navigation and wanted for the navigation. The Master of the Rolls intimated an opinion that the Court of Equity might order the piles to be removed, though doing no present damage to the navigation, if there might be damage hereafter, I apprehend on the ground of the piles being placed on the soil of the Crown, and therefore a wrong to the Crown. How that may be in such a case it is unnecessary to consider. I think it clear law in England that, except at the instance of a person (including the Crown) whose property is injured, or of the Crown in respect of an injury to a public right, there is no power to prevent a man making an erection on his own land, though covered with water, merely on a speculation that some change might occur that would render that piece of land, though not now part of the water-way, at some future period available as part of it. I think that the land being covered by water is in such a case a mere accident, and that the defenders are as much at liberty to build on the bed of the river (if thereby they occasion no obstruction) as they would be to build on an island which might at some future period be swept away. And, with every respect for the judgment of the learned Lords of Session, from whom I differ, I advise your Lordships to hold that there is no such power in Scotland.

My Lords, on the question of fact I would not lightly come to a different conclusion from the Court below if they had been unanimous, or even if the Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses and their demeanour, had formed a strong opinion on the result of the evidence. But, as appears from the passages I have read, in the present case the finding in fact comes before your Lordships without any such prestige. And, as it seems to me, on such a question as this, the evidence of the surveyors and engineers is of very great weight as to the condition and depth of the river, and the position and size of the piers, but, in my mind, of very little weight as to the mode in which the navigation by vessels floating down the stream without any locomotive power was used. No one of them pretends to have any practical knowledge of such navigation, and it is too exceptional a kind of navigation to have become part of the general knowledge of an engineer.

Of the practical men who were called on both sides, Dugald Macfarlane (called for the pursuers) says distinctly—"If we go to the west side of the east piers of the bridge we keep clear of the intake and catchwater. If we steered straight from the piers we would certainly go on the catchwater."

John Russell says—"That the piers are just where our proper channel was where we went up and down." And Neil Black says nearly the same thing. But the cross-sections made on behalf of both parties shew that the preferable part of the channel is at all events west of the piers, so that I think these witnesses prove too much. I think the other witnesses for the pursuers are all persons conversant with the towing of boats up the stream, not with the manner in which boats were conducted down the stream. On the other hand, George Macfarlane and John Stewart, who have had the conduct of every boat that went down since the bridge was built, and certainly are persons of much experience, are positive that in taking boats down they never went nearer the intake than 15 or 20 twenty feet to the west of it, so as to clear the catchwater. Their evidence, if believed, shews that the spot where the piers now stand was avoided by those who managed the boats.

The Lord Ordinary seems to have distrusted their evidence, because he thinks the account they give of the manner in which they have been accustomed to conduct their boats unintelligible—I presume referring to their statement that loaded boats have steerage-way and answer the helm, and also, as they phrase it, steer themselves or keep the channel, whilst light boats require to be poled. All agree that such is the fact, and if I were bound to find a theoretical reason for it I should infer that in such a stream as the Leven the upper and the lower strata of water do not flow with a uniform velocity, and that there may be something in the nature of an underflow off the banks. But I am not inclined to reject the evidence of practical men as to a fact merely because they give a bad theoretical reason for it and I am not able myself to furnish the right one. I have been told that some years ago the pilots in the English Channel uniformly asserted that there was current setting toward the French shore, and to allow for that supposed current they always steered to the north of the course which by the chart and compass they should have held. It was ascertained that there was no such current, and some ships were lost because their commanders disregarded the rule of the pilots, because their reason for it was wrong. On further investigation it was found that the deflexion of an unadjusted compass from the action of the iron in most ships was such as make it right when the ship's head lay either east or west to steer to the north of the course by chart as indicated by that compass. The pilots were quite right in the fact which they had observed, but quite wrong in their reason. Whether what I have been told is accurate or not it is a good illustration of what I mean.

I think therefore that the balance of evidence is in favour of the piers being out of the channel where a right of way had been acquired by user, and I think that the Court, before ordering the defenders to incur the heavy expense of pul ing down a bridge erected in the bona fide belief that it was no obstruction, No. 15. ought to be satisfied affirmatively that it is an obstruction.

There is one point more which I should mention—something done out of a highway altogether may be a public nuisance if it renders the use of the highway less safe; for example, if an excavation is made for the purpose of erecting a new house close to a public highway, and left unfenced, so that persons using the way might, if accidentally deviating a little from the way, fall into it, it is a nuisance—(Barnes v. Ward, 9 Com. B. 420). But the neglect of duty is not in making the pit, but in leaving it unfenced. A Court of Equity in such a case would not order the defender to fill up the excavation if he put up sufficient fencing to make it safe. Lord Shand points out that a vessel accidentally deviating from its intended course would now strike a dangerous obstacle, which formerly was not there. Perhaps, as things are, the defenders would be responsible for the consequences of an accident of this sort if it happened; but the conclusion, if such a nuisance was proved, would be, not that they must remove the pier, but that they should put up a fender of the kind suggested by Mr Copland in his evidence. This, however, was not asked for by the pursuers.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed, with costs. I agree that the judgment should be as moved by my noble and learned friend who has preceded me, according to the suggestion of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Gordon).

My noble and learned friend Lord O'Hagan, who heard the argument, but is disabled by a slight accident from attending your Lordships' House and voting on this occasion, requests me to say that he has perused this opinion and concurs in it.

LORD GORDON.—The building of the bridge now in question was commenced in March 1875, and the east piers had been erected in the alveus of the river and completed by September, and the whole frame of the bridge is said to have been completed by the end of the year. The respondents on 31st December 1875 presented a note of suspension and interdict against the appellants, to have them interdicted from erecting the bridge, which had by that time been erected, and on 26th January thereafter the respondents raised the present process of declarator, in which they for the first time allege injury to public rights. But while doing so they set forth the injury done to their patrimonial rights as the main ground they have for seeking the removal of the bridge. They say in the fourth article of their condescendence that the erection of the pillars will obstruct the passage of salmon up and down the river; and in the fifth article they state,—“The most material interest which the pursuers have in the matter is the effect the bridge, as it is being constructed, will have on the value or return from the estate under their charge. The erection of the bridge will materially interfere with the transmission of the produce from the farms and of goods to them. These articles will not be transmitted as conveniently and cheaply as hitherto, but will have to be carried by road or rail; and the value of the lands will be diminished, and the rents to be obtained lessened. The pursuers have been informed and believe that the impediment which the bridge will cause in the conveyance of wood from the pursuers' lands down the Leven will prevent merchants from giving the same price for it as formerly. As a considerable quantity of wood from the estate is likely to be in the market in a few years, amounting in value to several thousand pounds, any reduction of price will be a serious loss to the trust-estate." The respondents also allege that "the erection of the pillars for the bridge on the towing-path will interfere with the towing of vessels, inasmuch as the horses will not be worked with the same freedom as formerly, and the passage of vessels, or at least of the scows or gabbarts, up and down the river."

These are the allegations of damage on which the summons is based, and on these the respondents seek to have it found and declared "that the river Leven throughout its course from Loch Lomond until it falls into the river or Firth of Clyde at Dumbarton is a navigable river, free and open to the public; that the defenders (appellants) have no right to execute any works or obstruct the navigation thereof, or the free use of its banks and of the towing-path along the bank of the said river for the purposes of navigation; and that the defenders (appellants) have no right to erect any bridges, piers, or other works therewith connected, which will in any way injuriously affect the rights and interests of the pursuers (respondents) as proprietors of salmon-fishings in the said river Leven and in Loch Lomond;" and then the summons concludes to have it found and declared that the works complained of do and will obstruct the free navigation of the river and use of the towing-path to the injury of the respondents, and will also injuriously affect their salmon-fishings, and should therefore be removed.

The proof has not supported the respondents' allegations of injury to patrimonial rights and to the towing-path—indeed the proof is in direct opposition to the allegations. Accordingly the respondents do not now contend that the patrimonial rights, which in their summons they alleged were materially affected, have, in point of fact, been so affected, and therefore it is unnecessary further to advert to the allegation of injury to the navigation by the alteration of the towing-path, as that is also now admittedly out of the case. The only point now really at issue in the case is the finding of the Lord Ordinary, which has been adhered to by the Court, that the piers recently erected by the appellants in the bed of the river near to the east bank are an obstruction to the free navigation of the river, and that in consequence they should be removed.

The appellants did not, in your Lordships' House, dispute that the Leven is a navigable river, free and open to the public. But the river is capable of very limited navigation, the only vessels which use it being the few scows or gabbarts referred to on the record, and occasionally, when the river is in flood, the Loch Lomond steamboats on their way to and from Dumbarton for repairs. The fact that the Leven is a navigable river, free and open to the public, infers that the appellants have no right to execute any works which will interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof, or the free use of the towing-path along its bank for the purpose of navigation. I think it appears that there are several other bridges having piers in the Leven.

The Leven during the greater part of its course is a fresh water stream, and it is so at the point where the bridge in question has been erected. The alvens of such fresh water rivers belongs to the proprietors of the properties along their banks. Where such a river is navigable, free and open to the public, the right which the public has in such a river is substantially a mere right to use the river for the purposes of navigation, similar to the right the public may have to passage along a public road or footpath through a private estate. In the case of Galbraith v. Armour, in this House (11th July 1845, 4 Bell's Appeals, 374), Lord Campbell said,—“I must express my clear opinion that by the law of Scotland, as well as by the law of England, the soil of the public highways is presumed to be in the conterminous proprietors, and that if a public highway is established by usage over the land of another the soil is still his, with all his former right, subject to the public servitude which he has suffered to be established ;" and Lord Brougham stated that he entirely agreed in the views stated by Lord Campbell. But though the public has no right of property in such rivers or roads they have a right to object to any obstruction being placed in the river or road which interferes with or obstructs the use of them to which they are entitled.

But I do not agree with the finding in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor that the piers recently erected by the appellants in the bed of the river near to the east bank are an obstruction to the free navigation thereof. This is a finding of fact which depends on the evidence. I do not mean to refer particularly to that evidence, because it has been fully adverted to by Lord Blackburn. But I have carefully considered it, and I agree in the view of it which your Lordship on the woolsack and his Lordship have taken, and I think it is of importance to keep in view that the Judges in the Court of Session were divided in opinion in regard to it. I concur in the opinion of Lord Mure, who goes fully into the facts of the case, that it has not been proved that the piers in the bed of the river do de facto obstruct the navigation of the river.

It is contended by the respondents that it is not necessary for them to establish by evidence that the piers in the bed of the river do at present obstruct the navigation, and that it is sufficient if it is shewn that the erection may do so at some future time and under some change of circumstances. The majority of the Judges in the Inner-House of the Court of Session have adopted this view, and they found strongly on the case of Bicket v. Morris. But that was a case between two conterminous proprietors having property on the opposite sides of a small stream flowing through the town of Kilmarnock, and each having a right of property ad medium flum of the stream, while as regards the stream itself there was a common interest which entitled each to object to any operation which might interfere with the regular flow of the water. This is very clearly and fully brought out in the opinions of the Judges of the Court of Session in the report of the case, 20th May 1864 (2 Macph., 1082).

The case of Bicket v. Morris appears to be quite in accordance with the law laid down in this House in the prior case of Menzies v. Lord Breadalbane, July 4, 1828 (3 Wilson and Shaw, 235), the rubric of which is,—"Held (varying the judgment of the Court of Session) that an heritor was not entitled to erect a bulwark or any other opus manufactum on the banks of the river Tay which might have the effect of diverting the stream of the river in times of flood from its accustomed course, and throwing the same upon the lands of an opposite proprietor, although it was alleged that the bulwark was intended to protect the heritor's lands from the flood." It was contended there that the bulwark, if allowed to be finished, must have the necessary effect of turning the great body of water which formerly went down upon the south side of the channel towards the north, upon the complainer's (Sir Neil Menzies) property, and thus overflowing the lands upon that side in a much greater degree than formerly. The House ordered and adjudged "that the respondent ought to be prohibited and interdicted from the further erection of any bulwark or any other opus manufactum upon the banks of the river Tay which may have the effect of diverting the stream of the river in times of flood from its accustomed course, and throwing the same upon the lands of the appellant." Lord Eldon, in comparing the law of England and Scotland, said,—“This case must be decided by the law of Scotland. Now, with reference to the law of Scotland, this is perfectly clear, that a superior heritor cannot divert any part of a stream to the prejudice of an inferior heritor. It is also clear that an inferior heritor cannot do that which causes the water to stagnate to the prejudice of the superior. That is acknowledged to be clear law.”

The cases of Bicket v. Morris, supra, and Menzies v. Breadalbane, 3 W. and S., 235, as well as the cases of Farquharson v. Farquharson, 1741, M. 12,779, and Magistrates of Aberdeen v. Menzies, 1748, M. 12,787, which were also referred to as authorities for having the piers complained of in the present case removed, were all cases between adjoining or ex adverso proprietors. There was no question of navigation involved in any of these cases; neither was there any case of the public right. The right of a conterminous proprietor in a stream dividing his property from that of his opposite neighbour is, in my opinion, very different from that with which your Lordships are now dealing. The Lord President seems to think there is no difference in principle between the private rights of conterminous proprietors and those of the public. He says,—“I do not understand that the case of Sir James Colquhoun's trustees is based upon the notion that they have a private right here, as distinguished from that of any other member of the public. But it appears to me that the distinction is of no consequence in the application of the legal principle. The proprietor on the banks of a stream has an interest to prevent an erection in the alveus, because it may interfere with the flow of the stream, and so injure him. But it is not because he is a proprietor on the banks of the stream, but because, being a proprietor on the banks of the stream, he has an interest in the water, that he has a title to complain, and it is because the public have a right in the water that they, I think, have a title to complain. The title is not so much that of proprietorship as of interest in a running water, and in that respect the title of the complainers here, and the title of the complainer in Bicket v. Morris, is identical in principle.”

With great respect for his Lordship's opinion, I cannot agree with his Lordship in the view that there is no difference in principle between the rights of conterminous proprietors and the right of the public. I think that the interests which adjoining proprietors have in a stream are numerous, both in the water itself and in regard to the benefits or injuries which it may cause to the proprietors, and that these interests give them a right to complain and seek the removal of any impediments to the flow of the river.

But, in my opinion, the interests of the public in such a case as your Lordships are considering are very different from those of conterminous proprietors. The rights of the public are of a limited nature. They possess no right of property in the water itself. They have a right to the use of it only for the purpose of navigation. They have no right as regards the flow of the water or withdrawing of water, if the right of navigation is not affected. If that right is not interfered with they are not, in my opinion, entitled to complain of operations by proprietors for the beneficial use and occupation of their properties. I think, therefore, that the principles involved in cases between conterminous proprietors are inapplicable to the present case.

The Lord President in his opinion says—“The right of the public over a river of this class (that is, of a non-tidal river) is more like a right of way than the right of the public, which is represented and protected by the Crown in the case of a navigable river where the tide ebbs and flows; and I am very much disposed to deal with this case as if it were just a right of way along this river—by means of the river—where it is fitted for purposes of navigation.” I agree with his Lordship that the right in question is very much the same as a right of way, and I therefore think that the principle which was applied by the Second Division in Sutherland v. Thomson, 29th February 1876 (3 Rettie, 485), has an application to the present case. In that case the question related to swing-gates which had been erected across a public footpath; and there the Court held “that these gates were necessary for the proper use of the respondent’s farm, and were so constructed as not to be in any material degree injurious or obstructive to the public in the free use of the path,” and the Court found “in point of law that the respondent was entitled to erect said gates across the footpath, and that the appellant was not entitled to remove or destroy the same.” Lord Ormisdale, in delivering his judgment in that case, after referring to the case of Galbraith v. Armour, before referred to, and to the case of The Marquis of Breadalbane v. Macgregor, in this House, 14th July 1848 (7 Bell’s Appeals, 43) (in which a right was claimed by the public to have stances on a drove road for cattle using the road to rest and pasture upon, and was repelled) said—“If the public, then, has a mere right to pass over the road, and if the solum or ground passed over belongs to the conterminous proprietor, it would be a strong thing to hold that the proprietor, or his tenant with his leave and in his right, is not entitled, for the protection and service of his estate, to put up gates which do not unnecessarily or in any material degree obstruct the public in the exercise of their right of passage. No authority was cited in support of any such proposition. On the contrary, there is ample authority, I think, in the opposite direction;” and then his Lordship refers to three cases in regard to gates across public roads, which he holds to support his proposition.

Lord Gifford in Sutherland’s case said—“In reality a public right of footpath is really the same as a servitude right, excepting that the dominant tenement is the whole kingdom and not a special subject or estate, and no good reason seems to exist why the equitable rights of use which the law secures to the proprietor of a servient tenement should not be given to the proprietor of an estate burdened with a public footpath, provided only its use as a public footpath is not interfered with. It seems to follow from the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Galbraith v. Armour that the solum of the line of footpath is in the landlord of the ground, and not in the Crown; the public have nothing but a mere right of free passage over or through the lands which the respondent in the appeal occupies, and which belong to the Earl of Kinnoull. I am therefore of opinion in the present case that the respondent is entitled, in order to the enjoyment of his land for pasture, to put up such swing-gates or wickets as, while they will prevent his cattle from straying, will not impede the public right of way.”

The case of Grant and Others v. The Duke of Gordon, 9th March 1781 (Mor. 12,822), which had reference to the floating of timber from the Highlands down the river Spey to the sea, is entitled to consideration in the decision of the present case. It was a question between the upper proprietors of the river Spey and the Duke of Gordon as to the rights of the latter as proprietor of a cruive for salmon-fishing in the river near the sea. The report of the case bears—and the judgment was affirmed by your Lordships’ House on 20th February 1782—that the Court “considered a river by which the produce of the county could be transported to the sea to be a public benefit, entrusted to the king as pater patriæ for the behoof of his subjects in general, which could neither be given away nor abridged by him; and that this transportation, as the chief and primary use of the river, if incompatible with the cruive-fishing, would prevail over it. They were, at the same time, of opinion that those rights were not incompatible if not emulously used, and therefore proceeded to fix certain regulations according to which they were to be exercised."

This case is of importance in so far as, while it recognises a right of floating timber down the river as a quasi-navigable public right, and as the chief and primary use of the river, and which, if not compatible with the cruive-fishing, would prevail over it, the Court at the same time held that that right of navigation was not so absolute that it was not subject to equitable restrictions when in competition with other rights. And accordingly the right of the upper proprietors was held subject to restriction and limitation as regards the periods during which it could be exercised, a restriction which could not have been recognised by the Court if the right of navigation had been held to be absolute and not subject to equitable limitations.

I am of opinion that the appellants are entitled, as in a question with the respondents as members of the public, to the full and free use of their property, and to erect a bridge connecting their property on the one side of the river with their property on the other. The whole of the intervening alveus of the river is their property, and the appellants were entitled to erect piers in the river, provided those piers did not obstruct the navigation. I think it has not been proved that the piers which have been erected do in point of fact, having regard to their position with reference to the catchwater dyke, obstruct the navigation of the river, and therefore I am of opinion that the respondents have no right to demand their removal.

The views upon which I proceed in advising your Lordships are founded upon what I consider to be the law of Scotland, as found by your Lordships in previous Scotch cases. I observe that Lord Shand in his opinion refers to two English decisions as explaining the opinions of English Courts with reference to the case of Bicket v. Morris. But it is necessary to bear in mind that these cases had reference to the rights of the public in tidal rivers, and according to the law of Scotland, as well as in England, the principles applicable to tidal rivers differ from those applicable to rivers above the influence of the tide; and in these cases the Attorney-General, as representing the right of property of the Crown in the alveus of the water, was a party as relator.

I concur in the motion that the appeal should be sustained, and the interlocutors complained of recalled, with costs. I think the proper order is to recall the interlocutors appealed against; to find that the river Leven is a navigable river, free and open to the public; that the appellants have no right to execute any works which will interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof, or the free use of the towing-path along the banks of the river for the purpose of navigation; that the works complained of in the summons do not in point of fact interfere with or obstruct the navigation of the river; and with these findings to remit the case back to the Court of Session, with instructions quoad ultra to assoilzie the appellants from the conclusions of the summons, and to find them entitled to the expenses incurred by them in the Court of Session.

THE following judgment was pronounced:—"Ordered and adjudged, that the interlocutors complained of be reversed, and the Lords find that the river Leven is a navigable river, free and open to the public; that the appellants have no right to execute any works which will interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof, or the free use of the towing-path along the banks of the river for the purpose of navigation; that the works complained of in the summons do not in point of fact interfere with or obstruct the navigation of the river; and with these findings it is ordered that the cause be, and the same is hereby remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with instructions quoad ultra to assolzie the appellants from the conclusions of the summons, and to find them entitled to the expenses incurred by them in the Court of Session; and it is further ordered that the respondents do pay, or cause to be paid to the said appellants, the costs incurred by them in respect of the said appeal," &c.

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

1876-7.

JOHN PATERSON, Respondent.—Lang.

No. 1.

Sep. 2, 1876.
Paterson.

Poor—School Fees—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 69.—The Education Act, 1872, sec. 69, provides that the parochial board shall pay out of the poor-fund the school fees for any child “in the event of such board being satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees.” Where a parochial board had refused to pay the school fees of a child, on the ground that they were not “satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees,” held that an action against the parochial board for recovery of the fees could not be sustained.

THE appellant, Mary Callachan, schoolmistress, Stirling, raised an action in the Sheriff Small Debt Court, Stirling, against the respondent, John Paterson, inspector of poor of the parish of Stirling, to recover certain school fees payable for Patrick Mulvany, aged nine years, son of Mrs Mary Girvan or Mulvany, who had, as alleged, been deserted by her husband, and was unable, from poverty, to pay the school fees in question. CIRCUIT COURT.
West Circuit.
Lord Deas.
Lord Mure.
W. H. Bell,
Clerk.

The ground of liability stated was that under the Education Act, 1872, section 69,* it was the duty of the parochial board, which the respondent represented, to pay the fees on the failure of the parent, through poverty, to do so.

The respondent had refused to pay the fees, in respect that the board were not satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay them. In defending the action he maintained that the course taken by the board was not subject to the review of a Court of law.

* 35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 69, enacts,—“It shall be the duty of every parent to provide elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic, for his children, between five and thirteen years of age, and if unable from poverty to pay therefor, to apply to the parochial board of the parish or burgh in which he resides, and it shall be the duty of the said board to pay out of the poor-fund the ordinary and reasonable fees for the elementary education of every such child, or such part of such fees as the parent shall be unable to pay, in the event of such board being satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees,” &c.

Sept. 2, 1876.
Callachan v.
Paterson.

The Sheriff-substitute gave effect to this view, and dismissed the action.

The present appeal was then taken to the next Circuit Court of Justiciary.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) If the parochial board altogether refused to consider an application under section 69 of the Education Act they might be compelled to do so by the Sheriff. If, however, they only formally considered it, but refused to apply their minds to it, or decided on inadequate and unreasonable grounds, the evil was just as great, and could only be remedied by the Sheriff considering the case, and reviewing the decision of the board. (2) The payment of school rates by the board was intended to be in the same position as the affording parochial relief. There was an appeal given by the Poor-Law Act, 1845, to the Sheriff as to the right to relief, and to the Board of Supervision as to the adequacy of the relief. And in like manner it was intended that there should be an appeal to the Sheriff, at any rate where payment of school rates was altogether refused. The burden thus imposed on the parochial board was to be met out of the rates. It was therefore in the same position as ordinary parochial relief. The enactment of section 69 of the Education Act was just an addition to the Poor-Law Act, and the means of compelling the board to perform its duty introduced by the latter Act applied, though not formally imported into the former. (3) If the Sheriff could not compel payment of school fees the result would be that many children would remain uneducated. Suppose that the parochial board considered that a parent was able to pay school fees for a child who was not attending school, and accordingly refused to pay the fees under section 69 of the Act, and that the school board were satisfied of the parent's inability to pay these fees, and accordingly refused the certificate required by section 70 before the procurator-fiscal could prosecute to compel attendance, the result would be that the child must remain uneducated in spite of the compulsory clause of the Act. This result could only be avoided by sustaining an appeal to the Sheriff. (4) But the action was not necessarily to be looked on as an appeal against the board's decision. It was also an ordinary action to recover a debt. The 69th section of the Education Act had laid an obligation on the parochial board which constituted a debt against them unless they could shew that in the circumstances it was not due.

Argued for the respondent;—The parent was not a pauper for the gratuitous education of whose children provision was made by the Poor-Law Act, 1845. She claimed to belong to a new class created by section 69 of the Education Act, 1872, namely, of persons who, without being paupers, were unable to pay the fees for elementary education for their children. But the duty of paying the fees was only thrown upon the parochial board if "satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees. The provisions of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, as to appeal to the Sheriff, had no bearing on the present question. They were not imported into the statute, and no other provision for review was made. As a means of reviewing the decision of the board the action before the Sheriff was therefore incompetent. If looked at as an ordinary action for debt due under the statute it was unfounded, for the condition on which the debt depended had not been purified.

LORD DEAS.—If the duty laid on the parochial board by section 69 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, to pay for the elementary education of every child whose parent was unable from poverty to do so could be held to be a mere additional duty to that imposed by the Poor-Law Act, and 9 Victoria, c. 83, to provide parochial relief for the poor, and was to be dealt with in the same way, it might follow that the Sheriff, in such a case as the present, could competently order the parochial board to provide the means of educating the child in question, although the Board of Supervision could alone deal with any question of disputed amount. But the Poor-Law Act is not one of the Acts recited in the preamble of the Education Act, and I can find no sufficient grounds for giving effect to the present appeal upon that view of the case.

Callachan v.
Paterson.

The more plausible argument is, that the action against the parochial board is to be regarded as an action for debt, and that the alleged debtors must be subject, like all other debtors, to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Sheriff, unless that jurisdiction has been expressly excluded.

But the peculiarity here is that it is only in the event of the parochial board "being satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay" the fees that the duty is laid on the board, by the enactment founded on (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 69), to pay the fees out of the poor-fund; and it is very difficult to suppose that it was intended to allow an investigation in every instance into a question of that kind before the Sheriff, although there was no allegation that the parochial board had failed to make proper inquiry into the fact, and to give their deliverance upon it according to the best of their judgment.

If it had been distinctly averred that the parochial board had taken no means of ascertaining the disputed fact, but had altogether failed to apply their minds to the subject, I should have been disposed to think there was no incompetency in remitting to them to do so. But there is no allegation of that kind here. The case of the Lord Advocate against the School Board of Stow, 19th February 1876, 3 Retie, p. 469, was different from this, but I am inclined to regard the principles recognised in that case as not altogether inapplicable here.

Three men were charged, "all and each, or one or more of them," with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, "by entering or being in or upon a field" on the property of K in pursuit of game. It was proved that one of them had contravened the Act by entering the field without leave of the proprietor in pursuit of game, and that the other two were acting in concert with him, and were running up and down on the public turnpike road preventing the escape of the game of which he was in pursuit.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that the two latter men were not guilty of contravening the Act libelled.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

MATTHEW LIDDELL and CORNELIUS BAILLIE and a third person, John Grant, were, on 24th August 1876, charged before the Justices of Peace for the county of Linlithgow with an offence under the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1,* in so far as they, "all and each, or one or more of them," did, on the 24th June preceding, "unlawfully commit a trespass, by entering or being in or upon a field," on the property of Kinneil, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, in pursuit of game, &c.

Grant was convicted, but Liddell and Baillie, the respondents, were acquitted, whereupon the appellant, Adam Colquhoun, procurator-fiscal of Court, applied to the Justices to state a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

The statement of the case was—"On the evidence adduced the justices convicted John Grant of the contravention charged . . . and found it proved that the said Matthew Liddell and Cornelius Baillie were acting in concert with the said John Grant, and were running up and down on the public turnpike road preventing the escape of a hare, for pursuit of which with a dog the said John Grant was found guilty, but found in law that the same was not a trespass under the Act libelled."

The question of law was—"Whether, in the circumstances specified in the judgment of the Justices, the said Matthew Liddell and Cornelius Baillie, never having been off the public turnpike road, had contravened section 1st of the Act 2 and 3 William IV. c. 68."

Argued for the appellant;—The circumstances set forth in the case were sufficient to prove that the respondents were guilty of aiding and abetting Grant in a contravention of the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1. The terms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, schedule A (2), however, did not admit of the libelling of a statutory offence as committed "art and part." It did not follow, however, that a statutory offence such as a trespass under the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, could not be committed "art and part" as well as "actor." The ordinary rule of law was applicable to such offences as well as to common law offences. The respondents by aiding and abetting were equally guilty with Grant of committing a trespass on the lands in question. Though the question had never arisen for decision in Scotland this view was supported by several English cases.¹

Argued for the respondents;—Actual corporeal entering or being on the land of another without his consent in pursuit of game was essential to the contravention of the statute. The statutory offence created by the Day Trespass Act was not criminal, and such a statute could not be stretched to cover by implication what it did not expressly include.² The English law of trespass rendered the English cases cited for the appellant of no application.

is, I think, impossible to doubt that on the statement submitted to us the respondents, who were acquitted by the Magistrates, were, according to the reason and good sense of the thing, as well as the ordinary rule of law, as guilty as their companion who was convicted. The Magistrates inform us that their reason for acquitting the respondents was that they were not "upon" the land within the meaning of the Act, as they, the Magistrates, understood it, or rather that, not having been upon the land in their own proper persons, they were not liable to conviction by reason of concert with and active assistance to their companion. Whether or not this opinion is sound is the question for our decision. According to the statement, Grant (the man who was convicted) was on the land with a dog pursuing a hare, while the respondents, acting in concert with him, were on an adjoining road doing their best to help him and the dog by preventing the escape of the hare. The question therefore is, whether, in order to the conviction of any person under the Day Poaching Act, it is essential that he shall have been bodily upon the land. We have not to consider whether or not a trespass within the meaning of the Act may be committed without bodily entry on it by some human being—as, for example, by sending in dogs to hunt hares upon it, or by shooting game on it and sending a dog to fetch it, or by setting snares on it by means of a pole. I should myself have thought that all these were trespasses punishable by the Act. But the case we have here to consider is one of actual bodily trespass on the land by a man accompanied with a dog, and the question is only whether his companions who, acting in concert with him, remained on the road side of the fence where they could, as they thought, best aid him in the capture of the game, are not guilty of this trespass as well as he. The maxim qui facit per alium facit per se is one of very general application in all departments of law, civil and criminal, and at first sight certainly this seems a clear case for applying it. But it was urged that it is excluded by the nature of the offence and the language of the statute. With respect to the nature of the offence, it is simply a statutory offence with a penalty attached, "for the repression" of "trespasses upon property by persons unlawfully engaged in the pursuit of game." But it is generally true that a person may commit any trespass or act whatsoever per alium as well as per se to the effect of being legally responsible for it, civilly and criminally, and I see no reason for an exception in the case of this particular kind of trespass. With respect to the words of the Act, these are, that "if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land without leave of the proprietor in search or pursuit of game" he shall be liable to conviction and punishment. Now, every statute must be applied and enforced in a Court of justice with reference to the common rules and principles of law, one of which is expressed by the familiar maxim to which I have referred. Such rules and principles are never, or at least very rarely, expressed in Acts of Parliament, although daily, and I may say of necessity, acted on and applied by the Courts in proceedings under them. A statute against cutting and stabbing does not express the rule of law that a person who holds down the victim while his companion stabs him shall be esteemed guilty of the stabbing, but leaves the Court to determine, according to the ordinary rules of law applicable to the matter, what conduct shall infer guilt of the act against which the statute is directed. There is here no distinction that I know of between statutory and common law offences, or indeed between civil and criminal matters. It was said that to run up and down a public road preventing the escape of a hare is an innocent proceeding. But it is also an innocent proceeding to stand on the street and whistle on seeing a policeman; only when this is done by a person acting in concert with a house-breaker who is committing theft in an adjoining house, it would, on the rule of law which I am considering, infer guilt of the housebreaking. So here the concert with the trespasser who was pursuing game on land adjoining the road infers, in my opinion, guilt of the trespass. There is, of course, no comparison in point of enormity between housebreaking and poaching, although I cannot concur in the view that a trespass on land in pursuit of game is, irrespective of the Act, quite innocent, for it is clearly illegal, and might be restrained as a trespass on property and an invasion of legal right, although no punishment were attached to it. It is, however, I assume for politic reasons, made a punishable offence by statute, and what acts or conduct shall be sufficient to infer guilt of it must, in my judgment, be determined according to the law that governs such matters, which does not ordinarily (though it may in a few very exceptional cases) require to warrant conviction that the very act wherein the offence consists shall have been committed directly and immediately by the accused with his own hands or in his own proper person. Whether this ought to be regarded as an exceptional case is really the question, and for my part I see no sufficient ground for so regarding it. I should therefore answer the question submitted to us in conformity with this view of the law, and remit to the Justices to proceed accordingly.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I have come to be of an opposite opinion, and therefore think that the decision of the Justices must be supported.

The offence set forth in the complaint was an alleged contravention of the provisions of the 1st section of the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68. In other words, what was charged was a statutory offence; and this being so, there are, as I think, two rules, and two rules only, by which our decision upon the question submitted to us ought to be governed,—the first of which is, that the words of the statute shall be taken in their plain and natural meaning; and the second, that words by which the operation of the Act would be extended, however reasonable some may consider the extension, are not to be held as implied in the statutory definition. What has been clearly and unequivocally enacted, and not also what might by some be considered equally criminal, is all which can be determined. Now, it appears to me that the words of the Act, plainly and naturally read, import that the offender must have himself been on the land upon which the trespass in pursuit of game is said to have been committed. These words are—"That if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land without leave of the proprietor in search or pursuit of game, &c., such person shall, on being summarily convicted thereof before a Justice of the Peace," &c. &c., "forfeit and pay such sum of money, not exceeding two pounds, as to the Justices shall seem meet." Thus the person who is to be punished is the person who has entered or has been on the land and he can contravene only by entering or by being on the land. This seems to me to be the result of the enactment, and to widen the interpretation so as to include constructive presence would be to introduce into the statute an offence which it has not created. Nothing beyond this extension could have been accomplished, if, in addition to the words actually used, there had also been used words expressly enacting that the forbidden trespass would be committed, not merely by entering or being on the land, but otherwise by instigating, aiding, or abetting those who had entered, and were upon the land. Words creating offences are certainly not to be stretched for the purpose of widening their comprehension. More than this, if they are susceptible of two interpretations, the more limited is that which should be preferred. Consequently, though, as I think, the plain and natural reading of the words creating the offence is that which I have adopted, it would be enough as a ground of judgment here that these are as susceptible of this interpretation as of another by which the area of criminality would be enlarged.

It appears to me to be of no importance that in common law offences guilt is ordinarily incurred by accession to the criminal act. That is a well known rule, and has been applied to what at first sight might be considered an extreme case. For example, it has been held that if a gang of thieves go to a town and lodge in the same house, conducting themselves so as to shew that they are engaged in a joint adventure, by sharing their booty with one another, and by meeting together during the day, then though the separate acts of theft committed by each may have been unknown until after the perpetration, still they are all guilty, art and part, of all the thefts committed,—vide, 1 Hume, pp. 115-6. Could this rule be applied to the offence under consideration? Suppose three men leave in the morning on a poaching expedition, the proceeds of which is to be shared by all, and that each goes his own way and commits the forbidden trespass upon land, without knowledge on the part of the others that it was to be visited in search or pursuit of game, could all three be held to have done that by which the trespass of each became the trespass of all? This, I think, would be a plainly unsound conclusion. And yet it can hardly be avoided if the statute is to be read as if it contained words by which it enacted that an accessor who had not entered the land might incur the same guilt as the principal offender.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is certainly an important and difficult question. The English cases that have been referred to command our utmost respect, but they are not direct authorities for our guidance.

I have come to the same opinion as Lord Craighill, and on this ground: When a thing is in itself criminal, and a statute is passed merely to regulate procedure or penalties, then the ordinary rules of law apply, and the offence may be committed by a person who aids and assists although he is not the actual perpetrator. He who is "art and part" in the commission of the offence in law and in reason commits it. But when a thing which is in itself innocent, or at least not a crime, is raised into a criminal offence by a statutory enactment, attaching the character of a crime to certain qualities or incidents of an act not in itself criminal, then the statutory offence is only committed by acts having those specific qualities or incidents. It must be committed, not constructively, but directly, otherwise that which gives the sanction of the statute is not present.

Now, in the present case, running up and down on a public turnpike road, even to prevent the escape of a hare, is not at common law an offence of any kind. Certainly, apart from the statute, the respondents committed, on the facts stated, no criminal act whatever. The statute only attaches a criminal quality provided certain conditions accompany the act. A trespass committed by entering or being by day upon any land without leave in pursuit of game is created an offence. But it is the entry upon the land in pursuit of game that constitutes the act a criminal offence. Without actual entry on the land, and without the object being pursuit of game, the act remains what it otherwise is—an innocent, or at least not a criminal, act,—and this, because of the limitation of the statutory provisions. It is impossible to apply to a case of this sort the ordinary doctrine of “actor, or art and part;” for the specific act which constitutes the offence requires to be personally done by the offender. Take, for example, the Night Poaching Act: Could it be said that the offence of three or more persons together being trespassing on land, by night, armed, in pursuit of game, was committed by one man being on the land, and two men, not armed, and not on the land, assisting him? Would the offence of being on land, &c. with the face blackened be committed by the man who helped to blacken it? These remarks apply to a large category of penal acts, under a variety of statutes, where, for the interests of the public, punishment is attached to acts not criminal in themselves, but which raise such a presumption or probability of crime that they are prohibited and visited by the penalties of the law. In none of these offences do I think that the doctrine of art and part can apply.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, affirmed the determination of the Justices, dismissed the appeal, and found the appellant liable in expenses.

Crime—Breach of the Peace.—A was charged at common law before the Sheriff with “the crime and offence of disorderly conduct in a public street” (in a town where there was no police magistrate), “by using insulting and abusive language to or of and concerning B, who was then peaceably passing along said street, calling aloud that the said B was a thief, and using other grossly offensive words of the like nature, all in a manner calculated and intended to provoke a breach of the public peace.” Held that the charge was not relevant.

JOHN BANKS, residing in Pulteneytown, was charged at the instance of Malcolm M'Lennan, procurator-fiscal of the county of Caithness, with “the crime and offence of disorderly conduct in a public street of a town, actor, or art and part, in so far as on the 8th day of April last, 1876, or about that time, and in or near Saltoun Street of Pulteneytown aforesaid, the said John Banks did wickedly and feloniously conduct himself in a disorderly manner by using insulting and abusive language to or of and concerning George Swanson, sheriff officer, residing in Thurso, who was then peaceably passing along said street, calling aloud that the said George Swanson was a thief, and using other grossly offensive words of the like nature, all in a manner calculated and intended to provoke a breach of the public peace.”

Pulteneytown had a special Police Act of its own, but its commissioners of police were not entitled to sit as magistrates. It had not adopted any of the General Police Acts. The case was therefore brought for trial before the Sheriff (Thoms) of Caithness at Wick.

Banks was convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of £1, 1s, or, in default, to be imprisoned for ten days.

This suspension was brought by Banks, on the ground that the complaint was incompetent and irrelevant, as the offence charged was neither a statutory offence nor an offence at common law.

Argued for the complainer;—Disorderly conduct in a public street was a purely police offence, cognisable only within the jurisdiction of burgh or police magistrates. It was not an offence at common law, nor was it made such by statute. Even if it was so, no statute was founded on. Further, the major proposition, even if it set forth an offence known to the law, was not borne out by the minor.¹ The use of abusive language could not be raised into a criminal offence merely by an averment that it was used with the intention to provoke breach of the peace.

Argued for the respondent;—Disorderly conduct in public did amount to an offence at common law. Undoubtedly it was a police offence, cognisable by a police magistrate. But it was so, not by the force of any statute, but simply at common law.² Now, there was no ground for saying that there was a different common law within the jurisdiction of a police magistrate and without it,—that a man might be tried and punished for doing in Wick what he might do with impunity in Pulteneytown. Where the magistrates had no jurisdiction recourse must be had to the Sheriff. And there was no reason why he should not try outside the magistrates' jurisdiction a charge which would have been competent and relevant within it. If, then, the major of the indictment amounted to a relevant charge, the species facti set forth in the minor were sufficient to support it.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that this conviction cannot be sustained. The prosecution was not a police prosecution, which the Dundee case (Durrin and Stewart v. Mackay) was. There was there no complaint with a major and minor, but merely an ordinary police complaint, tried in the Police Court. Here we have a regular indictment, and disorderly conduct in a public street is charged in the major as a crime at common law, and in the minor we have set forth that this crime was committed by "using insulting and abusive language to or of and concerning George Swanson, sheriff officer, . . . calling aloud that the said George Swanson was a thief, and using other grossly offensive words of a like nature."

It is impossible to sustain that as a relevant charge at common law. A conviction under it would be an interference with the liberty of the subject which we cannot sanction. If the sheriff officer wants redress he may have it by civil action. But the alleged abuse of him cannot be made a crime by saying that the panel uttered it "in a manner calculated and intended to provoke a breach of the public peace."

Edinburgh Police Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. cxiii.), sec. 197—Cleaning Common Stair.—Held that the obligation to clean a common stair or passage imposed by the 197th section of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848, on the occupants of houses, flats, or stories of tenements entered thereby, did not apply to the occupants of houses having their proper access by a main door from the street, although entry from the common stair or passage was possible through a passage, not intended to be so used.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

A COMPLAINT was laid before the Police Court of Edinburgh by the respondent as inspector of lighting and cleansing in Edinburgh and procurator-fiscal of Court, charging the appellant, John Daish, and also John Martin, both residing in Valleyfield Street, Edinburgh, with having contravened the 197th section of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848,* in so far as, on 31st October 1876, the appellant and the said John Martin, "being the occupiers of a house, flat, or story of a tenement entered by a common stair or passage in or near Valleyfield Street aforesaid, failed to sweep every lawful day, and wash at least twice a-week, said common stair or passage."

The complaint was found proved, and the accused were ordered to pay a fine of half-a-crown each or be imprisoned for one day. Whereupon a case for appeal was craved for the appellant, John Daish.

The facts stated were that the houses occupied by the appellant and John Martin respectively were the two main door ground flats of a tenement in Valleyfield Street consisting of four stories. That access was obtained to the three upper stories by means of a common stair, the passage leading to the bottom of which separated the houses of the appellant and John Martin. That behind the tenement there was a back green, of which both the appellant and John Martin and the proprietors and occupants of the upper stories had the use. That this back green was approached by a second passage leading from a door at the foot of the common stair to the outer door, opening to the back green. Both these doors were kept locked, all interested in the back green, including the appellant, having keys. The same key opened both doors. That the houses of the appellant and John Martin had both private doors opening on to this second or inner passage, and that the occupants therefore had no need for and made no use of the first or outer passage which ran between their houses. That the appellant and John Martin had taken their turn with the occupants of the upper stories in cleaning, as directed by the statute, the second or inner passage, but they had failed to clean the first or outer passage leading from the street to the bottom of the common stair, which the respondent contended they alone were bound to clean.

The questions of law submitted to the Court were,—“Whether the house of the appellant ‘is entered by a common stair or passage’ in the sense of section 197 of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848; and whether the appellant is liable to be proceeded against for failing to clean as directed in said section" the first or outer passage leading from the street to the foot of the common stair. No. 4.

* 11 and 12 Vict., c. cxiii., sec. 197, enacts,—“That the occupiers of every house, flat, or story entered by a common stair or passage shall cause the stair and passages immediately below the flat or story possessed by them to be swept every lawful day and washed at least twice a-week, and all areas connected therewith to be swept every lawful day; . . . and every person offending herein shall, for each offence, be liable to a penalty of five shillings.”

Argued for the appellant;—The clause of the statute founded on did not apply to main door houses such as his, having no access by the common passage, but merely an accidental means of getting into the common passage. Dec. 22, 1876.
Daish v.
Paterson.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant had an access by the common passage which it was open to him to use at any time he liked. The public authorities could not be inquiring in each particular case whether such access was actually used. The mere possession of it brought the occupier within the terms of the statute.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff has referred to us the following questions:—
“ Whether the appellant's house ‘ is entered by a common stair or passage ’ in the sense of section 197 of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1848 ; and whether the appellant is liable to be proceeded against for failing to clean, as directed in said section, the passage,” which, as shewn on the plan, separates his house from that of his neighbour, Mr Martin.

That is purely a question of construction of the statute, and though it is not one of any great moment in the particular case, as the amount of the fine inflicted on the appellant was only half-a-crown or one day's imprisonment, still it is one which, in a town like this, has a very general bearing. There are a great many houses in Edinburgh built in the same manner as that of the appellant, and if the Sheriff's decision is sustained their occupiers will find a burden of cleaning thrown upon them which, in my opinion, the statute did not contemplate. I think the section of the statute does not apply to houses which have main doors from the street, but only to houses whose usual entrance is from a common stair or passage. In the case of the appellant's house there is no proper entrance from the common passage. There is, indeed, a means of getting access to the back door of the appellant's house by means of the common passage. But it obviously exists only through the accident of the occupants of the common stair requiring a means of access to the common back green, and therefore to the back passage leading to the back green on which the appellant's back door opens. It is not a means of access intended for the benefit of the appellant's house, or from which the appellant derives any benefit.

I cannot therefore hold that the appellant, under this clause in the statute, is bound to clean this common passage.

The answer to the question, therefore, will be, that the appellant's house is not entered by a common passage in the sense of the statute, and consequently that he is not liable to be proceeded against for not cleaning it.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGMILL concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, reversed the determination of the magistrate, and found the appellant entitled to expenses.

Clerk.

THE appellant, John Graham, spirit-dealer, Glasgow, was convicted in the Glasgow Police Court, at the instance of the respondent, John Lang, procurator-fiscal of Court, of breach of certificate, in that, on 18th November 1876, he sold exciseable liquor to Mary M'Cue, a girl apparently under fourteen years of age.*

A case for appeal was taken, in which the following facts were stated as the result of the evidence.

On the day in question the girl Mary M'Cue was supplied by the appellant's shopman with one half glass of brandy, which was put by the shopman into a bottle, which she had brought with her, and corked up. The girl had been sent for the brandy by her mother, who had been ordered to take it by a doctor. She paid for it with her mother's money, and on receiving it from the shopman took it home to her mother. She had been several times previously in the shop with her mother, but the evidence was conflicting as to whether she had ever been alone in the shop before and been supplied with liquor. The shopman who served her deponed that he had seen the girl before, but that he could not say that he had seen her come into the shop to get liquor, and that on the occasion in question he served her without asking any questions whatever.

The question of law submitted to the Court was—“Whether, on the facts proved, was the brandy sold or supplied to the girl Mary M'Cue contrary to the terms and intent of the appellant's certificate.”¹

LORD YOUNG.—The facts in this appeal are very short and very clear as stated in the case before us. An invalid mother sends her little girl of ten years of age to a public-house to get half a glass of brandy which she requires—and, unfortunately, some invalid mothers are obliged to use their little girls for such errands. The publican, without any inquiry, and acting indeed through one of his shopmen, who understood that the little girl did not come on her own account, but must have been sent by some one else, gave her the half glass of brandy, which she took away in a bottle, corked up, and which she paid for with the money her mother had given her for the purpose.

The complaint is then made against the publican under the statute for selling drink to a child “apparently under fourteen years of age.” According to the construction of the statute, authorised by the Court in the case of Donaldson v. Linton, no offence is committed when the liquor sold is not sold to a child at all, but to the child as the messenger of an adult. There can be no offence, because the liquor is not supplied to the child but to the adult. Here the magistrate convicted the publican upon the ground, which seems a strange one, on the statement of it, that he had accidentally, and without due inquiry, arrived at a right conclusion, and supplied liquor to a child who was really and truly the messenger of an adult.

* One of the conditions of a public-house certificate (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, schedule (A) No. 2) is that the publican “do not sell or supply exciseable liquor to girls or boys apparently under fourteen years of age.”

Graham v.
Lang.

According to the decision in the case of Donaldson, where the liquor was sold to a child who was a messenger certainly, but a messenger for other children, the publican might have had the defence of being in bona fide in consequence of having been deceived into the idea that the child was the messenger of an adult after due inquiry. That was held to be a possible good defence; but then the publican had not made any inquiry at all, and so the evidence would not support the defence. Here the offence libelled was never committed, and to hold the publican guilty because he did not make inquiry and might have committed the offence is out of the question.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, reversed the determination of the magistrate, and found the appellant entitled to expenses.

Public-House—Conviction—General Police Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. c. 72), sec. 24—Publican harbouring Police Constables.—The General Police Act, 1857, section 24, enacts that "if any victualler, &c. shall knowingly harbour or entertain any constable appointed under this Act, or permit such constable to abide or remain in his house, &c., to the neglect of his duty, during any part of the time appointed for his being on such duty," such victualler shall be subject to a penalty.

Stewart.

A publican was charged under this section before the Police Court of A, in so far as he did "knowingly harbour or entertain X, Y, and Z, police constables for the A district, . . . being then constables within the meaning of the said Act, or did permit the said X, Y, and Z to abide or remain in his said house, &c. to the neglect of their duty, during part of the time appointed for their being on such duty." It was proved that two of the constables were in uniform, and on duty, and the other one not; that all three did together enter the publican's premises, purchase and consume a certain quantity of liquor, but that they did not sit down, and only remained four or five minutes. The publican was convicted of the offence charged and fined in a slump sum. Conviction quashed, on the ground that it was general, in respect of harbouring, &c. all three constables, while, as regards one of these, it was clear the offence had not been committed.

Observations on the prohibition contained in the General Police Act, 1857, section 24, against publicans harbouring police constables during the hours of duty.

THIS was an appeal on a case stated from the Justice of Peace Court at Airdrie for James Greig, spirit-dealer, Coatbridge, appellant.

The appellant had been charged at the instance of Donald Stewart, superintendent of police of the Airdrie district of Lanarkshire, the respondent, with having been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Act of Parliament 20 and 21 Vict. c. 72, sec. 24,* in so far as on 2d

December 1876, he, "the said James Greig, being the keeper of a house, shop, room, or other place for the sale of liquors, either spirituous or otherwise, situated in Bank Street, Dundyyvan, Coatbridge, did then and there knowingly harbour or entertain James Menzies, Alexander Towns, and David Miller, police constables for the Airdrie district of the county of Lanark, stationed at Coatbridge aforesaid, and now or lately residing there, and being then constables within the meaning of the said Act, or did permit the said James Menzies, Alexander Towns, and David Miller, to abide or remain in his said house, shop, room, or other place, to the neglect of their duty, during part of the time appointed for their being on such duty."

On this complaint the appellant was convicted generally, and fined the sum of ten shillings and sixpence.

The facts set out in the case, as proved, were,—“That the appellant holds a certificate and licence for the sale of exciseable liquors at Bank Street, Dundyyvan, Coatbridge, and has so held the same for six years. That, on 2d December 1876, betwixt the hours of ten and eleven o'clock P.M., two of the police constables above mentioned, in their uniform, and while they were on duty, and another of them in plain clothes, entered the appellant's premises, and purchased and consumed at the counter, without sitting down, a quantity of drink, and were only in the premises four or five minutes.”

The question of law stated was,—“Whether the Justices, in the above circumstances, were right in their interpretation of the statute in holding that the appellant was guilty of the offence of knowingly harbouring or entertaining the said constables to the neglect of their duty, or of permitting them to abide or remain in his premises to the neglect of their duty, during part of the time appointed for their being on such duty.”

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The libel was alternative, in that it charged “harbouring,” or “entertaining,” or “permitting to abide or remain,” while the conviction was general, and did not specify which alternative was held proven.¹ (2) On the evidence the charge was not proved. One of the constables was not on duty, and, therefore, as regards him, the offence was not committed. Yet the conviction was general, as though the appellant had been guilty of harbouring, &c. all three constables. (3) But the question really intended to be submitted by the Justices was, whether to supply constables on duty with liquor as ordinary customers was per se an offence under this section of the statute. Now, the statute was not intended to debar a constable on duty under all circumstances from obtaining refreshment. It was intended to prevent a publican “harbouring” or “entertaining,” by which was meant, generally, treating constables, and so suborning them to overlook offences which it was their duty to notice and report, and also to prevent them “abiding” and “remaining,” that is, loitering in public houses, when the inspection, which was part of their duty under the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), sec. 13, was completed. It was not intended to prevent a publican selling a glass of liquor to a constable on duty if it was not accompanied by neglect of duty.²

sale of any liquors, whether spirituous or otherwise, shall knowingly harbour or entertain any constable appointed under this Act, or permit such constable to abide or remain in his house, shop, room, or other place, to the neglect of his duty, during any part of the time appointed for his being on such duty, every such victualler or keeper as aforesaid, being convicted thereof, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding £5.”

Argued for the respondent ;—(1) The complaint was not alternative. "Harbouring" was the real offence created by the statute. The words "or entertain or permit to abide or remain," were merely explanatory of the word "harbour." (2) The offence was equally committed whether one, two, or three of the constables mentioned in the complaint were harboured. It was unnecessary for the Justices to specify which constables were harboured, so long as they were satisfied that the statutory offence of harbouring constables was committed. It would have been quite different had the charge been against the three constables themselves. But it was not. They were only part of the species facti which constituted the offence by the publican. (3) The offence was committed by the mere act of knowingly selling drink to a constable on duty as an ordinary customer. It could not reasonably be said that a constable on ordinary duty could go into a public house, purchase, and consume liquor, however short a time he remained, without neglecting pro tanto his duty. If there were exceptional cases conceivable none such were set forth here.

Greig v.
Stewart.

LORD YOUNG.—This is in any view a very narrow case against the publican on the statement of the magistrates which we have before us ; and we must proceed on that statement as "setting forth the facts and the grounds" of the magistrates' determination.

The facts stated are—(reads statement quoted supra). The question for us to decide is, whether, these facts being proved, there was legal evidence to support a conviction under the 24th section of the Police Act, 1857. I am of opinion that the facts set forth in this case are insufficient in law to warrant a conviction of the offence created by that section of the statute.

In the first place, the particular complaint we have to deal with is not exactly in conformity with the statute. It is directly applicable only to "any constables appointed under this Act." Probably the constables in question were so appointed. But the complaint does not say so. It only says that they were constables "within the meaning of" this Act. This is a somewhat noticeable departure from the terms of the statute. But passing that by, the facts as stated by the magistrates are inconsistent with one at least of the constables being on duty at the time, or the time being one appointed for his being on duty. Now, the conviction against the appellant is in respect of the whole three constables, and the penalty is a cumulo penalty. In respect of one of them, the case is certainly not established. The conviction cannot be partially sustained, or the penalty apportioned. This, therefore, would be sufficient to overturn the conviction.

But I should wish to say, further, that I do not read the 24th section of the Police Act, 1857, as prohibiting any publican from serving any constable with a glass of liquor. There is a wide difference between what is prohibited in the language of the statute and such a simple prohibition as this—that no publican shall serve a constable in uniform and on duty with liquor. Such a provision might have been highly expedient and beneficial. But it has not been enacted. There is very much force in the view put forward by the counsel for the respondent, that the words of the statute "or entertain . . . or permit such constable to abide or remain," are merely exegetical of the preceding words "shall knowingly harbour," and that the statutory offence of harbouring constables is only committed by a publican who entertains or permits a constable to remain on his premises during a time appointed for his being on duty, and for such period and in such manner as to satisfy any reasonable man that he is neglecting his duty. Now, I do not find any evidence of that in the facts stated here. I do not even find what view the magistrates took. I do not find whether they thought that the appellant was entertaining these constables or permitting them to remain on his premises. The language of the statute is just imported wholesale into the complaint, and the conviction is quite general. Now, the terms of a conviction must appear from the conviction itself,—by reference to the complaint, if it is so expressed as to permit of this, but not if the complaint is set forth in alternative terms, so as to render a conviction by mere reference to it ambiguous.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the facts set forth are not sufficient in law to support this conviction, and that it must therefore be quashed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in thinking that the conviction complained of must be quashed. But I come to that conclusion simply for the reason that the appellant has been convicted of entertaining three policemen while on duty, whereas it appears from the facts as stated in the case that only two of the three were on duty at the time when they were in the premises of the appellant. Had the third, who was not on duty, been on duty like the other two, I should not have been disposed to overturn the conviction because he was not dressed in his uniform when entertained by the appellant. That might be a material circumstance in determining whether what was done by the appellant was done or was not done in the knowledge that the men were, or one of them was not, on duty; but the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence was a thing for the magistrates' determination; and if they were satisfied upon the point, all that was required, so far as facts are concerned, had been accomplished. There may be review, not on the facts, but only on the law involved in a decision of the inferior Judges.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived—(1) because we have here an alternative complaint, and a conviction which does not specify the alternative found proven; (2) because it is clear that the conviction cannot be sustained as to one out of the three constables, in respect of all of whom the appellant has been convicted under the complaint. These two grounds are quite sufficient to quash the conviction. I should not be disposed in a question of this kind, of so much public importance, to have scrutinised with very critical eyes the proceedings. But on the face of them they are so manifestly inept that they cannot possibly be sustained. Nor can the conviction and penalty be in any way sustained in part or modified, for both are indivisible.

With regard to the terms of the statutory enactment founded on in the first place, I am of opinion that two separate offences are intended to be created by section 24—first, the harbouring or entertaining; and second, the permitting to abide or remain in the premises; and I think that the words "to the neglect of duty" apply to both of these offences. But that they are two separate offences is plain enough. In the second place, it is not necessary to decide whether this clause applies if a police officer on duty enters a public-house, not in the course of his duty, but for his own purposes, and the publican knowingly serves him with liquor as an ordinary customer. Though I do not wish to decide this point, I am very far indeed from saying that this would not amount to the offence created by the statute. With regard to the publican's knowledge, that is a question of circumstances to be judged of on the evidence. It cannot be necessary to prove that the publican knew the special instructions given to the constable. In general, it will be enough to infer knowledge that the constable was in uniform, and on his beat, unless there are special grounds to the contrary.

Appeal—Competency—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.—The Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act provides for appeal on case stated from the judgments of inferior Courts on points of law only. In an appeal presented under this Act held that the question whether, on the facts stated, a person had committed an offence under a statute by “grossly and without reasonable excuse” failing to perform a duty therein laid upon him, was one of law, and the competency of the appeal sustained.

School—Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), sec. 70—Compulsory Education.—In a prosecution before the Sheriff against a parent under section 70 of the Education Act, 1872, it was proved that the parent, who resided in a Highland parish at a distance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the nearest school, had refused to send a girl of five years that distance to school, and was unable to provide any other means of education. Held that the facts proved were not sufficient in point of law to justify the Sheriff in holding that the parent had failed, “grossly and without reasonable excuse,” in the sense of the 70th section of the Act, to discharge the duty laid upon him by the 69th section of providing elementary education for his child.

THIS was an appeal on a case stated by the Sheriff-substitute (Barclay) of Perthshire for Archibald Campbell, crofter, Auchtarsin, Rannoch, in the parish of Fortingall, the appellant, against Melville Jameson, solicitor, Perth, procurator-fiscal of Court, the respondent.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill
Justiciary
Clerk.

The following was the statement of the case:—

“This is a case originating in a complaint at the instance of the respondent against the appellant, presented to the Sheriff on 30th November 1876, setting forth that the appellant had contravened the Education Scotland Act, 1872, ‘in so far as the said Archibald Campbell has been and is now grossly, and without reasonable excuse, failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for Catherine Campbell and Jessie Campbell, his children, and residing with him, of the respective ages of nine and five years or thereby, all as specified in a certificate of the school board of Kinloch Rannoch, dated the 11th November 1876, produced with and referred to in the said complaint, whereby the said Archibald Campbell is, in terms of section 70* of said Act, liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, or to imprisonment not exceeding fourteen days.’

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, 35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 70, enacts —“It shall be the duty of every school board to appoint an officer to ascertain and report to the school board what parents, resident within the parish or burgh, have failed and omitted, and are failing and omitting, to perform the duty of providing for their children such elementary education as aforesaid; and it shall

"The appellant appeared personally, and by a solicitor, and admitted that since the school at Auchtersin was given up in August 1875 his two children mentioned in the complaint had been at no school, and since then he has had no means for their education, as there is no person in the vicinity capable of instructing them.

"It appeared in evidence that there were three board schools in the parish of Fortingall, the nearest of which was about three miles and a half from Auchtersin."

The Sheriff considering that he could not order the school board to provide farther and more adequate accommodation, and that, though, as pled by the appellant, the board had failed to comply with a recommendation of the Scotch Education Board to provide school accommodation at Auchtersin, this, in his opinion, could not exempt the respondent from the charge under the 70th section of the statute libelled, and therefore he found and amerced Archibald Campbell in the modified penalty of ten shillings.

"The question in law for the consideration of the Judges of appeal as stated by me is, whether the appellant, under the above state of facts, has contravened the 70th section of the statute, the subject of the complaint?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) On the facts set forth by the Sheriff the appellant's failure to provide elementary education for his children was not gross and without reasonable excuse. (2) The school board, having persistently refused to obey the recommendation of the Board of Education and erect a school at Auchtersin, was not in a position to prosecute. The recommendation of the Board of Education was sufficient to raise the presumption that the appellant's failure was not gross and without reasonable cause. (3) The respondent had not brought any evidence to rebut the presumption. The appellant's plea in the inferior Court was substantially one of not guilty; and where that was the case "the prosecutor or complainant shall proceed to establish his complaint by such evidence as is competent and the respondent may, if he think fit, lead such evidence as is competent, after which the Court shall pronounce judgment."¹ This had not been done, and the Sheriff had apparently proceeded on certain admissions which in no way justified his judgment. (4) The appeal was competent for the question was not what were the facts, but whether the Sheriff, from certain facts, was warranted in drawing a certain legal conclusion.²

be the duty of such officer to keep the school board constantly informed of the names and designations of all such parents: . . . And the school board is hereby authorised to summon any such parent to appear before the school board at any meeting thereof, and to require from him every information and explanation respecting his failure of duty with respect to the education of his child or children; and if he shall either fail to appear, or, on his appearance, to satisfy the school board that he has not failed in such duty without reasonable excuse for such failure, and shall not undertake, to the satisfaction of the school board, to perform such duty by forthwith providing such elementary education as aforesaid for his children, it shall be lawful to and shall be the duty of the school board to certify in writing that he has been and is grossly, and without reasonable excuse, failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child or children, and on such certificate being transmitted to the procurator fiscal of the county or district of the county in which the parent resides, or other person appointed by the school board, he shall prosecute such parent before the Sheriff of the county for such failure of duty as is in the certificate specified, and on conviction the parent shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, or to imprisonment not exceeding fourteen days," &c.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) There was no question of law before the Court. Review was excluded by the 71st section of the Education Act, 1872, and was only now competent under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875. But that Act limited the appeal which it introduced to cases where the inferior Judge's determination was "erroneous in point of law." Now, what the appellant here asked the Court to do was not to decide a point of law, but to determine whether the appellant's failure was "gross and without reasonable excuse." That simply resolved itself into construing what is "reasonable" excuse. That was a question of fact for the inferior Judge, on which his determination was final.¹ (2) Even if the appeal was competent, the statute distinctly laid on the appellant the obligation to educate his children. It was the admitted fact that the appellant having two children above the statutory age did not send them to school merely because he was of opinion that the distance of the nearest school, three-and-a-half miles, exempted him. But it must be borne in mind that this was a highland parish, and that the admission of such an excuse would make the compulsory clauses of the statute a dead letter over large parts of Scotland. The habits of the people, as well as the nature of the locality, must be considered, and it could not be reckoned an unendurable hardship that highland children should be sent a distance of three or four miles to school rather than lose its advantages.

Jameson.

LORD YOUNG.—The Education Act, 1872, sec. 70, subjects to a penalty any parent who "grossly and without reasonable excuse" fails "to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child or children"; and the question which we have here is, whether the facts stated by the Sheriff, and which he seems to have gathered by inquiry at the parties, without evidence being regularly led before him, afford sufficient evidence in law of gross and unreasonable neglect to perform that statutory duty?

Now, it must be borne in mind that compulsion in the matter of education was introduced for the first time by the statute of 1872, and the language therein used is such as to indicate that the compulsory clause is to be applied judiciously and discreetly, and I should even say gently and tenderly. A parent is not to be punished for mere neglect to provide elementary education for his children between the ages of five and thirteen, unless, in the circumstances, that neglect is gross and without reasonable excuse. Undoubtedly, then, the question whether the neglect is of that character depends on the circumstances of the particular case. Now, there may be a great difference in this as in other matters between a highland and lowland parish. Even the Legislature cannot sometimes overcome geographical difficulties except at an incommensurate expense, and the dwellers in highland parishes of large extent and sparse population must just submit to the inconveniences attaching to the locality in which they reside. But taking the particular case before us, it appears that the appellant here, who lives at Auchtersin, Kinloch Rannoch, is the parent of two girls, aged respectively nine and five years, and that the nearest school is distant three-and-a-half miles from his cottage. I say nothing about the elder girl, but taking only the case of the younger child of five, it may be that there is room for difference of opinion as to whether there is neglect in not sending a child of five years to school at a distance of three-and-a-half miles. I should hardly have thought so myself. But I cannot imagine that there should be any difference of opinion as to whether or not that neglect was gross and without reasonable cause. Yet the statute requires that it should be so to subject the parent in a penalty. It is incumbent on the prosecutor to lay before the magistrate some evidence, not only of neglect, but of the quality of the neglect, and, in a case where the neglect is not ex facie gross and without reasonable excuse, he must shew that it really is so. Here there was no such evidence led, and it cannot be said that the neglect was ex facie gross and without reasonable excuse. That is not a conclusion which the law will draw from the circumstances stated. I am, therefore, of opinion that, on the facts as here stated, there is no evidence of what it was incumbent on the prosecutor to prove, viz., that the neglect was gross and without reasonable excuse. The question submitted by the Sheriff, and which, I think, is fairly a question of law, must therefore be answered in the negative, and the conviction set aside.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I think that this is an important case. School boards, parents, and the public are alike concerned with the result. My opinion is that the appeal must be sustained; and it would, according to my view of the matter, be a sad thing for the country if the views upon which judgment in the Court below was given were to be held by us to be consistent with the provisions which are contained in the 70th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. For what were the elements of the decision? The first was that there was a school three miles and a half distant from the place where the appellant and his family resided; the second, that he had a child five years old; and the third, that this child, a girl, had not been sent to school. The failure or neglect, or, as perhaps it ought to be called, the refusal of the appellant to send this child to this, which was the nearest, school, or to any other school, is the offence of which he has been convicted. But there could be no legal conviction unless the appellant's failure was gross and without reasonable excuse; and yet this is a consideration which appears to have been overlooked by the inferior Judge. For who could say, much more, who could judicially determine, that the circumstances of this case were such as proved that there had been a failure—gross, and without reasonable excuse? A girl only five years old is of very tender age. A journey to school of three-and-a-half miles, and a journey back of equal length, might well be considered to be too much for her strength. The appellant so thought; and there was nothing, indeed there hardly could be anything, proved by which the contrary was established. The parent, in such circumstances as those which existed, must be the depository of the discretion by which attendance or non-attendance of a child, who is little, if anything else, than an infant, is to be regulated. The care and guardianship of the child, responsibility to and for the child in the matter of education, have not been withdrawn from the parent; and if there is nothing to shew, and consequently no reason to conclude, that in keeping his child from school he is obviously abusing his authority, it cannot truly be said of him that he was and is grossly and without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education.

I likewise concur in thinking that the objection to the competency of review which has been urged on the part of the respondent must be overruled. The error in the Court below was not, as has been suggested at the bar, an error in the exercise of discretion, but was an error in the conception of the failure of duty, for which a prosecution, and of which a conviction, was authorised by the 70th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. In other words, it was error in matter of law; and so the judgment which was pronounced may be reviewed. No. 7.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Jamieson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with your Lordships. In the first place, I think that we can competently entertain this appeal; and in the second, that there was, so far as the statement in this case goes, no evidence before the Sheriff on which he could legally convict.

We are not here to review the Sheriff's determination on a question of fact, though a consideration of the facts stated is necessary for the decision of the question of law. But the facts being stated, what we are here to do is to decide whether they are such as legally to warrant the Sheriff in coming to the conclusion at which he arrived. If we are of opinion, on the facts as stated, that the elements which go to constitute the statutory offence are wanting, we are entitled and bound to set aside the conviction.

So, judging of the case, I have no doubt whatever that the appellant is not within the class of parents struck at by the statute. There had been a sort of side-school at the place where he lived, but it was given up as explained to us in 1875 owing to the removal of the postmaster who had acted as schoolmaster, and had not again been opened notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Board of Education. The nearest board school was three-and-a-half miles distant from the appellant's cottage, and he did not see his way to send a child of five years old that distance. I cannot think that there is enough in that to stamp his failure as gross and without reasonable cause.

The nature of the locality is, no doubt, an important element in this consideration, but so is age and distance. And though I am far from saying that the distance in this case is such as, under all circumstances, would amount to reasonable excuse for failure to perform the statutory duty, I am of opinion that it is a matter which a parent is entitled to take into consideration, and that there is nothing in the facts stated to shew that the appellant's determination not to send his child of the age of five years that distance to school was unreasonable.

I therefore concur in thinking that the question submitted to us must be answered in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative; reversed the determination of the inferior Judge; found the appellant entitled to expenses, &c.

Appeal—Competency—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, secs. 2 and 3—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 3, sub-sec. 3—Public Health Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), secs. 24, 94, and 105—Assessment.—The "local authority" is, under section 24 of the Public Health Act, 1867, authorised to assess the expense of covering in any foul watercourse, &c., upon the proprietors of premises contributing to its pollution, and to levy and collect the sums so assessed, "with the same remedies in case of default in payment thereof as are hereinafter provided with reference to the general charge and expenses incurred by the local authority under this Act." Under the 94th section, in burghs with a

No. 8. population of less than ten thousand, "all charges and expenses incurred by the local authority in executing this Act . . . and not recovered as hereinbefore or after provided, may be defrayed out of an assessment to be levied by the local authority" on its whole district "in like manner and under like powers" as the prison or police assessment. Section 105 provides that "all applications to enforce any provision of this Act, or for the recovery of penalties herein imposed, or other sums of money becoming due to the local authority in virtue of this Act, in so far as not herein otherwise provided for, may be by summary petition" to any inferior Judge, who "may, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or arrestment, grant warrant for the imprisonment of the person convicted or found liable in a penalty or sum of money, unless he shall pay the whole sums found due within a specified time, until the same be paid, such imprisonment not to exceed a specified time."

Local Authority of Selkirk
v. Brodie.

A local authority having covered in a foul watercourse under the 24th section, defrayed in the first instance the cost out of funds in their hands, the produce of a general assessment under the 94th section, but afterwards assessed the cost on the individual owners of premises contributing to the pollution of the watercourse. They proceeded to recover this particular assessment from one of these owners by petition under the 105th section.

Held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the sum of money so sought to be recovered under the 105th section was not one the recovery of which was otherwise provided for in the Act; (2) that it was a "sum of money in the nature of a penalty" in the sense of sec. 3, sub-sec. 3, of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864; (3) that therefore the proceedings taken under the 105th section were proceedings which might have been brought under the Summary Procedure Act; and (4) that consequently the cause was one in which appeal on case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, was competent.

Public Health Act, 1867, secs. 24 and 94.—Held also that it was no defence to an individual proprietor against a claim for the particular assessment under section 24 of the Public Health Act, that the cost of the operations in question had been defrayed in the first instance out of funds raised by general assessment under section 94, a portion of which had been already laid on him.

Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

THIS was an appeal on case stated from the Sheriff Court of Selkirkshire for the local authority of the burgh of Selkirk as appellants in a proceeding at their instance against John Brodie, printer, Selkirk, the respondent.

The case stated that the "proceedings were instituted under the provisions of sections 105–6 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867,* at the instance of the appellants against the respondent for payment of a sum of £2, 8s. 5d., being the proportion assessed on the respondent as one of the owners of houses situated within the district or locality of the burgh known as Hillside, of the sum of £60, 14s. 4d. expended by the appellants

* The Public Health Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 101, section 105, provides, that "all applications to enforce any provision of this Act, or for the recovery of penalties herein imposed, or other sums of money becoming due to the local authority in virtue of this Act, in so far as not herein otherwise provided for, may be by summary petition, and such petition may refer to the clauses of this Act on which it is founded, without setting forth the same; and the Sheriff, Magistrate, or Justice shall thereupon"—(then follow directions as to the procedure in such petitions down to decree),—"and he may find either party liable in expenses, or in any modified sum of expenses, and may, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or arrestment, grant warrant for the imprisonment of the person convicted or found liable in a penalty or sum of money, unless he shall pay the whole sums found due within a specified time, until the same be paid, such imprisonment not to exceed a specified time, but the judgment shall not be invalidated by any deviation from any of the said periods of time."

Section 106 contains further provisions as to procedure in such petitions.

Local Authority of Selkirk
v. Brodie.

"The sewer has been constructed and the expense has been assessed on the community at large including the respondent. But the local authority now propose, under section 24 of the Public Health Act, to throw the whole expense upon the owners of houses which, prior to the formation of the sewer, had drained into the pre-existing open drain, and this action has been brought to recover from the respondent, as one of the owners of houses situated within that district, his proportion of said assessment.

"The Sheriff-substitute (Milne) has assoilzied him from the conclusions of the action."

The following question of law was, inter alios, submitted for the judgment of the Court:—"4. Are the appellants entitled to decree for the sum now sued for seeing that they have already assessed and levied from the respondent in respect of the same property a rateable proportion of the same expenditure along with the rest of the community."

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal.

Argued for him;—(1) The expenses sought to be recovered had been incurred by the local authority under the 24th section of the Public Health Act, and they had adopted the method provided in the 105th section as the means of recovery against the respondent. But such proceeding under the 105th section for recovery of a sum of money due to the

* The Public Health Act, 1867, section 24, enacts—"Whenever any water-course, ditch, gutter, or drain along the side of any public road, street, or lane shall be used or partly used for the conveyance of any water, sewage, or other matter from any premises, and cannot, in the opinion of the local authority, be rendered free from foulness or offensive smell without the laying down of a sewer or of some other structure, such local authority shall, and they are hereby required, subject to the approval of the Board (of Supervision), to lay down such sewer or other structure within the limits of their district, or, where necessary for the purpose of outfall or distribution of sewage, without their district, and to keep the same in good and serviceable repair; . . . and such local authority are hereby authorised and empowered to assess the owners of all the premises (according to the yearly value thereof) from which then or at any time thereafter any material other than pure water flows, falls, or is carried into the said sewer or other structure, for payment of all expenses incurred in making and maintaining the same, and that either in one sum or in instalments, and after fourteen days' notice, at the least, left with the said owners, if resident within the district, and, if not so resident, with the occupiers of the said premises, to levy and collect the sums so assessed, with the same remedies in case of default in payment thereof as are hereinafter provided with reference to the general charge and expenses incurred by the local authority under this Act."

Section 94 provides, with respect to burghs such as Selkirk, having a population of less than 10,000 according to the census last taken, and not having a local Act for police purposes . . . "(2) All charges and expenses incurred by the local authority in executing this Act or any of the Acts hereby repealed, and not recovered as herein before or after provided, may be defrayed out of an assessment to be levied by the local authority along with but as a separate assessment from any one of the assessments hereinafter mentioned in this section; that is to say, the said assessment shall be assessed, levied, and recovered in like manner and under like powers (which powers are hereby given and are declared to extend over the whole and every part of the district of the local authority) as the prison assessment or police assessment, as the local authority shall resolve," &c.

No. 8. local authority was not a cause to which the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, was applicable.* It had not in point of fact been brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, nor was it a proceeding for prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty before an inferior Judge. Neither, taking the widest view of the expression "any proceeding which may be brought," could it ever have been brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, for it was neither a proceeding for the recovery of a penalty, nor of a sum of money in the nature of a penalty; and these exhausted the causes to which, in the widest view, the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, applied. The appeal therefore was incompetent. (2) Even if the cause was one in which appeal was competent under the Appeals Act of 1875, it was not competently brought to the Court of Justiciary but should have been taken to the Court of Session; † for the proceedings had not been instituted by way of complaint, nor were they in virtue of any such Act as those referred to in the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. They were truly special proceedings authorised by the Public Health Act for recovery of a particular description of civil debt.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The appeal was competent. The Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, authorised appeal in any proceeding which may, that is, which may competently, be brought, not which in fact shall be brought, under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. Now,

* The Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 62, section 3, provides,—“On any inferior Judge hearing and determining any case, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge’s determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst,” &c.

And by the interpretation clause (section 2) “cause” is defined to mean and include “every proceeding which may be brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and every other summary proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty competent to be taken before an inferior Judge.”

The Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), section 3, provides,—“The provisions of this Act may be applied to (3) all proceedings for the recovery of any penalty, or sum of money in the nature of a penalty, which, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, may be recovered by summary complaint or information, or by poinding and distress or sale, or other summary process or diligence of the like nature, before any Sheriff, Justices or Justice, or Magistrate.”

† The Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, section 7, provides,—“The superior Court to which a case stated and signed by an inferior Judge as hereinbefore provided shall be sent for opinion shall be the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh when the jurisdiction in the cause is of a criminal nature according to the provisions contained in the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and either Division of the Court of Session when the jurisdiction in the cause is of a civil nature according to the said provisions.”

The 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, enacts,—“In all proceedings by way of complaint instituted in Scotland, in virtue of any such statutes as are hereinbefore mentioned, the jurisdiction shall be deemed and taken to be of a criminal nature where, in pursuance of a conviction or judgment upon such complaint, or a part of such conviction or judgment, the Court shall be required or shall be authorised to pronounce sentence of imprisonment against the respondent, or shall be authorised or required in case of default of payment or recovery of a penalty or expenses, or in case of disobedience to their order, to grant warrant for the imprisonment of the respondent for a period limited to a certain time, at the expiration of which he shall be entitled to liberation; and in all other proceedings instituted by way of complaint, under the authority of any Act of Parliament, the jurisdiction shall be held to be civil.”

the present was a proceeding which might have been so brought. For it was a proceeding for recovery of a sum of money in the nature of a penalty, recoverable by summary complaint, &c., as specified in section 3, sub-section 3, of the Summary Procedure Act. (2) The appeal was competently brought in the High Court of Justiciary looking to the way in which the judgment of the inferior Judge was to be enforced under the 105th section of the Public Health Act, and to the definition of criminal and civil in the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act.¹

LORD CRAIGHILL.—These proceedings originated in a petition presented by the appellant to the Sheriff of Selkirk to obtain decree in the terms authorised by section 105 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 101, for the portion of an assessment alleged to be due by the respondent; and which assessment, as the appellants averred, had been imposed by virtue of sec. 24 of that statute. Judgment was given in the Court below for the respondent. The appellants thereupon required a case to be stated for the opinion of this Court, in pursuance, as they said, of sec. 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 62. This requisition was complied with, and upon the case consequently stated the proceedings are now before this Court. The respondent, however, in place of joining issue at once with the appellants upon the questions presented in the case, has objected to the jurisdiction of this Court. He contends that the inferior Judge had no power to state a case for the opinion of the superior Court, and that an interlocutor to this effect, by which all procedure should be terminated, ought now to be pronounced. The jurisdiction of this Court, in other words, the power of the Sheriff to state the case upon which we are asked to give a decision, is thus the point that has now to be determined. My opinion is that the Sheriff had power, and that this Court has jurisdiction. The point turns primarily upon the definition of the word “cause,” which is contained in the 2d section of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875. A cause in which a case may be required and stated “means and includes every proceeding which may be brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and every other summary proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty competent to be taken before an inferior Judge.” Furnished with this definition the inferior Judge is directed by sec. 4, when required, as there provided, “to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of a superior Court of law, as hereinafter provided.” We therefore are now to determine the question which has been raised as if it had been submitted to the inferior Judge. So viewing the matter, the first thing for consideration is whether the cause was one, not which had been brought, but which might have been brought, under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. The respondent, no doubt, argues that the words “every proceeding which may be brought,” occurring in the definition above quoted, must be read as if the words had been “every proceeding which shall be brought.” But I cannot adopt this interpretation. The words of the definition were, as I think, selected of set purpose, because they had a wider comprehension. The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, is a permissive statute. The 3d section, which specifies the proceedings to which it is applicable, only enacts, that to these pro-

No. 8. proceedings it "may be applied," and sec. 32 provides that proceedings in the cases there specified "may either be according to the form prescribed by such Act or any Act incorporated therewith, or according to the form prescribed by this Act, or, where such proceedings are before the Sheriff, according to the forms prescribed by the first recited Act," that is to say, 9 Geo. IV. c. 29. Cases of the same nature, therefore, may be brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, or under other Acts of Parliament; but it was not intended, and obviously it would be inexpedient, that the amenability to review of the decision of the inferior Judge should be governed by the accident that the case had been brought under the Summary Procedure Act and not in the form for which other statutes had made provision. Not the form of proceeding, but the character of the question presented for decision, is the consideration by which the propriety, the expediency, and presumably the competency of review, ought to be determined. The definition of the word "cause" in the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, recognises this principle according to the plain reading of the words, and, therefore, though the proceedings in the inferior Court were not brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the cause nevertheless is one in which, according to my view, a case might be required, and might be stated, if they might have been brought under that statute. Could they have been so brought consistently with the provisions of that Act of Parliament? The answer depends on the applicability of sub-sec. 3 of sec. 3, by which it is enacted that the provisions of this Act may be applied to "all proceedings for the recovery of any penalty, or sum of money in the nature of a penalty, which, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, may be recovered by summary complaint or information, or by poinding and distress, or sale, or other summary process or diligence of the like nature before any Sheriff, Justices of Justice, or Magistrate." The sum sued for by the appellant, appears to me to be, in the sense of this enactment, of the nature of a penalty. True, no doubt it is only a civil debt, but this is not a test by any means decisive, for penalties, to say nothing of sums which are to be regarded as only of the nature of penalties, are, in numerous instances with which we are all familiar, simply civil debts. The things which persuade me that the sum sought to be recovered by the proceeding before the inferior Judge is of the nature of a penalty, are, in the first place, that it might be sued for under sec. 105 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, inasmuch as it is a sum due to the local authority in virtue of that Act. In the second place, that not only might that sum have been decreed for, and this decree have been enforced by poinding or arrestment, but warrant for the imprisonment of the respondent, "unless he shall pay the whole sums found due within a specified time, until the same be paid, such imprisonment not to exceed a specified time," might have been granted. And, in the third place, that by sec. 28 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, a case of this nature, where the decision of the inferior Judge may be reviewed, is appointed to be reviewed, not by the Court of Session, but by the Court of Justiciary.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the exception which has been taken to our jurisdiction ought to be overruled. I may add that this view of the law seems to me to be supported by the cases of Robertson v. Duke of Atholl, 1 Cooper, 348,¹ and Holland v. Gauchalland Coal Company, 5 Irvine, 561,² both cited upon p. 71 of Mr Moncreiff's Treatise on Review in Criminal Cases, just published.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Local Authority of Selkirk
v. Brodia.

LORD YOUNG.—Lord Craighill was good enough to communicate his judgment to us before we came into Court, and understanding that your Lordship concurs in it, I desire to state as clearly as I can the grounds on which I dissent from it, and am of opinion that we have here no jurisdiction.

The petition to the Sheriff by which the proceeding commenced bears to be founded on sec. 24 and 105 of the Public Health Act, 1867, and had it prayed for the imposition of a penalty or for a sentence of imprisonment I should have thought we had jurisdiction in consequence of the character thus impressed on the proceeding, however erroneously, although I should also have thought that we could only exercise it by affirming the Sheriff's judgment in its result without reference to the merits of the question intended to be raised, and solely on the ground that the proceeding was inappropriate and unwarranted by the statute. But as the plain object of the petition was only to ascertain whether or not the respondent was liable in the amount of the sewer assessment which had been laid upon him under sec. 24 of the Act,—and so it only asked decree for the amount, together with expenses of process,—I am disposed to disregard the reference to sec. 105 of the Act, and any criticism that suggests itself on the form of the proceeding, in order to consider and decide the substance of the question that was argued before us, viz., whether sewer assessment under sec. 24 of the Act is in legal estimation a penalty, or (if there is any difference) in the nature of a penalty, imposed on the persons on whom it is laid. I assume that your Lordships are similarly disposed, for this is the question dealt with in the judgment that has just been read. If the rate laid on the respondent is a penalty, or in the nature of a penalty, the proceeding against him for its recovery is within the definition of the term "cause" in the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, otherwise not. From the judgment just delivered I infer that your Lordships perceive a distinction, material to the present question, between a penalty and "a sum of money in the nature of a penalty." I perceive none, and cannot even form an idea of what the distinction may be. Of course a penalty may and in this Court generally does take a sharper and more unpleasant form than the pecuniary, in which form a penalty is frequently called a fine or forfeit, although both these words convey other meanings also. In the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the word "penalty" always means a money penalty. It is defined to be "a sum of money" recoverable "in respect of the contravention of any statutory requirement or prohibition," or "as a penalty or forfeiture," and whether the amount thereof is fixed by statute, with or without a power to mitigate "or is in the nature of a penalty not exceeding a certain sum to be awarded by the Court or Judge." This is all quite consistent with the ordinary meaning of the word in common language, for, although that meaning is not exhausted (there being penalties of another and higher order than those which the Act deals with) no violence is done to it; and it is not immaterial to observe that the significant term "forfeiture" is used as exegetical of the word "penalty." Now, I should like to know what is the supposed distinction between "a sum of money" which is a penalty, either according to the ordinary meaning of the word, or according to the definition of it in the Summary Procedure Act, and "a sum of money in the nature of a penalty," of course taking that word itself in the same sense in both cases? I should have thought that the nature of the thing must generally, and, indeed, always in the absence of express enactment to the contrary, determine its quality, and the applicability of the name by which it is sought to be characterised.

No. 8. The Legislature may, and perhaps sometimes does, make "recoverable as penalty or forfeiture" a sum of money which would not otherwise be regarded as of that nature, but the words "sum of money in the nature of a penalty" cannot have that effect, and in the Act in question are plainly used only to comprehend proper penalties according to the nature and reality of the thing.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Local Authority of Selkirk
v. Brodie.

Having this opinion, I see no purpose in the endeavour to bring the proceeding we are dealing with within the Summary Procedure Act. I must, however, add, that were I able to distinguish between a sum of money which is a penalty according to the definition of that Act, and a sum of money which is in the nature of a penalty according to the same definition, and so thought it important to inquire whether the proceeding, although not brought under that Act, was nevertheless to be regarded as if it had, I could not assent to the reasoning upon which Lord Craighill answers that question in the affirmative. Deeming the question immaterial to the case before us, I shall not dwell upon it, but only suggest as a criterion of the reasoning from which I dissent that the definition shall be substituted for the word defined in sec. 3 of the Act. That clause would then run thus:—"On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any proceeding which may be brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864," &c.

His Lordship, as I understand his view, would construe this as applying to the hearing and determining of any proceeding which, although not brought under the Summary Procedure Act, related to a matter which might have been made the subject of proceeding under it. To this I cannot agree. Taking the whole definition of the word "cause" as truly, and I think clearly extending to every summary proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty, whether brought under the Summary Procedure Act or not, I necessarily regard this matter as unimportant to the case in hand. It has nevertheless an importance of its own, for such language as I am now considering is of frequent occurrence in statutes and deeds, and it would be unfortunate if, even obiter, an erroneous construction of it should be countenanced by this Court. I must therefore, say for myself that when a statute contains an enactment regarding a fact as one "which may" occur, the fact must be an existing fact when the enactment is applied, although only anticipated as a possibility when the enactment was made. Enactments made with reference to all proceedings "which may be brought" in a particular Court or under a particular statute, clearly, I should think, regard only causes actually in existence in that Court or under that statute when the enactments are sought to be applied, and cannot affect causes in fact brought in another Court or under another statute, or at common law. In short, the proceeding must exist before any enactment can be applied to it, and an existing proceeding may not be brought otherwise or elsewhere than it has been, although the party, who was at liberty to select his remedy, might have chosen another than he did.

But, passing from this, which, however important in itself, is, in my opinion, immaterial to the case in hand, I proceed to inquire whether an assessment under sec. 24 of the Public Health Act is a penalty, or in the nature of a penalty, according to the meaning assigned to these terms by the Summary Procedure Act, or their plain and ordinary meaning in common or legal language. Lord Craighill says of such an assessment,— "True, no doubt it is only a civil debt, but this is not a test by any means decisive," penalties being "in numerous instances with which we are familiar simply civil debts." I know of no such instances, and have to say that while I agree with his Lordship that the assess-nent in question is "only" or "simply" a civil debt, I am constrained to dissent from the notion that what is only or simply a civil debt may also be a penalty, or, indeed, anything else than a civil debt. But, passing the obvious contradiction in terms, I should like to know what it is other than a simple civil debt that we can, usefully in this case, distinguish from a penalty? I, of course, admit that a person may be debtor for a penalty and be sued for it civilly, but each person is not only simply a civil debtor. There is a real distinction between a penalty and a simple civil debt—broad enough in the main, although here may be more or less difficulty in drawing it in some cases, and it is precisely on this distinction that the case before us turns. It would be superfluous and perhaps difficult to give an exhaustive definition of the term "penalty," and only in one instance does the Summary Procedure Act give a definition (and that a very limited one), without reference to the common meaning of the word as known or supposed to be known to every one acquainted with the language. In that exceptional instance the definition is "any sum of money which may under any Act of Parliament be recovered from any person in respect of the contravention of any statutory requirement or prohibition." In the remainder of the definition the word "penalty" is itself used as presumably well understood; as for example, thus,—"Any sum which may, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, be recoverable as a penalty or forfeiture," or "is in the nature of a penalty not exceeding a certain sum to be awarded by the Court or Judge." Now, taking this definition (or rather limitation of the use and application of a word so familiar as to require no definition) which, although used only for the purpose of the Act in which it occurs, is altogether consistent with the common meaning of the term, and quite applicable to the present case, whether under that Act or not, I venture to ask whether it comprehends any simple civil debt which may be due under the provisions of an Act of Parliament? All statutory assessments, I might say all rates and taxes without exception, are of that character, and if the necessity of holding that these may be recovered as penalties, or as of that nature, by prosecutions under the Summary Procedure Act, be only avoided by reference to sec. 25 of the Act, it is, I think, clear, that the same reference is fatal to the proposition that the proceeding immediately in question might have been brought under that Act. For, by this 25th section it is enacted that "nothing in the Act shall extend or be construed to extend" to a proceeding "under or by virtue of any statutory provision for the recovery of any rate, tax, or impost whatsoever,"—terms which, I should think, include the assessment in question, and the proceeding brought for its recovery. But, although this precautionary provision is itself conclusive against the construction which it guards against, it does not follow, and, in my opinion, is not true, that such construction would otherwise have been allowable. It is, in truth, a misconstruction that it guards against.

But if an assessment under sec. 24 of the Public Health Act is distinguishable from statutory assessments in general, and is recoverable "as a penalty or forfeiture," or "is in the nature of a penalty not exceeding a certain sum to be awarded by the Court or Judge," I desire to know the reason. It was suggested in argument that the sewer-rate under that clause was imposed upon those who had polluted the ditch in lieu of which the sewer was constructed, as a penalty in respect of that pollution. The answer to this is almost too obvious to require expression. The statute contains abundant provisions for the punishment of those who commit a nuisance, but sec. 24 is not one of them. The

No. 8. assessment thereby authorised is for the construction and maintenance of a public sewer, and is laid on the owners of premises which are for the time lawfully drained into it. It has no relation to anything that occurred before the sewer was made, and it would be no answer by any owner on whom it was laid that his premises had never been drained into the ditch, or even that they were not in existence contemporaneously with the ditch. It was further suggested that the owners of the premises benefited by the sewer ought themselves to have constructed it as a private sewer to be upheld by themselves, and that the rate is a penalty on them for not performing that duty. But this is mere extravagance, and is at once met by the consideration that statutory powers were needed for the construction of the sewer, which traverses private and public property, necessary to be invaded and used for the purpose, and that these powers are given to and required to be used by a public authority in which the sewer, when made, is vested as a public convenience.

v. Brodie.

The only other argument, and that which I understand finds favour with your Lordships, is founded on the assumption that an owner of property in arrear of his assessment may be prosecuted and imprisoned under sec. 105 of the Act. I think the assumption is erroneous, and I take leave to say in the outset that it is so unlikely that Parliament should have intended anything so outrageous, and so far as I know unprecedented, as to subject an owner of property who failed to pay an assessment in respect of it, even after decree, to a sentence of imprisonment, not in lieu of payment, which would be absurd, but as a punishment to be suffered by him for his default, that I should be prepared to stretch construction very far indeed in order to avoid a construction which imputes that intention. But it is, in my opinion, so far from requiring astuteness in order to avoid a construction which attributes such intention to the Legislature, that I think it a construction which it is hard to reach.

Clause 105 applies only to the "recovery" of penalties and sums of money becoming due, "in so far as not otherwise provided for," which, of course, suggests the question whether the recovery of assessments laid on under the Act is not otherwise provided for, as, looking to the terms of sec. 105, one might reasonably expect it would be.

The group of clauses relating to "assessments" forms Part 7 of the Act, and comprehends clauses 93, 94, and 95, which, dealing with the several great assessments authorised by the Act, provide generally that they shall be raised and levied in the same manner, "and with the same remedies and modes of recovery," as one or other, according to circumstances, of three cognate assessments, well-known to ratepayers, viz., prison, police, and poor's assessments. To this extent therefore—viz., with respect to the assessments dealt with by Part 7 of the Act, it is, I presume, not doubtful that ratepayers in arrear are not liable to prosecution and imprisonment under sec. 105, and that precisely because the recovery of these assessments is "otherwise provided for."

I have already shewn, I hope satisfactorily, that assessments under sec. 24 are indistinguishable in their quality and character from other assessments under this or any other Act to meet the cost of benefits conferred more or less, immediately and directly on a more or less extended public, through the instrumentality of a public authority. But unlikely, as it therefore is, that Parliament should nevertheless have dealt with them exceptionally regarding the remedies constitutionally, or in accordance with the spirit of modern Legislature, allowable "in case of default in payment," it is proper to see whether this, at first sight.

unlikely thing has not been in fact done. The question, it will be observed, relates not to the rule for the laying on or levying of the assessment but to the remedies for recovery against parties assessed who are in "default in payment." Clause 24 specifies a very plain and reasonable rule for laying on the assessment thereby authorised, which, for intelligible and no doubt good reasons, is confined to owners, and so differs from that which is applicable to the greater and more important assessments dealt with by Part 7 of the Act. But with respect to the remedies "in case of default in payment" sec. 24 says that these shall be the same "as are hereinafter provided with reference to the general charges and expenses incurred by the local authority under this Act." Now, the assessment for these general charges and expenses is the subject of sec. 94 (sub-sec. 2), which is the central and most important sub-section of the most important clause of Part 7, and with respect to the remedies for recovery against persons in arrear the enactments of it are thus by reference applied, as it might have been expected they would be, to assessments under sec. 24. It so happens that in Part 7 itself all the assessments there dealt with are referred to the provisions regarding the assessment for general charges (sub-sec. 2) for, 1st, the rule of assessment, and 2d, the "remedies and mode of recovery." In sec. 24 the assessments thereby authorised being, for no doubt good reason, laid on according to another rule thereby expressly enacted, the reference to the provisions of sec. 94 (sub-sec. 2) is made only with respect to the remedies for recovery "in case of default in payment." And I really do not know what else could have been done, or, at any rate, what better could have been done, to shew that with respect to the remedies for recovery against defaulters the Legislature meant that all the assessments under the Act, including those under sec. 24, should be regarded and dealt with in the same manner.

But it is said, and this I understand to be the opinion of your Lordships, that this is not so, because the words "with the same remedies in case of default in payment thereof as are hereinafter provided," &c. do not refer to the remedies which may be taken against defaulters to compel payment by them, but only the powers which, by sec. 94 (sub-sec. 2), the local authority has to meet out of the assessment for general charges thereby authorised any deficiency occasioned by the ultimate failure of such defaulters under sec. 24. I do not think this is the meaning of the words. If it is, they are obviously superfluous; for according to this meaning they do nothing but what is completely and effectually done in the proper place, viz., in sec. 94 (sub-sec. 2), which declares the purposes to which the produce of the assessment for general charges and expenses shall be applied, these necessarily being all proper charges and expenses which are not otherwise effectually met. Charges and expenses properly incurred under sec. 24 are, no doubt, of that character, and must commonly, if not always, be defrayed in the first instance out of the general assessment which, so far as I see, is the only fund available for the purpose. It follows that any deficiency, however caused, in the produce of this, or indeed any special assessment within a more limited area, must be ultimately borne by, or made good out of, the general assessment; for otherwise the persons composing the local authority would have to meet it themselves, and have to return to the general assessment what they had originally taken out of it, but ultimately failed to recover by means of the special. This necessary provision for the indemnity of the local authority is, I repeat, the proper and only purpose of sec. 94 (sub-sec. 2), and the suggestion that the reference to it in sec. 24 is only for the purpose of unnecessarily announcing its existence in another part of the Act is one that I am unable to adopt. It does, no doubt, occasionally happen that words in a statute are so obviously superfluous that they may be disregarded as surplusage, but I cannot regard the words in question as of that character, and the general rule is to put such a meaning on words as will give them some efficacy or practical effect if they reasonably admit of it. Statutes which authorise assessments commonly, I think invariably prescribe remedies for recovery in case of default in payment, and generally do so by reference to the remedies already existing in cognate cases. Now, that is precisely what is done here—taking the words in their natural and obvious meaning. “Remedies in case of default in payment” are words which naturally mean remedies against the defaulters and not provisions for the indemnity of the local authority out of another fund in case the default shall continue. The former is so clearly their meaning, in my opinion, that I should have felt unable, even to attain a desirable result, to reject it in favour of the latter, which I think is strained and unnatural. But to do so with the necessary result of thereby attributing to Parliament the intention of putting a penal character upon assessments under sec. 24 of the Act, and placing defaulters in the predicament of offenders who are subject to prosecution and punishment by imprisonment, is repugnant to the principles which ought, in my opinion, to govern construction. In one view, indeed, this interpretation of the words carried out to its legitimate conclusion, would not have the effect of subjecting defaulters to prosecution under sec. 105, but only of leaving the local authority without any remedies against them, for according to this interpretation the “case of default in payment” is “otherwise provided for” than by sec. 105, viz., by the power given to include the amount of deficiency so caused in the assessment for general charges and expenses, and I observe that the Sheriff has held the fact that this was done to be a good defence to the respondent on the merits, which, as at present advised, I think is extravagant, but exactly on the grounds which induce me to think that the construction in question is so.

I therefore dissent from the opinion just expressed by Lord Craighill, which, as your Lordship concurs in it, must govern the judgment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On this question I am not surprised, though I regret, that there should be a difference of opinion amongst your Lordships. The preliminary question in the case is by no means free from difficulty, and though I have come, on consideration, to agree with Lord Craighill in sustaining the competency of this appeal, it has not been without considerable hesitation. As your Lordships are not agreed, I shall state, shortly, the grounds of my judgment.

The petition in which the appeal has been taken was presented under the 24th section of the “Public Health Act, 1867,” which provides for the local authority, with the approval of the Board of Supervision, enclosing or replacing by a covered drain any watercourse, ditch, &c., which has become irremediably foul. It then empowers the local authority to assess the owners of premises contributing to the pollution of the watercourse, &c., so to be enclosed, for payment of all the expenses incurred in the operation. And, lastly, it empowers the local authority “to levy and collect the sums so assessed, with the same remedies in default of payment thereof as are hereinafter provided with reference to the general charge and expenses incurred by the local authority under this Act.”

The remedy for the general sums due by individual debtors under the statute is that contained in the 105th section, and under that section the proceedings in the present case have been brought. The 105th section provides that "all applications to enforce any provision of this Act, or for the recovery of penalties herein imposed, or other sums of money becoming due to the local authority in virtue of this Act, in so far as not herein otherwise provided for, may be by summary petition," &c. And under such petition the Sheriff, Magistrate, or Justice "may, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or arrestment, grant warrant for the imprisonment of the person convicted or found liable in a penalty or sum of money, unless he shall pay the whole sums found due within a specified time, until the same be paid, such imprisonment not to exceed a specified time." Now, it is quite clear that that power to the Sheriff is not limited to penalties or even expressly to "sums of money in the nature of a penalty," but extends to all "sums of money becoming due to the local authority in virtue of this Act." Warrant of imprisonment, though only for a limited time, can legally be granted simply on default of payment, within a specified time, of any sum found due to the local authority.

The question then arises whether an application to the Sheriff or Magistrate under this 105th section of the "Public Health Act" is one of the causes to which the "Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875," applies. Under that Act an appeal on point of law may be taken on cases stated in any "proceeding which may be brought under the 'Summary Procedure Act, 1864,' and every other summary proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty competent to be taken before an inferior Judge." Was this, then, a proceeding which could have been brought under the Summary Procedure Act? That question sends us back to sec. 3, sub-sec. 3, of the Summary Procedure Act, which provides that "all proceedings for the recovery of a penalty, or sum of money in the nature of a penalty, which, under the provisions of any Act of Parliament," may be recovered by summary process before an inferior Judge, may be brought in the way provided by the Summary Procedure Act.

The question therefore remains—was this sum of money, for recovery of which the proceedings were instituted, "of the nature of a penalty"? I am of opinion that it was. The mode of recovery is sufficient in itself to indicate this. Imprisonment, not in virtue of the ordinary rules of personal diligence, but by special warrant of the Judge, for a limited time, may follow on default of payment. Though this imprisonment may not be precisely in modum pænæ, still this peculiar method of recovery indicates that the sum of money to be recovered is of the nature of a penalty. It may be a civil debt and yet of the nature of a penalty. The two cases cited by Lord Craighill are directly in point, for in them the debts, though quite as much as here civil debts, were found to be of the nature of a penalty.

The conclusion necessarily follows that, as this sum of money might have been recovered under the Summary Procedure Act, the cause is one in which appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act is competent; and further, as decree might have been followed by imprisonment for a limited time, the cause is a criminal cause in the sense only that appeal lies here and not to the civil Court.

All that follows clearly enough, provided it is the fact, as required by the 105th section of the Public Health Act, that the recovery of the assessment is not otherwise provided for in the Act. The difficulty at this point arises on the 24th section, which concludes thus—"With the same remedies in case of default in payment thereof as are hereinafter provided with reference to the general

No. 8. charge and expenses incurred by the local authority under this Act." Now, the real question of difficulty in the case is the question whether "default in payment" means failure on the part of the person assessed to pay, or failure on the part of the board, after using the direct means of enforcing payment, to recover. I am of opinion that the last is the correct alternative in construing this clause. The remedy provided for the recovery of charges and expenses by sec. 94 of the statute is a general assessment on the community, and embraces all demands on the part of the local authority not recovered under the other remedies of the Act. It applies to "all charges and expenses incurred by the local authority in executing this Act"—"and not recovered as herein before or after provided"—and these "may be defrayed out of an assessment" over the whole district of the local authority. This is a remedy provided only after the local authority has exhausted the other executorial of the statute, and is in no respect applicable to procedure against the individual debtor. I cannot think that this remedy was at all intended to be the only one applicable to an assessment under the 24th section. The mode in which this catholic assessment is to be recovered under the 94th section is "in like manner and under the like powers as provided in the prison or police Acts." But that only arises when the general assessment is imposed, the substance of the remedy being the power of general assessment.

If, no doubt, I could read the clause to mean, as my brother Lord Young does, "with the same remedies in case of default of payment as is provided for the recovery of a general assessment laid on in order to defray the general charges and expenses of the local authority," I should have agreed with him. But this is not what the clause expresses, nor is it, I think, what was intended. There could be no reason for this exceptional provision. And therefore, on considering this clause attentively, I have come clearly to be of opinion that it applies only to cases where the ordinary method of recovery fails, and is not available in the first instance. It contemplates an assessment not on individuals but on the whole community; and quite rightly, because it is quite reasonable that the deficit on any local assessment should fall, not on the local proprietors who have already paid their own share, but on the whole community, who, no doubt to a less extent, benefit by the operations assessed for.

We shall therefore sustain our jurisdiction in the appeal, and proceed to hear the case on the merits.

Counsel were then heard on the merits of the case.

LORD YOUNG.—I must now assume the jurisdiction of the Court, and doing so, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is erroneous.

The fourth question is perplexing, as stated and taken in reference to the facts. It is this,—Is the local authority entitled to decree for the sum now sued for, seeing that they have already assessed and levied from the respondent, in respect of the same property, a rateable proportion of the same expenditure along with the rest of the community? Now, the facts from which that question is drawn are, as stated by the Sheriff, that the local authority had, in the first instance, paid the expense of constructing this sewer out of funds which were the produce of a general assessment. I have already explained my opinion as to the 94th section of the Public Health Act, and this is just illustrative of its operation.

the view I have expressed the expenses of this sewer has, in the first instance, been defrayed out of the funds raised by general assessment under sec. 94, and if the local authority should fail to recover from those primarily liable, then the balance of the cost will ultimately rest, just where it does now, on the general assessment. But the present is a proceeding to recover from those primarily liable. That it has been paid in the meantime out of funds in the hands of the local authority, the produce of a general assessment, is no answer to this demand under a particular assessment, any more than if it had been paid out of money advanced on the general credit of the local authority.

Lowson v.
Police Commissioners of Forfar.

Police—Jurisdiction—Suspension of Notice to Pave Footway—Competency.
—The Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874, sec. 22, and the General Police Act, 1850, sec. 212, laid upon the owners of property within the burgh of Forfar the obligation of making paved footways along the frontage of their properties, and empowered the Police Commissioners after the lapse of fourteen days from notice given to any such owner requiring him so to do to proceed against him by summary complaint, on which imprisonment for a limited time might follow. Notice was served upon an owner requiring him to pave the footpath in front of his property, and he at once, without waiting for a complaint to be laid against him, and disposed of by the inferior Court, brought a suspension of the notice in the High Court of Justiciary, and craved interdict against the commissioners carrying out any proceedings under the notice. The Court held that the suspension was premature, and refused to entertain it.

Jurisdiction—Civil or Criminal—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 28.—Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk), that the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act was intended as a test of jurisdiction only in questions of review, and did not exclude an ordinary action in the civil Courts with regard to the subject-matter of such summary complaints as were thereby rendered criminal in relation to review.

THIS was a bill of suspension presented to the High Court of Justiciary by John Lowson junior, manufacturer, Forfar, against the Commissioners of Police of Forfar.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary Clerk.

The statement in the bill was that the complainer had to complain of a notice served upon him, as proprietor of certain premises within the burgh of Forfar, by the Commissioners of Police of that burgh, of date 26th February 1877, bearing to be in terms of the provisions of "The Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874," sec. 22,* and in terms of the provisions of the Act 13 and 14 Vict., cap. 33, and, in particular, of the provisions of clause 212 of the last-mentioned Act,* requiring him to cause the road fronting or abutting his property, within fourteen days from the date of service of the notice, to be provided with a footway well and sufficiently paved in manner set forth, and that under intimation that, in case of refusal, neglect, or delay on the part of the complainer to comply with the notice, the respondents would adopt such proceedings against the complainer as were authorised by the above mentioned Acts.

The complainer craved the Court to order intimation to the clerk to the commissioners, and to appoint him to lodge answers, and “meantime to interdict and prohibit the said commissioners from carrying out any proceedings under said notice; and thereafter, on advising this bill, with or without answers, to suspend the said notice, order, or requirement, with its grounds and warrants, and all following thereon, simpliciter.

The grounds of the complaint were that the complainer’s property was to a great extent not built upon, and, therefore, that the Forfarshire Roads Act, 1874, did not apply to it, and that, in other respects, the proceedings complained of were illegal and oppressive, and beyond the statutory powers of the commissioners. The cost to the complainer of carrying out the operations required by the commissioners would have amounted to more than £700.

As the reason for presenting hoc statu the complaint, the complainer stated,—“The proceedings threatened by the said notice are by statute criminal proceedings; and when the same are taken (as the complainer believes and avers will be, upon the expiry of the period mentioned in the said notice), the same will be by way of complaint as for a police offence, and the complainer will be tried in the ordinary Police Court of the burgh of Forfar. The magistrate who tries the complainer for the said police offence may grant warrant to imprison the complainer in default of payment of the fine to be imposed for non-compliance with the said notice. The complainer is apprehensive that under the said notice, which he believes and avers to be illegal and oppressive, proceedings may be taken against him upon which a warrant for his imprisonment will follow, and he therefore presents this application.”

when required by such commissioners, cause footways to be constructed on the sides of such road in front of their respective properties, and to be well and sufficiently paved with flagstones or other flat hewn stones, or to be constructed in such other manner and form and of such breadth as such commissioners shall direct, but subject to the following provisions, viz. wherever the land along the sides of any such roads is not built upon, and not enclosed and used for pleasure-ground, or garden or nursery ground, or for manufacturing purposes, the obligation to make footways shall not come into operation unless and until such land is built upon or enclosed and used for some one of such purposes; and for carrying into effect the provisions contained in this section such commissioners shall have and may exercise and enforce all the powers and authorities conferred on them by the Police Act in force within such burgh at the time for carrying into effect the provisions of that Act in reference to footways on the streets of such burgh.”

presented to him, granted warrant of service upon the clerk of the Police Commissioners, and appointed the case to be heard on the day of _____, and meantime granted interdict as craved.

No. 9.

Lowson v.
Police Commissioners of Forfar.

It was objected for the respondents that the suspension was incompetent because premature; that suspension in the Court of Justiciary was a means of reviewing the decrees of inferior Judges in criminal and quasi criminal matters where review was competent, and was not a process of original jurisdiction; that, were the present suspension entertained, proof would be necessary, which was a thing unknown in the practice of the Court in such cases; and that the Court of Justiciary had never been in use to grant interdict.

Argued for the complainer;—He was not bound to wait until he was taken to the Police Court of the burgh of Forfar, where one of the commissioners who had issued the notice complained of would be sitting as magistrate. The commissioners had commenced on an illegal course, and he was entitled to have their proceedings stopped in initio, and was not bound to wait till they had gone a certain length. Proof might be necessary, but there was no objection either to a remit to the Sheriff to take and report proof, or to the case being remitted simpliciter to the Court of Session, as was occasionally done. The complainer wished the case deliberately tried, as it involved an important pecuniary interest to him, but he was precluded himself from going to the civil Court, because the subject-matter was one of those which had been made criminal by the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. Had this not been so, the complainer might have readily suspended at this stage in the Court of Session, and, if necessary, have then brought a declarator. He was not to be put at a disadvantage by the accident of this being a quasi criminal case within the meaning of the Summary Procedure Act. Though the Court of Justiciary was not in use to grant interdict in the ordinary sense it had power to stay procedure in inferior Courts at any stage.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not prepared to say that we have not jurisdiction to entertain a suspension on the subject-matter of the present complaint. If proceedings had been taken against the complainer under the sections of the statutes founded on and been followed by conviction I think I may assume that we should have had jurisdiction to entertain a suspension of them at his instance.

Nor do I mean to say that it is incompetent for us to interfere pendente processu in a case of this kind, and restrain an inferior Court and its officers from a particular line of proceeding, and direct them how to proceed.

But the present suspension is wholly premature. The complainer is really asking us to become the Court of first instance, and to judge between the Police Commissioners and him. We could not do that without proof. Quite irrespective, then, of the question of jurisdiction, this is a suspension which I am of opinion we ought not to entertain. We should be deranging the whole machinery of the statutes, which adequately provide for this matter in the ordinary cases, without substituting the deliberate procedure of a civil declaratory action, something equivalent to which, I understand the complainer to say, the special importance of his particular case requires.

I am therefore of opinion that this suspension should be dismissed.

I may add with reference to the 28th section of the Summary Procedure Act, which was mentioned in the argument, that, in my opinion, the provision ¹ The complainer referred to Hill v. Galbraith, May 28, 1874, ante, vol. i. Just. Cases, p. 13, and 3 Couper, p. 1.

Police Commissioners of

therein contained was intended to form the test of jurisdiction only in matters of review. I am very far from saying that it could prevent a direct declaratory or other action being brought in the civil Courts with regard to any matter which might otherwise come there.

LORD YOUNG.—The complainer's statement is that he is required by the notice which has been served upon him to construct within fourteen days works of such a serious character that they would cost him more than £700. I give no opinion upon the legality of the course taken by the respondents. I assume that the question is a serious one, relating to a serious duty on the one hand, and a serious pecuniary burden on the other. The statutes under which the notice was given empower the commissioners, on failure of an owner to comply with their requisition and construct a foot pavement, to proceed by complaint against the owner. It is another matter, and one of discretion for the commissioners, whether it would be seemly in any particular case to proceed by way of complaint in the Police Court. There is nothing to prevent the Police Commissioners bringing an ordinary action of declarator to have their right and the owner's obligation declared. Or if they prefer themselves at once to construct the works in question, it is quite competent, and in such a case as this I think they would be exceedingly well advised, to bring an ordinary action to recover the cost instead of a summary complaint.

If, however, the Police Commissioners follow out the statutory proceedings provided, and the complainer does not substantiate his defence before the magistrate, the result will be that the magistrate may fine the complainer in something like £1400, and then no doubt he may suspend, and raise every question upon which the validity of the magistrate's judgment depends. But a suspension of the present notice, on which nothing has followed, on which no complaint has been presented, and no conviction pronounced, is entirely premature, and cannot be entertained. As a general rule, except in cases so very special that there is hardly any recorded example, suspension in this Court is a mode of reviewing proceedings of inferior Courts, and not of interdicting those proceedings. Let those proceedings be carried out to their natural end, and then the party aggrieved may come here.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in thinking that the present suspension ought to be refused. The subject-matter is undoubtedly such as may be taken cognisance of by this Court at the proper time; but, as things are, it would be highly inexpedient, even assuming it to be competent, for us to interfere, when the police magistrate has not as yet been asked to decide the point which is the subject of controversy. I am satisfied that this question is of great importance to the suspender, and it is only natural that he should be anxious that it should be deliberately tried and decided. If he is unwilling that it should be judged of in the first instance in the course of a summary proceeding, such as that for which the Acts of Parliament referred to have made provision, it may not be out of place for him to consider whether, even at the stage which things have reached, the case might not be effectually submitted to the civil Court for its decision by one of the ordinary forms of action.

THE COURT recalled the interim interdict granted by Lord Adam, refused the bill, and found the complainer liable in expenses, &c.

Public Health—Nuisance from foul ditch or water-course—Public Health Act, 1867 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, secs. 18 to 22)—Procedure under.—A parochial board, as the local authority of a parish, presented petitions under sections 18 to 22 of the Public Health Act, 1867, against certain proprietors of subjects abutting on a foul ditch or water-course, to have them ordained to abate the nuisance thence arising. The Sheriff-substitute found that the true authors of the nuisance could not be determined without farther and probably protracted inquiry, and that the nuisance ought to be removed without delay, and accordingly ordained the parochial board to perform the necessary works. He thereafter laid the expense incurred upon the parties complained against. Held that not having given the respondents an opportunity themselves of abating the nuisance the Sheriff could not under section 22 of the statute decern against them for the expense incurred.

A PETITION was presented to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire at the instance of the Parochial Board of the parish of Cadder, as the local authority under the Public Health Acts, 1867 and 1871, against John Lang, as owner of a small property through which ran a foul ditch or water-course, which was complained of as a nuisance. The petition, which was founded on the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, and particularly on sections 3, 16, 18, 19, 20, and 105 thereof, craved the Sheriff to "ordain the said John Lang" (as the author of the nuisance in the sense of the Act) "to remove the said nuisance, and that in such manner and within such time as to the Sheriff should seem proper, and, in case of non-compliance, to find him liable in the penalty of 10s. per day during his failure to comply."

Clerk.

It appeared in the course of the proceedings that the nuisance complained of on Mr Lang's ground was caused in whole or in part by the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution and by Messrs Murdoch and Rodger, who were owners of property on the water-course higher up than Mr Lang, and from whose houses sewage was allowed to pass into the water-course before it reached Mr Lang's property.

The Sheriff accordingly, in the petition against Mr Lang, found that it was necessary to a just judgment that the Institution and Messrs Murdoch and Rodger should be called. A second petition was therefore presented against these parties as authors of the nuisance in the sense of the statute.

The following facts were proved or admitted in the cause:—"1. That each of the three parties were the owners, in the sense of the statute, of property through which a small water-run flowed, in the following order down the water-course:—(1) Murdoch and Rodger; (2) the Institution; (3) John Lang. 2. That in its course through the property of the two first named the water-run was covered or enclosed in pipes, and no nuisance was complained of as existing in their ground. 3. That the water-run was open in Mr Lang's ground, and that the nuisance complained of did exist there. 4. That the tenants of Murdoch and Rodger, and of the Institution, sent the sewage from their houses into the water-run. 5. That Mr Lang did not by himself, or by tenants, send any sewage or impure matter into the water-run in question. 6. A considerable bulk of sewage was sent into the water-run farther up by numerous feuars (not

No. 10. tenants) of lands which had belonged to Murdoch and Rodger." These feuurs were not made parties to the cause.

Parochial Board of

No inquiry was made to ascertain who these upper feuurs were, or to what extent they were the authors of the nuisance in question.

No order was made upon any of the respondents to remove the nuisance.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 20th August 1874, found that it had not been satisfactorily ascertained who was the author of the nuisance, that that question could not be determined without farther and probably protracted inquiry, and that the nuisance ought to be removed without delay. Accordingly, after remitting to Mr Wharrie, an engineer, he, on 17th April 1875, ordained the complainers, the parochial board of the parish, to execute such works as might be necessary for the purpose of removing the nuisance complained of, in accordance with Mr Wharrie's report, and at the sight of Mr Wharrie.

The parochial board having completed the works recommended by Mr Wharrie, the Sheriff-substitute, on 8th May 1877, having conjoined the petitions, found that the cost of these operations, including the fees due to Mr Wharrie for his reports and trouble, amounted to £141, 19s. 4d., and found that the three defenders were primarily liable, jointly and severally, for the cost of the works, and decerned against them jointly and severally in favour of the local authority for said sum, and found the local authority entitled to expenses.*

An appeal on special case stated was taken for all three respondents.

The judgment of the Court was asked, inter alia, on the question (No. 6),—"Whether the whole facts warranted the orders, judgments, and decrees pronounced?"

LORD YOUNG.—We have here two petitions, the first directed against Mr Lang, whose property is situated on what the Sheriff-substitute represents as a small water-run or ditch, and the second directed against two proprietors higher up on the same water-run. The application in both instances is founded on the same ground, namely, that the water-run, from being used as an open sewer, had become a nuisance to the neighbourhood. The Sheriff is craved to ordain each proprietor to do what is necessary to abate the nuisance, and in case of non-compliance to subject him in a daily penalty so long as he leaves the order unobtempered. The petitions bear special reference to certain sections of the Public Health Act, 1867.

The Sheriff was satisfied on very moderate inquiry that the ditch was a nuisance. But at the same time he was of opinion that he could not satisfactorily ascertain in the petitions before him who were the authors of the nuisance, and that therefore he was not in a position to make an order upon any one in particu-

* The grounds of this judgment were—(1) that the defenders in the second petition were proved to be the authors of the nuisance, in respect that they were the owners of houses whose sewage flowed down upon Mr Lang's ground and created the nuisance complained of; (2) that the defender, Mr Lang, was both the owner of the premises on which the nuisance was found, and also the author of the nuisance in the sense of the statute, in respect that the nuisance existed or was continued by his default in not removing it; and (3) that the Act under which the proceedings were taken intends the petitioners, the local authority, to be indemnified for the expenditure incurred under the Act by any persons whom they may be able to reach without regard to the rights of those persons inter se, or against others, provided only these persons are in the sense of the Act responsible for the creation or continuance of the nuisance.

lar to abate the nuisance. Accordingly, under section 22 of the statute, which is applicable to that state of circumstances, he ordained the local authority to do what was necessary. But then, after the nuisance was remedied by the local authority under this order, the Sheriff was moved in the same proceeding to find the very parties, of whom he has said that he could not ascertain whether they or any of them were the authors of the nuisance, liable in the expense incurred, just as if they were the authors of the nuisance, and the Sheriff pronounced a finding accordingly. Now, that was a totally inept proceeding. Had the Sheriff been able to ascertain who was the author of the nuisance his proper course would have been to order him to do what was necessary to remove it, and to specify a time after which, failing compliance, the statutory penalty would begin to run. If he failed in compliance then the Sheriff might have granted warrant to perform the necessary operations at his expense. But finding that the author of the nuisance could not be ascertained, and ordering the local authority to perform the necessary operations on that footing under the 22d section of the Act, it was quite incompetent for the Sheriff thereafter to order the parties against whom the petition was presented to defray the expense to which the local authority had been put.

It must not, however, be understood that the local authority is without remedy. They may make up their minds as to who are really the authors of the nuisance, and therefore liable to them, and in a proper proceeding obtain decree against him or them for the amount of their disbursements. Or they may proceed under the 24th section, which I must say appears to me to be the one most applicable to the state of matters as disclosed to us in this case, and having completed the necessary works assess the cost upon the owners of all premises polluting the water-run in question.

The present proceeding has, however, entirely miscarried, and I therefore move your Lordship to sustain the appeal.

LORD ADAM.—I think that the appellant, Mr Lang, and also the appellants in the other two appeals, are all properly in Court ; for I am of opinion that the local authority had found the authors of the nuisance in the sense of the statute, when they presented their original petitions. In that character these appellants are brought into Court, and in that character they were bound to remove the nuisance, and, failing their doing so, were liable for the expense of executing the necessary works, and for the expenses of the application. If the Sheriff had followed out the statutory procedure he should have ordered them within a limited period to remove the nuisance. But he did not take that course. Instead of that, on 17th April, he pronounced an interlocutor to the effect that he could not in the proceedings before him ascertain who was the author of the nuisance, and ordained the local authority to execute the necessary works. But the Legislature intended that the parties should have, in the first instance, an opportunity of executing the works themselves. What the Sheriff should have done was, having first ordered the appellants to do what was necessary to abate the nuisance, then, on their failure, to have, under the 22d section, ordered the local authority to execute the necessary works, and laid the cost upon the appellants. I quite agree with Mr Kinnear that the Sheriff was not bound to wait until all the authors of the nuisance were ascertained. But his remedy was to take the parties before him, whether the whole authors of the nuisance or not, and ordain them to do what was necessary, leaving them to settle their rights of relief among themselves. But not having given the appellants an opportunity at their own hands of abating the nuisance it was incompetent for the Sheriff in the proceedings before him to lay the expense of what was done under his order by the local authority upon the appellants.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I quite concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordships. But I am anxious that the precise grounds on which we proceed should be understood. There are seven questions asked in the special case, and most of them I could answer, were it necessary, and did I think they arose, in favour of the respondents. But there is only one of these questions which requires to be answered, viz.—“Whether the whole facts warranted the orders, judgments, and decrees pronounced.”

Now, I agree with Lord Adam that the parties against whom the original petitions were presented were responsible, in part at least, for the nuisance, and that therefore if they had been ordained in terms of the 18th, 19th, and 20th sections of the statute to abate the nuisance, they would have been bound to do so. Had they failed to comply with his order, and had the Sheriff thereupon ordered the work to be done, and found them liable in the expense, he would have been within the statute. But the Sheriff took a course which prevents the expense of the necessary operations being recovered in the process before him. He gave the parties against whom the petition had been presented no opportunity of themselves performing the necessary works, on the ground that he could not satisfactorily ascertain in the proceedings before him who was the author of the nuisance. Having taken that course he cannot now turn round and say that nevertheless they are the parties who must pay.

But I wish it to be understood that if this mistake had not been made I am not prepared to say that these parties might not have been treated by the Sheriff and the local authority as in the sense of the statute the authors of the nuisance, and liable for its abatement, though any one of them might have been entitled to relief at the expense of the rest or of third parties.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“With reference to the sixth question in the case, find that the facts did not warrant the interlocutor of 8th May 1877: Find it unnecessary to answer the remaining questions in the case: Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge: Find the respondents liable in expenses,” &c.

GEORGE FRANCE, Appellant.—Pearson.
JAMES ANDERSON, Respondent.—Trayner.

Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), sec. 70—Certificate of School Board as Warrant for Prosecution.—The Education Act, 1872, sec. 70, enacts that previous to the prosecution of a parent for failure to provide education for his children, the school board shall “certify in writing that he has been and is grossly and without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child or children,” and shall transmit such certificate to the procurator-fiscal. Held that a prosecution of a parent had been improperly instituted, in respect that the school board had failed to inquire into the grounds of excuse stated by the parent, and to grant a certificate in writing, as prescribed by the section, and conviction set aside.

Observed (per Lord Young) that a parent must see that his child has sufficient elementary education between the ages of five and thirteen, such as is provided by and brought within his power by the statute. But that although he should remove his child from school before attaining the age of thirteen, provided he have reasonably attended to the duty of giving it elementary education, he is not liable under the statute.

Proof—Evidence Act, 1866 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 20)—Witness.—Question, whether in a prosecution of a parent under the 70th section of the Education Act, 1872, it is competent to examine him as a witness in exculpation.

THIS was an appeal from the Sheriff Court of Inverness under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, taken by George France, ground-officer, Glenelg, in a prosecution at the instance of James Anderson, solicitor, Inverness, procurator-fiscal of Court, against him, under section 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.*

France v.
Anderson.
High Court.
Lord Justice-
Clerk
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

The proceedings were narrated in the special case.

The complaint, which was dated 25th May 1877, set forth that France had been, for a period of at least three months immediately preceding its date, and was then, "grossly and without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing, as required by section 69 of the Education Act, 1872, elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for Benjamin France, aged twelve years," his son, then or lately residing with him.

George France appeared before the Sheriff-substitute (Blair) on 6th June 1877, in answer to the complaint, personally and by his agent, and objected to the complaint as irrelevant, inter alia, on the following grounds:—"(1) That whereas there are three different grounds on which the school board may grant the certificate required by section 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, and the said section provides that the procurator-fiscal shall prosecute for such failure of duty as in said certificate specified, it was incumbent on the prosecutor to libel upon the said certificate in the complaint in order that the defender may know with which failure of duty he is charged; and (2) that the procurator-fiscal has not set forth in the complaint his title to sue."

The Sheriff-substitute repelled these objections, and found the complaint relevant.

France then pleaded not guilty, and lodged a special defence, in which he averred "that he has provided for the period mentioned in the complaint, and is now providing for, the elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic, of his son Benjamin France. The said George France admits that he has not, for the period in question, sent his said son Benjamin to the parish school, which is the only school in the district; but he has repeatedly explained to the school board of the parish in which he resides, and he now explains to the Court, that his reason for not doing so is that he believes the teacher of said school to be a person of immoral character, who is at present charged in an action pending in your Lordships' Court with the crime of adultery, and in support of this allegation he has cited the Sheriff-clerk to produce for exhibition the action in which said charge is made, and in which several witnesses have sworn to the truth of the charge. That action has not yet been decided; but, pending the result of that action, the respondent (appellant in this appeal) considered, and still considers, that he had not only reasonable, but the most ample excuse, for not sending his child to said school."

After evidence was led the Sheriff-substitute convicted France of the offence charged.

France v.
Anderson.

In the course of the proof France tendered himself as a witness. It was objected that it was incompetent to examine him, as the prosecution was a criminal proceeding within the fair meaning of section 3 of the Evidence Act, 1866, 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 20.

The Sheriff-substitute sustained the objection.

In the special case the Sheriff thus stated the facts:—"The accused, George France, has a son, Benjamin France, who was born at Invereshie, in the united parish of Kingussie and Insh, on 4th June 1864. The said Benjamin France has not attended the public school of the district of Glenelg for upwards of three years, has not been attending any school for the last three months, and is not now attending any school. He has been living with his brother at Arnisdale, in the parish of Glenelg. His brother has been attending the public school at Arnisdale, but Benjamin has not. In December 1876 the default officer of the board, when, in accordance with his instructions from the school board, he enjoined the accused George France to send his son Benjamin to school, was informed by accused that Benjamin was not then at school, and at the same time received from the accused a letter in the following terms: . . . 'In reply to your inquiry why I do not send my son Benjamin, aged twelve years, to the public school at Glenelg, I have to state that, being aware that the school-master of Glenelg public school has been publicly charged with immorality in a Court of law, I do not see I would be justified by the laws of God or man in placing my child, while these charges remain undisposed of, under the tuition of that person.' The default officer informed the school board of this. When the lad Benjamin left the public school of Glenelg three years ago he could not read very well, but there was no evidence of his knowledge or want of knowledge of writing or arithmetic. The accused was, on 2d April 1877, told by the default officer that unless the lad Benjamin was sent to a school the board would prosecute him for failure to discharge his duty under the Education Act. Although it was alleged in the special defence, there was no evidence that the said George France has during the last three months discharged or endeavoured to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for the said Benjamin France.

"Upon these facts the Sheriff-substitute convicted the said George France of the contravention charged."

The following questions were, inter alia, stated for the judgment of the Court:—"1. Whether the facts, as stated, afford sufficient evidence in law to entitle the Sheriff-substitute to convict the said George France of the offence charged against him. 2. Whether the absence of any reference in the complaint to the certificate which the school board of the parish of Glenelg is directed by the 70th section of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, to transmit to the procurator-fiscal with a view to a prosecution against a parent respecting his failure of duty to provide for the education of his child renders the complaint defective in specification, so as to amount to irrelevancy, and if so, is it fatal to the conviction? 3. Whether the procurator-fiscal has set forth sufficiently in the complaint a proper title to sue? 4. Whether it was competent to receive the evidence of the accused as a witness for himself?"

The Court, when the special case was laid before them, required the respondent to produce the certificate transmitted to him by the school board of Glenelg in virtue of which he instituted the prosecution.

When the case was again called counsel for the respondent stated that no formal written certificate was ever transmitted to the respondent, but that the following had been the procedure:—

board of Glenelg to provide proper education for his son, as required by the Act of 1872. On 10th March 1877 France and other parents appeared before the board in answer to a summons, and presented a complaint "to the effect that owing to a fama in the parish regarding Mr Donald Fraser, schoolmaster, they could not conscientiously send their children to his school, and requested to be informed where they were to send their children for education." The minutes of meeting bore:—"The board being informed that the children of these parents have been attending an adventure school in the village agreed to make inquiry whether they were getting suitable education in that school or not; and if not, to order them to attend the public school, and failing their doing so, the compulsory officer be instructed to prosecute the defaulting parents in terms of the Education Act, 1872. The following were named as a committee to visit that adventure school, viz., Messrs Mollison, Millar, and Mackintosh, to ascertain whether satisfactory education is given there or not, and to instruct the compulsory officer accordingly." The committee of the board so appointed reported on 12th March that no such adventure school existed as alleged by the defaulting parents. On 19th March France was again warned by the officer of the board, under the instructions of the above-mentioned committee of the board, to send his son to school, and that in default a prosecution would be instituted. This warning was not complied with. On 4th May the clerk wrote to the respondent—"I send you herewith an extract minute of our school board"—(the minute of 10th March referred to above)—"resolving to prosecute the parents named in the minute, in terms of the Education Act, 1872; also copy letter from the compulsory officer certifying that these parents, after being duly warned, failed to send their children to school. I have therefore to request you, in accordance with the resolution of our school board, to take the necessary steps to prosecute the defaulting parents."

Counsel for the respondent submitted that, in these circumstances, the extract minute of meeting of 10th March of the school board, taken in connection with the letter of the clerk of 4th May, substantially amounted to the certificate required by section 70 of the Act.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not regard this case as attended with much difficulty. The whole proceedings lead one to the conclusion that the spirit and meaning of the statute in regard to the matter of compulsion has been misapprehended. It strikes one as remarkable at the outset that this prosecution should have been instituted just when the child in question was on the eve of emerging from the school age of thirteen; so much so that the case could not be disposed of by the Sheriff until the child had reached the age of thirteen complete. There could not, therefore, at the time the case was before the Sheriff, be any continuance of failure to send the child to school in the sense of the statute. I do not mean to say that if a parent's conduct has been very gross and inexcusable indeed before the expiry of the statutory period a prosecution in order to punish him for such conduct might not be sustained, although I must say that, in my opinion, it would be going somewhat out of the way merely to punish for the past, with no view to the benefit of the child for the future.

But passing by that, the real charge in any prosecution of this sort is that the parent has been and is grossly and without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child. Now, that, even taken in connection with the preceding clause of the statute, does not imply in the least that the parent is under any positive obligation to send his child to school, far less to any particular school. He must see to it that his child has sufficient elementary education between the ages of five and thirteen such as is provided by and brought within his power by the statute. But although he should remove his child from school before attaining the age of thirteen, provided he have reasonably attended to the duty of giving it elementary education, he is not liable under the statute.

Now, upon the statement of facts by the Sheriff, all we can gather is that for the last three months of his thirteenth year the parent did not send his son Benjamin to school. There is no statement in point of fact inconsistent with this, that the child was kept at some school, though not the particular school of Glenelg, till he was twelve years and nine months old. Then the statement of facts goes on to say, the said Benjamin France "has been living with his brother at Arnisdale, in the parish of Glenelg. His brother has been attending the public school of Arnisdale, but Benjamin has not." Upon these facts the Sheriff has convicted the parent of grossly and without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child. I confess I can see no evidence whatever in these facts of such gross and inexcusable neglect of that duty.

But it is not necessary to rest our judgment upon this branch of the case. The Legislature intended that in this matter of compulsory education parents were to be dealt with with consideration, if not with leniency. The statute, which for the first time introduced these compulsory powers with reference to education, requires that before a prosecution can be instituted against a parent the school board of the parish shall "certify in writing that he has been, and grossly, and without reasonable excuse, failing to discharge the duty," &c.

Now, there is no such certificate here, and I am not at all persuaded that if it had been put to the school board, "Will you certify that this parent is not providing this child with elementary education, and will you further certify that he is failing to do so without reasonable excuse, and not only so, but that his failure is gross," the school board would have been satisfied to grant such certificate.

There are three things of which the school board must be satisfied before they can conscientiously grant the requisite certificate. There must be failure; the failure must be without reasonable excuse; and, moreover, it must be gross. These terms are unusual in combination in a statute or elsewhere. They are meant to call the attention of the board, in the first instance, to the fact that it is not what they shall consider failure that they must be prepared to certify. But they must be prepared to characterise that failure as gross and without reasonable excuse. Now, we have here no such certificate, and moreover no evidence that the school board applied their minds to the case, so that they could conscientiously have given such a certificate. The prosecution without that certificate could not legally proceed, and therefore the conviction must be set aside.

The other questions which are brought before us in the case I do not suppose your Lordships desire to decide, but there is one of them on which it may not be out of place to say a few words, namely, the question as to the propriety or impropriety, the legality or illegality, of admitting the evidence of the parent against whom the prosecution was directed, in his own exculpation. That the parent could say, all his explanations, and all his grounds of excuse must be heard and considered by the school board in the first instance, is clear from the terms of the statute. Whether the Sheriff, in considering the case, or is not to have the benefit of the same explanations is an important question.

pinion; but if my view is the correct one it is important that Sheriffs who are France v.
ministering this clause of the statute should know that they are, at least, en-Anderson.
tled and, as I think bound, to hear the parent's own explanation of his conduct efore convicting.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—On the last question alluded to I do not think it right to ve any opinion, as there has been no argument upon it. On the first point I ntirely concur with what has been said. If anything is plain it is that a certiate by the school board, in the terms contained in the 70th section of the atute, is a condition precedent to a prosecution. It is said, however, that the ceedings of the Glenelg board in this case imply as much as would have been ntained in the certificate. But when there is such a plain enactment there an be no excuse for offering anything as an equivalent for what is expressly quired. Even, however, if a certificate were not indispensable, the proceedings efore the board could not be accepted as an equivalent; for it appears on the ace of them that there was no such inquiry as was necessary to enable the board to certify in the terms prescribed by the Act. In truth, it is apparent that the school board never applied their minds to the case in such a way as to qualify them for certifying all that was necessary. These proceedings therefore are not, and were not intended to be, in effect a certificate in terms of the statute.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in your Lordships' decision. Compulsory education is an important subject, and I should be very sorry in dealing with the proceedings of a school board to do so in any technical spirit. They have a difficult duty to discharge in the administration of public education generally, and their duty under section 70 of the statute in particular is a most delicate and important one. I do not wish to place difficulties in their way, but, on the other hand, care must be taken that there shall be no unwarrantable interference with the discretion of parents.

The application in question is made under a clause which authorises a very stringent remedy for a very grave neglect,—the neglect of a parent to give his child the benefit of the national provision for elementary education, without himself satisfactorily supplying it. But it is absolutely necessary that school boards in applying that remedy should understand that they must walk strictly by the terms of the statute. Now, what the statute makes essential is this, that the school board must satisfy themselves, in the first place, that elementary education is not given; and, secondly, that the failure to give it is gross and without reasonable excuse. And having satisfied themselves of all this, they must meet with and hear the explanations of the parent, and then certify the same in writing before a prosecution can be legally instituted.

Now, in this case, if I had thought that the spirit of the statute had been complied with, I might not have been so careful to insist upon the letter. But I think that here the spirit of the statute has been departed from. The fact was that the school board only inquired into one of the excuses for the child's not attending the public school, namely, that it was getting sufficient education elsewhere. They remitted to a committee of three members to inquire into that matter, and failing a satisfactory result of their inquiry authorised them to prosecute. The committee made their inquiry, and without any communication with the board, and without any inquiry into the other grounds of excuse,—namely, the objections to the moral character of the master of the public school,—the clerk of the school board at once communicated with the procurator-fiscal, and sent him authority to prosecute, and sent also the minutes of meeting of the board appointing the committee to inquire, and resolving, if the result of the inquiry is not satisfactory, to prosecute. There is nowhere to be found any certificate such as the statute requires, and, so far as I can judge from the proceedings there was no evidence before the school board on which they could satisfactorily judge whether the parent was keeping his child away from school out of mere indifference to education, or whether he had a reasonable ground of excuse, and therefore no evidence on which they could grant the requisite certificate. The proceedings are such as are much to be regretted as tending to discredit the cause of education generally, and it would have been infinitely better had the procurator-fiscal considered the terms of his authority, and finding them not equivalent to the statutory certificate had refused to prosecute, or had laid the matter before the Sheriff for his direction.

No 11.

Anderson.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lords Commissioners of Justiciary having considered this case and heard counsel for the parties, answer the first question in the negative: Find it unnecessary to answer the remaining question in the case: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern."

Crime—Culpable Homicide—Explosion of Dynamite through negligence of Custodian—Indictment—Relevancy.—In charging the offence of culpable homicide through an explosion of dynamite in the custody of the accused, which he had culpably, and in neglect or violation of his duty, allowed to remain in an exposed place of common resort (viz., a joiner's shop in connection with a smithy), the libel set forth that the dynamite "became ignited by means of spark from the said smithy, or by being brought into contact with some other substance, or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown, and then and there exploded." An objection was taken that the words in italics gave too great latitude to the prosecution. Held that as these words were not to be held as introducing into the minor a third species facti different from or inconsistent with the two specifically mentioned, but only as a generalisation of these two specific modes, for the purpose of giving elasticity to the indictment, the indictment was relevant.

Question, whether it would be a relevant charge to libel the placing of an explosive substance in a place of danger, and the fact of its subsequent explosion without farther connecting the accused with the explosion.

July 2, 1877.
H.M. Advocate v. Clark.

This indictment charged "culpable homicide, as also culpable violation or neglect of duty, by a person having the custody or charge of dynamite, or bound to see to its deposit in a place where it would not be a source of danger to the lives and limbs of the lieges:" In so far as the firm of Charles Brand and Son, being contractors for the formation of a portion of the line of the Glasgow, Bothwell, Hamilton, and Coatbridge Railway, and the panel being employed by them as engineer and sub-manager of their works, "and the said Charles Brand and Son being in possession of a large quantity of dynamite, a highly dangerous explosive, for use at or in connection with said works, and it being the duty of you, the said James Donald Clark, as engineer or as sub-manager foresaid, to see and take care that said dynamite, with the exception of any part thereof which might at the time be required for blasting operations, was stored in the dynamite store or magazine at or near Burnbank, in the parish of Hamilton aforesaid, for which the said Charles Brand and Son, time hereinafter libelled, held a Government licence, or in some other place where it would not be a source of danger to the lives and limbs of the lieges: Yet nevertheless you, the said James Donald Clark, did, for several weeks prior to the 19th day of June 1876, culpably, and in violation or neglect of your duty as aforesaid, allow a number of boxes, all or some of them open, containing a considerable quantity of dynamite belonging to the said firm, the quantity thereof being to the prosecutor unknown, and which was not at the time required for blasting operations, to be kept in a joiner's shop at or near Burnbank aforesaid, then occupied by the said firm of Charles Brand and Son, and fail or neglect to see and take care that the said dynamite was stored in the said dynamite store or magazine, or in some other place where it would not be a source of danger to the lieges; and this you did, well knowing that dynamite was a highly dangerous explosive, and that the said joiner's shop was a place where the said boxes containing dynamite could not be kept without danger to the lives and limbs of the lieges, and that various of the lieges were constantly employed in and about the said joiner's shop, and a smithy thereto adjoining, from which it was separated only by a wooden partition, and that others of the lieges were in the habit of frequenting said shop and smithy; and on or about the 19th day of June 1876 part of said dynamite, the particular quantity being to the prosecutor unknown, which, through the culpable violation or neglect of duty above libelled of you, the said James Donald Clark, was in the said joiner's shop, became ignited by means of a spark from the said smithy, or by being brought into contact with some other substance, or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown, and then and there exploded, in consequence whereof the several persons named and designed in the list appended hereto" were killed.

Counsel for Clark objected to the relevancy of the indictment, in respect (1) that the species facti alleged did not necessarily infer that Clark's negligence was the cause of the accident; and (2) that there was a want of specification of the immediate cause of the explosion, and an indefiniteness of statement which left it open to the prosecution to lead evidence which the accused could not anticipate.

Argued for Clark;—1. It was not enough for the Crown to set forth that there was neglect of duty in a matter connected with the accident; it was necessary farther to set forth that that neglect of duty was the immediate cause of the accident. The neglect of duty and the accident must be cause and effect, not antecedent and consequent merely, otherwise there would be no end to the remoteness of possible charges. Now, here neglect of duty was set forth sufficiently, but when the specie facti out of which that neglect of duty was to be inferred came to be examined it was seen that between the alleged neglect of duty of the accused and the accident, there was room for other agencies to be at work as the immediate cause of the accident. The explosion was averred to have been occasioned by the dynamite becoming "ignited by means of a spark from the smithy, or by being brought into contact with some other substance, or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown." Such a statement did not exclude the possibility even of the malicious act of some third party being the true cause of the explosion. The indictment was therefore irrelevant.¹ But, 2. The indictment did not give sufficiently specific information to the accused. It set forth three ways by which the explosion might have been occasioned, (1) ignition, (2) concussion, (3) some other manner to the prosecutor unknown. Under such an indictment it was open to the prosecution to enter upon a line of evidence which the panel could not possibly anticipate. On this separate ground therefore the indictment was irrelevant.²

The Court directed the argument for the prosecution to the second branch of Clark's objection.

Argued for the Crown ;—The words "or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown" must be read not as a specific averment of some new mode, but as a generalisation of the special modes already averred. It was perhaps unnecessary, but it was not unusual to add the words ob majorem cautelam in case the fact actually proved shewed some mode slightly different from, though of the same genus as, the special modes averred. But under such a generalisation it was not maintained that the Crown could prove anything differing in kind from the modes specified.

LORD DEAS.—This is a most important question. The article which is alleged to have exploded and to have caused such serious destruction of human life is one which has been comparatively recently introduced into use, and is one which like the nitro-glycerine in Galloway's case³ is most unusually dangerous. The indictment sets forth that such was the nature of the article ; that although it belonged to the panel's employers it was entirely under the panel's charge as their manager ; and that the panel's employers had a licenced store in which the whole of it not required for immediate use ought to have been kept. The indictment then goes on to state that the quantity of dynamite which exploded was not required for immediate use, and that instead of putting it into the store the panel put it into a joiner's shop belonging to his employers, attached to which there was a smithy (both being places notoriously frequented by all and sundry who chose to come and go), and in which, in point of fact, it is averred in the indictment, there were, at the time of the explosion, other persons present as well as the workmen employed in them. The indictment then sets forth, farther, that the dynamite became ignited by a spark from the smithy falling upon it, or by being struck by some hard substance, or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown.

for unknown. There appears to have been a wooden partition between the joiner's shop and the smithy, and there is some want of explanation as to how a spark could pass from the one to the other. It does not follow, however, that the partition went the whole way up to the ceiling, so that ex facie of the indictment it cannot be said that there is necessarily any impossibility. Apart, therefore, from the words which follow, "or in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown," it seems to me we cannot hold that the indictment is irrelevant. Had the substance been a quantity of gunpowder, and had the individual in charge of the powder left it in an open box in the neighbourhood of a smithy fire, the result of which was that a spark fell among the gunpowder and some person was killed by the explosion, could any one doubt that the negligent individual who put it there would have been liable to indictment for culpable homicide? What is thus true of gunpowder is equally true of dynamite, which although a less common is a much more dangerous substance.

Excepting, then, for the words referred to, "or in some other manner," &c., it could not admit of question that this indictment is relevant. But these are well known words of style to be found in every indictment, and their object and effect are quite well understood. We do not need here to consider whether an indictment, which set forth simply that the dynamite became ignited by some cause to the prosecutor unknown, without any specification at all, would have been relevant. We do not require to consider that question, because the words that go before control the generality of the words "or in some other manner," &c. We have here a specification which we must presume to contain all that the prosecutor knows or has reason to believe, and if it were to appear on the proof that he knew or ought to have known much more than he has stated, or that the explosion had occurred from some cause of a totally different class, such as that some one had done it wilfully or maliciously, he would be stopped at once, and his indictment thrown overboard. He must confine himself to a proof either of the circumstances specified, or of circumstances of some analogous character, so as to place the panel at no unfair disadvantage.

Dealing with the case in this point of view I have no difficulty in sustaining the relevancy of this indictment.

I may add, with reference to what has been said, from the bar, of the case of Galloway v. King, that none of the Court had there any doubt that a relevant charge of culpable homicide would have lain against the defender in the case had the nitro-glycerine been negligently left in the hut. What had taken place was this—nitro-glycerine had been at one time partially used by King in his neighbouring works, but discontinued on account of some objection to it as dangerous or otherwise. It had been kept in a tin can, which the defender ordered to be emptied before being laid aside. The can was accordingly turned up over a stream of water and was believed to be emptied, but as the substance, as Dr Macadam explained in his evidence, becomes solid at one temperature and liquid at another, a portion of it had remained solid in the can, which was then thrown, as a useless article, into the hut, where one of a number of boys who took refuge there on a Sunday from a shower of rain, struck the can with a hammer which was lying in the hut, when an explosion took place which entirely destroyed the hut and seriously injured the boys, one of whom brought an action of damages against King, which we refused to sustain on the ground that all concerned had been excuseably ignorant of the peculiar tendency of the substance to become alternately solid and liquid, and that there could not reasonably be LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. All that was set forth in the indictment, on which the panel was brought before Lord Craighill and myself at the Glasgow Circuit, was that the dynamite became ignited by some cause to the prosecutor unknown. That was all the information conveyed to the panel by the prosecution. Lord Craighill and I hesitated, in the absence of any precedent, to affirm that the indictment was relevant, and accordingly that indictment was withdrawn, and the present has been served. This indictment is quite different. In it two specific means of ignition are set forth—a spark from the smithy fire, and concussion. Now, I agree that had the indictment stopped there it would have been relevant. But if I thought that by the addition of the words “or by some other means,” &c., it was intended to introduce into the minor a third species facti different from the two already mentioned I should again hesitate to hold the indictment relevant. But that is not the case with which we have to do. We have to consider the indictment as libelling two specific methods of ignition, and including under the general words “or by other means,” &c., methods merely ejusdem generis, and not inconsistent with those specially libelled. In this view I concur in sustaining the indictment before us.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is necessary to keep in view in dealing with the case that there can be no doubt in principle that the having a highly explosive substance in an exposed place, resorted to by the lieges, is a serious offence. Whether or not it amounts to culpable homicide depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. The question was raised on the former indictment in this case whether the mere fact of placing an explosive substance in a place of danger taken in connection with its explosion while in such place of danger is sufficient to infer liability. On that point I reserve my opinion. But I may say that I am not satisfied that if a person leaves an article which he knows to be highly explosive in a place where it is liable to be meddled with, his act does not sufficiently connect him with the explosion to render him responsible for the consequences.

Assume that the act of placing the substance in such situation was done maliciously, and with the intention that it should be exploded, and that it is, in point of fact, exploded by the active though unintentional intervention of some one else, would the person who placed it there not be fully responsible? Now, intention does not connect with the ultimate explosion any more than negligence. I am, therefore, not prepared to say that supposing there was no allegation of a specific mode that the libel would not be relevant.

But this case is relieved of all difficulty by the prosecutor condescending upon specific modes of explosion. He says, indeed, also “in some other manner to the prosecutor unknown.” But these words while they give elasticity do not cover any new or additional mode inconsistent with those averred. Therefore, as framed, I have no doubt that the libel is relevant.

THE COURT repelled the objection.

in Default of Payment of Penalty.—In a prosecution under the 17th section of the Public-Houses Act, 1862, the Justices, after convicting an accused, imposed a penalty, and ordained him, “in default of payment within four days,” to be imprisoned for a period of six weeks. Held in an appeal at the instance of the prosecutor that the Justices were not entitled to substitute in the judgment the words “in default of payment within four days” for the statutory words “in default of immediate payment,” and remit made to the Justices with directions to amend their judgment.

THE Public-Houses Act, 1828, 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, sec. 30, enacts that every person contravening certain of the provisions of that Act shall upon conviction “forfeit and pay for the first offence the sum of £7, with the expenses of conviction, to be ascertained upon conviction; and in case such penalty and expenses shall not be paid within the space of four days next after such conviction shall have taken place the offender shall suffer imprisonment upon his own charges and expenses for a period of six weeks, . . . unless he shall sooner pay such penalty,” &c. There were similar provisions with regard to second and third offences, the only differences being increased penalties and more lengthened terms of imprisonment in default of payment.

The Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, sec. 17, enacts, that any person contravening it “shall be guilty of an offence, and on being convicted thereof shall, for each such offence, forfeit and pay the full penalties provided in the 30th section” of the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, above recited, “and in default of immediate payment thereof shall be imprisoned for the entire periods respectively prescribed by the said 30th section.

In a prosecution under sec. 17 of the Public-Houses Act, 1862, the Justices convicted the accused, imposed a penalty, and “in default of payment within four days” ordered him to be imprisoned for a period of six weeks.

The procurator-fiscal of Court took a case for appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

AFTER hearing counsel for the parties the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—“Find that the judgment is erroneous, in so far as it allows the respondent a period of four days within which to make payment of the penalty, and does not adjudge him to be imprisoned in default of immediate payment: Direct the Justices to substitute in the said judgment the statutory words ‘in default of immediate payment’ for ‘in default of payment within four days:’ Remit the matter to them with this direction: Find no expenses due,” &c.

Burgh Franchise—Alteration of Register—Burgh Voters Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, sec. 23—Qualification.—Held that the power given to the Sheriff by section 23 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, to correct mistakes in the list of voters, did not authorise him to alter the qualification of a voter from “tenant and occupant” to “joint proprietor and occupant.”

Observed (per Lord Ormidale) that a person claiming to be enrolled as a voter is not entitled to found upon an alternative qualification.

Observations (per Lord Ormidale) as to the framing of special cases for appeal to the Registration Appeal Court.

PRIOR to making up the roll of voters for the year 1876-77 the respondent, James Ireland, had stood enrolled as a voter for the burgh of Brechin, as tenant and occupant of a house belonging to the East Mill Company, Brechin.

It was objected by the appellant, Charles Anderson, solicitor, Brechin, that the respondent's tenure was defeasible, in respect of his occupying his dwelling-house as manager of the East Mill Company.

The special case set forth—“The said James Ireland produced in support of his right to be continued as a voter on the roll the writs, of which copies, so far as material, are appended hereto, and which are to be held as embodied in this case, and to constitute part thereof, viz.,* maintained that he was tenant and occupant under the East Mill Company as proprietors, and also that he was joint proprietor in respect of being a partner of the said East Mill Company, and that, in respect of one or other or both, he was entitled to be retained on the roll.

“The following facts were proved:—That the said James Ireland was a joint proprietor of the said East Mill Company's property, and that he has occupied the dwelling-house in connection therewith for many years.

The Sheriff repelled the objection, and continued the name of James Ireland on the roll, and altered his qualification to that of occupant and joint proprietor.

The questions of law for the decision of the Court of appeal were Whether the Sheriff had power to alter the qualification as above specified? or, Whether the qualification of tenant and occupant, as entered by the assessor on the roll, was not in the circumstances correct?

The argument was directed first to the question whether the Sheriff had power to make the alteration which he did on the register;¹ and second, to the question, whether, assuming the alteration made by the Sheriff to be ultra vires, the respondent's name was to be expunged from the roll of voters, or his former qualification to be restored.

LORD ORMDALE.—This case does not appear to me to fall under the 23d section of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), and, therefore, I think the Sheriff could not alter the entry on the register of voters on the ground of mistake. The statutory provision referred to is intended to cover a mistake from carelessness or inadvertence, but by no fair construction can it be held to cover the present case where one title of qualification, namely, that of tenant, has been altered into another quite different, viz., that of proprietor. Besides, neither the voter nor the Sheriff appears to have proceeded on the ground of mistake. The only correct mode the voter had of getting the entry on the register altered in accordance with the change in his title was pointed out in the case of Veitch v. Young, Oct. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 28.

On the first question, therefore, raised in the argument, I am satisfied the voter has failed. But the question remains, what course are we now to follow in disposing of the case. For myself, I am clear that we have no alternative but to remit to the Sheriff to delete the name of the respondent from the register in respect that he did not adopt the only correct method which was open to him of having the entry therein altered in conformity with his true qualification as a joint proprietor. This disposes of the case.

But I think it right to observe that the difficulty and embarrassment we have experienced might and ought to have been avoided had the case been stated more in accordance with the requirements of the statute. It refers to writs produced for the respondent as "appended hereto;" but, first, these writs are not appended, and, secondly, even had they been appended, we could not have looked at them. They are evidence merely. And the Sheriff's duty was not to refer us to evidence, but to present us with a statement of the facts of the case.

* 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58 (The Burgh Voters Registration Act, 1856), sec. 23, provides that "The Sheriff shall correct any mistake which shall be proved to him to have been made in any list, and shall expunge the name of every person whose qualification, as stated in any list, shall be insufficient in law to entitle such person to vote, and also the name of every person who shall be proved to him to be dead; and if in entering the name and qualification of any voter anything requiring to be specified be omitted, or if any description be insufficient for identification, such Sheriff shall expunge the name of every person so entered, unless the matter so omitted or insufficiently described be supplied to his satisfaction before he shall have completed the revision of the list."

use as found by him on the evidence. All this was fully pointed out and explained some years ago in the case of Millar v. Wilson, January 24, 1863, 1 Macph. 307, and subsequently in the cases of Pringle v. Hilson, January 23, 1865, 3 Macph. 420, and Cameron v. Hilton, Nov. 29, 1866, 5 Macph. 73. No. 1. Nov. 6, 1876. Anderson v. Ireland.

I think it right also to observe that in the present case the respondent appears to have maintained alternatively either that he was tenant and occupant under the last Mill Company as proprietors, or that he was a joint proprietor himself. Now, he was not, in my opinion, entitled so to plead. He was bound to take up his ground and state to the Sheriff the precise qualification on which he claimed. The Sheriff was entitled to tell him that he could not entertain the claim unless the qualification relied on was distinctly specified. Instead, however, of taking this course the Sheriff repelled the appellant's objection, and continued the respondent's name on the roll. And why? The reason is not given in so many words, but is obviously implied, viz., that though the voter had not the qualification of tenant and occupant he had the qualification of joint proprietor. That is the only meaning that I can extract from the Sheriff's statement of the case. The respondent is therefore enrolled by the Sheriff on a qualification which was not properly before him, for the respondent had previously been on the roll on the qualification of tenant and occupant, which I must hold the Sheriff was satisfied he did not possess, and there was no claim before the Sheriff founded on the qualification of joint proprietor.

LORD MURE.—The question we are now to consider is whether the Sheriff was entitled to alter, as he did, the qualification of the respondent, as entered on the register of voters. There is undoubtedly some distinction, as contended for on the part of the respondent, on the point of the Sheriff's power to alter the register between the County Voters Act and the Burgh Voters Act. Still I am not prepared to say that there is anything in the Burgh Voters Act to take the case of a party claiming or enrolled on a burgh qualification out of the rule laid down in the case of Veitch. Were it not for that decision I might have had some hesitation in concurring. But, having regard to the decision in that case, I think there can be no doubt that the qualification as here altered is, much more than in the case of Veitch, a substantially different qualification from that on which the respondent was enrolled, and that the alteration was one which it was not in the power of the Sheriff to make. On the second point I quite concur with your Lordship.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

The Court remitted to the Sheriff to delete the respondent's name from the register of voters for 1876-77.

take having occurred casually through the assessor mistranscribing from the valuation-roll to the register of voters.

WILLIAM NELSON was entered on the roll of voters for the county of Dumfries for 1876-77 as joint tenant of the farm of Branetrigg. He had been enrolled on that qualification for the previous year, but at Whitsunday 1876 had obtained a new lease in his own name as sole tenant of the farm of Branetrigg. He was entered as sole tenant of the farm in the valuation-roll for the year 1876-7, but the assessor (who was assessor both under the Valuation of Lands Act, 17 and 18 Vict., cap. 91, and under the County Voters Act, 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 83) did not make a corresponding alteration on the roll of voters by substituting "tenant" for "joint tenant."

At his Registration Court the Sheriff was moved by the appellant to alter the register* by striking out the word "joint." The motion was opposed by the respondent, William H. M'Gowan, as incompetent.

The Sheriff held in law, and also in respect of the case of Veitch v. Young, decided in the Registration Appeal Court, October 24, 1870, 1 Macph. 28, that it was not competent for the Sheriff so to alter the qualification of a voter on the register, and that the proper remedy was a new claim to that effect. He therefore sustained the objection, and expunged the name from the register.

A case was stated by the Sheriff on behalf of William Nelson for the Registration Appeal Court.

LORD MURE.—This is rather a delicate question, and on the first blush it would appear to be regulated by the decision in the case of Veitch v. Young, Oct. 24, 1870. It was there decided that the Sheriff was not entitled, under the 44th section of the County Voters Act, 1861, to alter an entry in the register of voters, by substituting the word "joint proprietor" for "proprietor."

Now, I am not prepared to differ from that judgment, and would carry it out in any similar case. But there is an element in this case which did not occur in that of Veitch—namely, that a mistake has been made by the official entrusted with the carrying out of the statutes applicable to the register of voters; and that it is this mistake which has led to the erroneous entry of the appellant's name on the register which the Sheriff was asked to correct.

The mistake was this: The assessor, who is entrusted by the Act of 1861 with making up the register of voters, did not comply with the Act by transferring correctly the appellant's qualification from the valuation-roll to the register of voters. The valuation-roll contains the names of all occupants of land in the county; and it is admitted that the appellant, who had been in previous years joint tenant of a farm, had in 1876 become sole tenant of the same farm. It is also admitted that he correctly returned himself to the assessor as tenant at the time the valuation-roll was made up, and that his designation was correctly entered on the valuation-roll. These are the two leading admissions in the case; and it must be borne in mind that the entering in the valuation-roll is the tenant's own statement of his qualification. It is thus admitted that the appellant made a proper and correct return, and was correctly entered on the valuation-roll, so that the mistake, and the only mistake, lay with the assessor in not correctly transferring the name and qualification from the valuation-roll to the register of voters, but in retaining, through inadvertence, the old qualification as appearing on the register of previous years. At the Registration Court an objection was, in these circumstances, taken to the appellant's name being inserted in the register of voters, on the ground that he was tenant and not joint tenant of the farm; and the Sheriff, having the valuation-roll laid before him as required by the 24th section of the Act of 1861, with the appellant's own description of his qualification, which was admittedly correct and sufficient, was asked to give effect to the valuation-roll by the deletion of the word "joint" before the word "tenant" in the register of voters. The question, therefore, is whether the appellant is to be deprived of his vote because of a mistake thus committed by an official appointed to carry out the Registration Act. Now, it is the policy of the Registration Acts, as I understand them, that an omission or mistake of an official shall not prejudice a party entitled to a vote. There is a provision to that effect in the 19th section of the Act of 1861; and the only question which we have now to decide is, whether section 44 of the Act covers the present case. I am of opinion that it does; and that, without trenching upon the case of Veitch v. Young, we may, in respect of the provision in the latter part of the 44th section, remit to the Sheriff to correct the register by deleting the word "joint" as craved by the appellant, in order that the appellant may not, through the mistake or inadvertence of an assessor, be deprived of his qualification.

* 24 and 25 Vict., c. 83 (County Voters Act, 1861), sec. 44, provides that "No misnomer, or inaccurate, or defective description of any person, place, or thing named or described in any list or register of voters, or in any notice required by this Act, shall prevent or abridge the operation of this Act with respect to such person, place, or thing, provided that such person, place, or thing shall be so named or described in such list, register, or notice as to be commonly understood; and it shall be lawful for the Sheriff, in his Registration Court, if it shall appear to him that there has been no wilful purpose to misnomer or deceive, or that such misnomer, or inaccurate, or defective description was not such as to mislead or deceive to allow any verbal, clerical, or casual error in any such list, register, or notice to be corrected or supplied."

County Franchise—Tenant and Occupant—Defeasibility of Tenure—Schoolmaster.—On an objection to the qualification of a voter on the roll that his title was defeasible, the Sheriff found the following facts proved or admitted:—A was engaged by the Coltness Company by verbal agreement as schoolmaster of their private school at Newmains for a year from 24th August 1875 at a fixed salary and free house. At 24th August 1876 no further or other agreement was made between A and the Coltness Company, but at 18th September 1876, the date of the Sheriff's Registration Court, he was continuing in the performance of his duties as schoolmaster, and in the occupation of his house. The house was of the requisite annual value, was completely separate from the school, and had been the residence of the schoolmaster for many years. The return made to the assessor on behalf of the Coltness Company was A, teacher, Coltness, occupant of house belonging to B, let to Coltness Company, and by said company let to A. The Coltness Company paid the tenant's taxes on the house, but the tax papers were first rendered to A, who handed them to the company. A already stood enrolled as a voter, in respect of his having previously occupied another

Nov. 13, 1876. Held (dub. Lord Ormidale) that though A's engagement as schoolmaster was as a contract of service defeasible at the will of his employers, the objection is not, on the facts as stated, discharged the onus which lay upon him, in consequence of A's being already on the roll, of shewing that his tenure of the house was defeasible along with it.

 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
 B.

At the Registration Court for the southern division of Lanarkshire held at Wishaw on 18th September 1876, the respondent, John Patterson, objected to the qualification of the appellant, John Brown, who stood enrolled as a voter, as tenant and occupant of a house at Coltness, on the ground that his tenancy was defeasible.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) sustained the objection on the following facts being proved:—"The said John Brown, prior to 24th August 1875, was resident at Overton, where he taught a school belonging to the Coltness Company, and on the date of the Registration Court of 1876 stood enrolled as tenant and occupant on the register for South Lanarkshire. By verbal arrangement made with the Coltness Company he was engaged as schoolmaster of the Coltness Company's school at Newmains, which is not a public school in the sense of the Education Act, for a year from 24th August 1875 to 24th August 1876, at a fixed salary and a free house. On the 18th September 1876, the date of the Sheriff's Registration Court, no further or other agreement had been made with Mr Brown. He had entered on his duties on 24th August 1875, and from that date up to the date of holding the Court had lived in a house rent free. This house, though completely separate from the school, had been the residence of the schoolmasters of the school at Newmains for a period of about fourteen years. This house was entered in the valuation-roll as of the value of £14, 10s. per annum, and the return made to the assessor on behalf of the Coltness Company was John Brown, teacher, Coltness, occupant of house belonging to James Houldsworth, of Coltness, let to Coltness Iron Company, and by said company let to John Brown. The Coltness Company paid all the taxes applicable to Brown's tenancy, but the tax papers were in the first place rendered to Brown, who handed them in turn to the Coltness Company."

Brown took a case for appeal, in which the question of law stated for the decision of the Court was—"Whether the title of the said John Brown as tenant is defeasible."¹

LORD MURE.—This is an objection to a voter being continued on the roll, and the objection taken and sustained by the Sheriff was that the qualification was defeasible.

The facts put before us in the case are these:—(Reads the statement of facts quoted supra.)

It is this house at Newmains, of the requisite value, which the appellant has occupied as tenant since August 1875, under a yearly lease, and is still occupying, the right to which is said to be defeasible at the instance of the landlord; and the question which we have to determine is whether on the facts as stated there is evidence of defeasibility. No 3.

I have come to the conclusion that in dealing with the case of a party who is on the roll—for the appellant was previously registered in the same district on a qualification which, if not identical, was exactly similar—these facts are not sufficient to instruct defeasibility. It is not stated in the case that the occupancy of this house which is “completely separate from the school,” and which is stated to be let by the Coltness Iron Company to the appellant, depends upon his holding the office of schoolmaster, or is let to him for any period less than one year; and it appears to me, upon the facts stated, that the appellant is now occupying the house for the second year by tacit relocation. He is therefore ex facie of the case in the position of a party who has been for more than a year in the occupancy as tenant of heritages of the requisite value, as appearing from the valuation-roll of the county. Nov. 13, 1876. Brown v. Patterson.

On this simple ground, therefore, that there is no evidence in the case which can lead to the conclusion that the appellant has occupied in any other character than that of a yearly tenant, and, without entering upon the general question of the right of schoolmasters to the franchise, I am of opinion that we ought to sustain this appeal, and reverse the determination of the Sheriff.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The question is not whether there is a tenancy, but whether the tenancy of the appellant is defeasible? This being the issue which the Sheriff had to try, there appears to me to be nothing in the facts as these have been presented in the case to warrant the conclusion that the tenancy of the house occupied by the appellant is defeasible at the pleasure of the Coltness Company. This is enough for our present decision, but were it necessary I should have no hesitation in finding that upon the facts as found by the Sheriff the tenancy of the house occupied by the appellant was indefeasible within the year for which he was appointed schoolmaster of the company's school.

The counsel for the appellant not only assumed, but conceded in the argument, that the tenure of the school, though the appellant had been appointed to the office of schoolmaster for a year, was defeasible, and that he might be turned out of the school during the currency of the contract, his only redress against what might be shewn to be the wrong inflicted upon him being to be obtained in an action for damages. I refer to this only for the purpose of explaining that the decision of such a question being unnecessary on the present occasion my opinion on the point is reserved.

LORD ORMDALE.—The first question that arises in this case is whether the position of the voter as schoolmaster is defeasible at the will of another, and the next question is whether the occupation of his house depends entirely on his continuing to hold the position of schoolmaster.

In regard to the first of these questions, I cannot doubt, that for no fault of his, and contrary to his remonstrances, his employers had the power at any time to put an end to his services as schoolmaster. If they did so without just and sufficient grounds they might be liable to him in damages, but that did not detract from their power to dispense with his services. The contract between them was just a personal one of service. So it might, like every other contract of service, be broken and put an end to by either party. The appellant might have broken his contract, and said,—“I am not going to teach any longer in this school, I am going elsewhere,” and no Court could have compelled him to remain where he was, and continue to perform his stipulated duties as schoolmaster. In the same way his employers might have summarily dismissed him without reason assigned, and no Court would compel them to retain him in their employment. The only redress either party would have, in the event of the contract being broken, would be a claim or action of damages as for breach of contract. Clearly, therefore, the tenure or right of the voter as schoolmaster was defeasible at the will of his employers.

No. 3.

Brown v.
Patterson.

But that does not necessarily determine the present case. The question remains whether the appellant holds his house, which is the subject of his qualification, as a mere accessory or pertinent of his employment as schoolmaster, or in virtue of an independent right. It is on this point that I entertain considerable doubt. We must, however, be guided by the facts set out in the case. We there find it expressly stated that the house was “let” by the Coltness Iron Company to the appellant. It may have been “let” to him for a year whether he continued to be schoolmaster for that period or not, or the let to him may have been so qualified as to terminate with his position as schoolmaster. My inclination, were it not for the different view taken by your Lordships, would have been to hold that the house was a mere accessory of the school, and that the voter in being dismissed from the one lost the other. But, keeping in view that it was for the objector to establish a clear case in support of his objection,—the presumption being strongly in favour of the appellant from his being already on the roll,—I do not feel myself warranted in differing from the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

THE COURT reversed the decision of the Sheriff, and ordained the appellant's name to be restored to the roll.

Process—Bankrupt—Caution for Expenses.—In an accounting arising out of joint mercantile transactions between the pursuer and defender in an action, the result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment was to render the defender insolvent. He accordingly offered a composition to his creditors, which was refused, but he was not rendered notour bankrupt. In the event of the Lord Ordinary's judgment being reversed the defender was admittedly solvent. On his presenting a reclaiming note, held that the circumstances were not such as to entitle the pursuer to caution for expenses.

THIS was an action at the instance of Alexander Weir, manufacturer in Ayr, against Moses Buchanan, commission agent, Glasgow, for payment of £1875, as the sum due to him on certain bills accepted for the defender's accommodation, and on certain mercantile transactions in which the parties had been jointly engaged.

The defender stated in defence that the result of an accounting would bring out a considerable balance on the transactions in question due by the pursuer to him.

The Lord Ordinary, on 19th July 1876, after a report from an accountant, found £1510 due to the pursuer.

The defender being unable to meet his debts, including the sum thus found due to the pursuer, called his creditors together on 13th August.

and made offer of a composition, which was refused on 4th October. On the first box-day in vacation (24th August) he lodged a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 19th July. No. 4.

When the reclaiming note appeared in the Single Bills the pursuer moved that the defender be ordained to find caution as a condition of being allowed to insist in his reclaiming note.¹ Oct. 18, 1876.
Weir v.
Buchanan.

The defender objected that he had not been made notour bankrupt, and that his insolvency depended entirely upon the result of the present action. If his defence was sustained, and the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reversed, the result would be that he would be rendered solvent. This, therefore, was not a case for requiring caution.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—I understand that if the defender were to be successful in this reclaiming note, and to obtain judgment in terms of his pleas, he would not be insolvent. This has not been contradicted. His position, therefore, is that he is provisionally insolvent, and I am not aware that on that ground we have ever ordained a defender to find caution.

The circumstance that the action relates to a partnership accounting is not to be left out of view. Such questions are generally difficult and troublesome to extricate, and we know that Judges frequently differ upon them. We must not, therefore, in this discussion, take for granted that the Lord Ordinary is right. I think this is a very weak case for ordaining the defender to find caution, and am therefore for refusing the motion.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT refused the motion, and sent the reclaiming note to the roll.

on the ground of fraud, of a certain assignation of policies of insurance for £1000 on the life of the deceased Thomas Morrison, the pursuer's brother. The pursuer employed Robert H. Arthur, S.S.C., as his agent in the Court of Session.

The case was put out in the Adjustment Roll on 10th June 1876, when no appearance was made for the pursuer. The Lord Ordinary continued the case till the following day, and appointed "R. H. Arthur, S.S.C., whose name appears on the record as agent for the pursuer, then to attend."

On the 11th June appearance was made by counsel, and an explanation given to the Lord Ordinary that the failure to attend on the previous day had been by inadvertence.

On the 21st June the record was closed, and a proof fixed for 5th July.

At the diet of proof on 5th July no appearance was made for the pursuer, and decree of absolvitor by default, with expenses, was pronounced in favour of the defenders.

The defenders' account of expenses was audited, and on 20th July the Lord Ordinary decerned for the taxed amount.

The pursuer, on the first box-day in vacation (24th August), lodged reclaiming note to be reponed against the decree by default of 5th July, but did not reclaim against the interlocutor decerning for expenses.

It was stated for the pursuer that he himself was resident in Glasgow; that he had employed Mr Arthur to conduct his case, and had furnished him with ample funds for that purpose; that Mr Arthur had neglected his duty, and misapplied these funds; and that he had now put the case into the hands of other agents. He asked to be reponed without any condition as to expenses, on the ground that the decree for expenses of 20th July 1876 was standing against him.

The defenders objected to the pursuer's being reponed, in consequence of his continued delays throughout the whole procedure in the case,¹ and contended that in no event should he be reponed, except on condition of paying a substantial amount of expenses, as the reponing him against the interlocutor of 5th July might possibly be held a ground for suspending the decree for expenses of 20th July, which proceeded upon it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no doubt that there has been a great deal of improper delay on the part of the pursuer in this case. But how far he is personally responsible for that delay, and how far it is attributable to his agent, is not so clear. I am of opinion, however, on the information before us, that the fault lay chiefly with the agent.

The interlocutor against which the pursuer now seeks to be reponed is one pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in consequence of the pursuer's failure to appear at a diet of proof. Now, that is a fault of a very serious kind indeed, and it is impossible for us to repone the pursuer except on very serious conditions as to expenses. Therefore, while I am not prepared to say that this reclaiming note to be reponed should be refused altogether, I think that the expenses which the pursuer must be ordained to pay should represent fully the expenses to which the defender has been put by the pursuer's default. And as we are not in a position to fix the amount of these expenses, I think it should be left to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain and decern for them.

An apparent difficulty was presented to us, in the fact that the defender had review. Now, that does undoubtedly introduce an element of difficulty. But Morrison v.

 here can be no doubt, first, that we cannot touch that interlocutor, and, second, Smith et al.
 at that being so, we ought to dispose of the reclaiming note to be reponed as no such interlocutor existed. Of course, in the event of a charge being given or the expenses decerned for on 20th July, the amount to be now fixed by the Lord Ordinary as the condition of the pursuer's being reponed, so far at least as it consists of expenses incurred prior to 20th July, will, if paid, be taken as a payment to account. On the question whether, on the pursuer being reponed against the decree of absolvitor by default, the decree for expenses, of which it was the warrant, may be suspended or not, I give no opinion.

What I propose is to repon the pursuer against this decree by default on payment of the expenses occasioned by the default, and to leave the Lord Ord-nary to ascertain the amount.

LORD DEAS.—It is a very delicate matter for the Court to interfere in cases such as this. It is a most wholesome rule that judgment allowed to go by default should not be opened up except in very special circumstances. But I am disposed to concur with your Lordship that we have here such special circumstances. The pursuer's position is that of a cashier or book-keeper to a plumber in Glasgow, and the sum in dispute is certainly a large sum for a person in that position. If he has a good claim at all it will be a very great hardship to deprive him of it for a fault which cannot well be said to have been his own, for I agree with your Lordship that the fault has rather lain with the agent than with the party, who had not the opportunity of knowing how his case was being conducted, and that is a material consideration in the case. Upon the whole, I am for opening up the decree; but the case is too special to form a precedent for any other.

LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Remit to the Lord Ordinary to repon the pursuer against the decree contained in the said interlocutor reclaimed against on payment of the expenses occasioned to the defenders by the pursuer's default."

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ON 16th May 1876 Colin Dunlop and Company, ironmasters, Quarter, near Hamilton, presented a summary petition of ejection in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton against James Meiklem or M'Ilquham, miller, in which they set forth that they were the principal tenants of Thinacre Mill, near Quarter, with dwelling-house, garden, pertinents, and land adjoining, extending to ten acres or thereby; that the said subjects were let by the petitioners to the respondent as tenant under them for the space of one year from Martinmas 1874 as to the land, and Whitsunday 1875 as to the mill, house, and pertinents, at the rent of £55 for the year.

The petitioners further stated that on or about 30th September 1875 they intimated to the respondent that the let of the subjects would not be renewed to him, and that he had been repeatedly informed by the petitioners' manager, or others representing them, that he would require to remove from the subjects at the expiry of the times above mentioned. They also stated that the respondent was, on 2d October 1875, timeously warned to remove by a sheriff officer at their instance; that they had let the subjects to a new tenant, Richard Stewart, with entry to the land on Martinmas 1875, and to the mill and houses at Whitsunday 1876; that Stewart had since ploughed and manured the land, but that the respondent refused to remove from the house at Whitsunday 1876, and consequently they prayed for a warrant of summary ejection and removal.

Meiklem, in a minute of defence, denied the petitioners' title, and specially denied that the petitioners had been or were principal tenants, or that they let or sublet the subjects in question to him as alleged. He explained and averred that he and his ancestors had possessed the subjects on yearly tack from the Duke of Hamilton from 1709 until the present time, and added that in 1874 the petitioners, or rather their manager, alleged they had become tenants of the premises in question, and that they held him as their subtenant on the same terms as when he possessed under the Duke of Hamilton.

He further denied that any such intimation had been given on 30th September as alleged by the petitioners. He produced the notice of removal served on 2d October, which bore to be a notice to remove from both land and houses at Martinmas 1875, and maintained that the notice was inept on several grounds,—1st, because it should have been given forty days before Whitsunday 1875; 2d, because it was a notice to remove from the houses at Martinmas, whereas the petitioners admittedly could only insist on removal from the houses at Whitsunday 1876; and 3d, because the warning was not even forty clear days before Martinmas (if warning forty days prior to that term was sufficient), but only thirty-nine days.

On 1st June the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of law that the warning given to respondent to remove is inept and insufficient, and sustains the defences founded on that ground : Finds it unnecessary to consider the other defences : Dismisses the action : Finds the respondent entitled to expenses." No. 6.

The petitioners appealed to the Sheriff (Dickson), who allowed them to amend the petition by adding the words—"Farther, the respondent informed the petitioners on or about 30th September last, and at other times, that he would remove from the subjects at the expiry of the said space of one year."

Oct. 24, 1876.
Dunlop & Co.
v. Meiklem.

The Sheriff adhered to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor in so far as it found that the warning referred to in the petition was inept and insufficient, and in so far as it sustained the defence to the action so far as laid upon the warning, quoad ultra recalled the said interlocutor, and, before answer, allowed both parties a proof of their averments.

A proof was accordingly taken.

The petitioners led no evidence in support of their allegation that they were principal lessees of the subjects, but they proved that the Duke of Hamilton had obtained a decree in absence against Meiklem, by which he was decreed to remove from the arable lands at Martinmas 1874, and from the mill, house, and pertinents at Whitsunday 1875; and also that in November 1874 Meiklem verbally agreed with Mr Robert Speirs, the petitioners' manager, to take the subjects from the petitioners for one year—that is, from Martinmas 1874 for the land, and from Whitsunday 1875 as to the mill and house. With regard to what subsequently happened it was proved that Meiklem had several conversations in the course of the year 1875 with Mr Speirs as to a deduction from his rent which he claimed in consequence of an alleged withdrawal of water by the petitioners. On 30th September 1875 he had an interview with Mr Speirs, and Mr Shaw (the petitioners' cashier). Mr Speirs deponed with reference to this interview,—“I went up to see the respondent in connection with some claims for water damage he had against the company. We could not get these arranged. We could not arrange as to the water damage, and at last, just before I was leaving I said to him, ‘Well, miller, it will be all right about the mill?’ He answered, ‘Yes, I am making ready to leave the mill.’ These are the words that the respondent used. After that, Mr Shaw said to him, ‘Shall we give you a warning away?’ and the respondent replied, ‘Any way you like; it is all one to me.’ I understood from what the respondent said that he was quite prepared, and was going to leave at the end of the year's lease which I had given him.”

Mr Shaw's evidence was to the same effect. Meiklem, however, denied that anything was then said about his removing, and swore that at a previous meeting with Shaw and Speirs he distinctly told them, in answer to a question by one of them, that he would not go without legal warning.

The warning mentioned in the petition was given by a sheriff officer on 2d October 1875.

In December 1875 the petitioners advertised the subjects to be let. One Richard Stewart, after being shewn over the mill by a son of Meiklem, agreed with the petitioners to take the subjects, with entry to the lands as at Martinmas 1875, and to the mill and house at Whitsunday 1876. Upon 5th February 1876 Stewart went to the garden accompanied by two men and pruned the gooseberry bushes. They did not see Meiklem, but his daughter, a girl of seventeen, made some objections to their operations. From the 22d February to 15th March Stewart and those acting for them laid down about fifty cartloads of dung upon the lands, and upon the 28th March the neighbouring farmers gave him a day's ploughing, by which the whole of the land was ploughed in one day. Meiklem happened to be absent that day, but he saw the manure laid down without making any objection. In the course of the spring he took out a number of gooseberry bushes and a few plum trees from the garden, as if he was going to remove. After the land had been manured and ploughed by Stewart, Meiklem sowed and harrowed the land, and when remonstrated with he said that he had not been legally warned away. This was the first intimation made by him that he intended to object to the warning which he had received. In the course of his examination as a witness Meiklem admitted that when he took out the gooseberry bushes and plum trees he intended to remove at Whitsunday 1876. Being asked whether he had consulted a law-agent with regard to the warning between the date of the ploughing match and the date of his sowing and harrowing the land, he replied that he did consult a law agent, but whether before or after the ploughing match he did not remember. In another part of his evidence he stated that when he got the warning on 2d October he saw at once that it was bad. He said that he was willing to pay Stewart for the manure.

Upon 18th July 1876 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the petitioners have failed to prove their title to sue: Sustains, therefore, the defences founded on that head: Finds it unnecessary to pronounce other findings, and dismisses the petition accordingly: Finds the petitioners liable in expenses."

On appeal the Sheriff adhered.*

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the petitioners;—The respondent had no right of possession except what he derived from the petitioners. He could not therefore impugn their title. It was only where the person sought to be removed derived his right from some source other than the pursuer of the action of removing that the plea of want of title could be maintained.¹

Argued for the respondent;—It was an important circumstance in the present case that the respondent's possession had been uninterrupted. The petitioners had never been in actual possession of the subjects. Although the Duke of Hamilton had taken a decree of removing against the respondent it had not been enforced. The respondent's agreement to hold for a year under the petitioners at the most only amounted to a recognition of their title for that year. He was in no way barred from challenging their title after the expiry of that period. There was therefore nothing to take the case out of the ordinary rule that the pursuer of an action of removing was bound to set forth his title, and to prove it if it was denied.² Here, while the petitioners' title was explicitly denied.

* "NOTE.—The defender challenges the pursuers' title as principal tenants for the period after the lease which he took from them terminated, viz., after Martinmas 1875 and Whitsunday 1876, as to the lands and mill, &c., respectively. It lay on the pursuers to prove their title so challenged, but they have not done so. The case is not within the principle urged for the pursuers, that a tenant may not challenge the title of the party from whom he has his lease, for the defender's lease was only up to the terms above mentioned; while the question is as to pursuers' title after these terms.

"It is with considerable regret that the Sheriff has found himself obliged to sustain this technical defence; for there seems to be no real doubt that the pursuers are still principal tenants in the mill and land in question. It appears to have been through mere oversight that they have not proved their tenancy."

v. Meiklem.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the Sheriff's interlocutor sustaining the objection to the petitioners' title must be recalled. Mr Meiklem's possession under the Duke of Hamilton was at an end. The result is either that he was holding by tacit relocation under the petitioners, or that he had no title at all. I think he was holding under the petitioners, and therefore that he cannot impugn their title.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMDALE.—I am of the same opinion. There was no necessity for a written title on the part of the petitioners. They can make out a sufficient title in a question with the respondent by shewing that they let the subjects to him for a year, and that at the end of it he was bound to remove. But the respondent says the warning he got to remove was bad, and that he was not bound to remove. If so, he must now be possessing by tacit relocation under the petitioners, and if so, he cannot dispute the title of his authors. He does not allege that he got any new or different right from the Duke of Hamilton after his right derived from the petitioners had come to a termination. It appears to me, therefore, that the Sheriffs have been premature in dismissing the petition on the question of title, and that the petitioners were entitled to judgment on what may be called the merits of the dispute between them and the respondent.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

Parties were then heard on the merits.

Argued for the appellants;—Formal warning was not necessary in the case of a piece of land let along with a house for a single year. In any view warning forty days before Martinmas 1875 was sufficient.¹ Where there was a double ish forty days' warning before the first ish was sufficient. The provision to that effect in the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 29, although in form applying only to summonses of removing, was in practice applied universally. It was not necessary that there should be forty clear days between the day of notice and the term-day; in reckoning the forty days, the proper way was to count either the day of notice or the term-day, though not both. It did not invalidate the warning that notice to remove from the house was given too soon. There was such acquiescence and rei interventus as to bar the respondent from objecting to the notice.²

Argued for the respondent;—This was a case in which a solemn warning under the Act 1555 was required. To be effectual the warning ought to have been given forty days before Whitsunday 1875.³ But assuming that notice forty days before Martinmas 1875 was sufficient, the notice given was altogether bad, first, because it was a notice to remove from both houses and lands at Martinmas 1875, whereas, in any case, the lessors could only insist in removal from the houses at Whitsunday 1876;

and, secondly, because the notice was only thirty-nine instead of forty clear days before the term.¹ No undertaking on the part of the tenant to remove without warning had been proved. Indeed, the petitioners plainly shewed by their attempt to give a legal warning that they were not relying on any agreement by the respondent to dispense with warning. Rei interventus was out of the question, for (even granting that a Martinmas warning was sufficient) as soon as the 1st October 1875 was allowed to expire before the notice was given tacit relocation had come into operation, and nothing which afterwards followed could affect that result. It was not a case of a defective notice which could be validated by rei interventus. The notice was utterly bad, or rather, there was no notice at all until too late. In these circumstances, the subsequent actings of the petitioners and of Stewart were entirely at their own risk. They chose to assume that the lease was at an end when it was not. There was no acquiescence in their proceedings on the part of the respondent. All that could be said was that he did not prevent them. He, or others for him, did object to Stewart's operations in the garden, and he was not bound to repeat his protest at every step. As for the manure which Stewart had put into the ground, that, at the utmost, could only give Stewart an equitable claim to recompense, which the respondent was quite willing to admit.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of opinion that this case is to be determined, not by reference to technical rules as to how and when warning should be given, but by the actings of the parties. The question is whether it is not possible for the parties to agree that without a formal warning the possession is to come to an end. To hold that such an arrangement is not competent where it has been followed by rei interventus would be very dangerous. For a tenant to profess to be about to remove, and to allow an intending incoming tenant to plough and manure the farm, and then enjoy the fruits of that other's labour, is a proceeding not to be encouraged even inter rusticos. Here there was a communication between the respondent and those acting for the petitioners in the autumn of 1875, which was followed up by the subjects being advertised, and by various acts on the part of the incoming tenant. The respondent admits that he had at one time the intention of removing, and he allowed that intention to be known by his mode of dealing with the subjects.

It must be kept in view that the rights on the part of the lessor to remove the tenant, and the right on the part of the tenant to go, are correlative. Tacit relocation can only come into operation by mutual consent. If there is no taciturnity—if the parties state to one another their intention of bringing the contract to an end—then it is the privilege of the tenant to go, and the privilege of the landlord to insist that he does go. It is quite plain that the parties were dissatisfied with each other, and that the tenant was told that he must go. The question is, whether the tenant's removing was so made matter of arrangement between the parties as to entitle the lessors to proceed upon that footing. Now, I think that the fair import of what the respondent said to those acting for the petitioners was—"Do as you like about formal warning. You may take that step if you think it necessary to preserve legal evidence; but between ourselves it is not necessary. I shall remove whether I am warned or not." I cannot think, after that conversation, if the tenant had wished to go he could have been prevented. This is followed by the tenant pulling up his gooseberry bushes as preparing to remove. On the other hand, the petitioners enter into an agreement with another man, who makes himself publicly known as the new tenant; and in that character the neighbouring farmers give him a day's ploughing. In short, the respondent, having got a notice to quit, which seems bungled in some way or other, makes no communication or remonstrance for six months; but now, when he sees that the landlord has got into a scrape, says—"I find you have done something that I can take hold of; I will reverse all that has been done since, and refuse to go." I think that it would be contrary to good faith to allow such a proceeding.

Oct. 24, 1876.
Dunlop & Co.
v. Meiklem.

The difficulties and uncertainties which exist as to time of warning in the case of a subject of this kind are an additional reason for the parties taking the matter into their own hands and making their own bargain, and for our enforcing that bargain. I think that the respondent is barred by personal objection from founding on any flaws in the notice to remove; and therefore, without going into the abstract question how warning should be given in such cases, I think that the prayer of the petition should be granted.

LORD ORMDALE.—This case, although in itself of little moment, requires to be carefully dealt with, for whatever we may decide in regard to general principles will of course be applicable to other analogous cases, however large and important the interests involved in them may be. At the same time, I have to remark that it does not occur to me that in the peculiar circumstances of this case we require to decide any of the larger questions which have been argued. I do not think it necessary for us to determine whether there was here a lease to which the statute of 1555 applies. I am rather disposed to think that a verbal lease for one year only is a contract or transaction to which the statute cannot be applied at all, seeing that to admit of its application warning of removal would have to be given the tenant, not only before his obtaining possession, but, it might be, even before the agreement with him was entered into. Accordingly, it seemed to be conceded that if a regular and unobjectionable warning had been given one day sooner than the notice was served on the respondent, that is to say, forty free days before the term of Martinmas, it would have been sufficient. But it is said the notice was bad, first, in point of time and, second, because it was a notice to remove from the houses as well as the lands at Martinmas. I do not wish to decide the question as to the time when warning of removal ought to be given under a yearly tenancy such as we have here. I rest my judgment on the ground stated by Lord Neaves, that the conduct of the tenant was such as to lead not only the lessors, but their new or incoming tenant Stewart, into the belief that he was going to remove from the houses at Whitsunday 1876, and that he had actually ceded the possession of the arable land as at Martinmas 1875. I therefore entirely concur with Lord Neaves in opinion that we should dispose of this case as a special one, on the ground, which the circumstances, I think, sufficiently support, that the respondent, by his own acts and conduct, must be held to have dispensed with any more formal warning than that which was given him, and is barred from maintaining his present defence.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur, upon the grounds on which your Lordships propose to put the judgment. I consider this a very clear case. Although the protection afforded by the statute to tenants is of a very wide and stringent character, a tenant is bound to act honestly, and not to mislead his landlord. It is plain that the tenant in this case did mislead his landlord in a scandalous manner. He received a notice to quit, in which, he says, he observed a defect; but before that, it is proved that he had a conversation with the landlord's manager, in which he gave the manager to understand that he was to remove. He allows the new tenant to plough and manure the lands, and then, at the last moment, he turns round and maintains that he was not bound to remove.

I wish to refer the bar to a passage in Mr Robert Bell's Treatise on Leases. On page 504 of the second edition, the last edition published in the author's lifetime, he says, "The tenant, to save trouble, may agree to remove; and in that case he ought to give a letter or other written obligation to the landlord binding himself to remove, and to dispense with any warning or process of removing. Even a promise to remove, when proved by the oath of the tenant, will be a sufficient ground of removing, without either warning or the calling of an action in Court, in terms of the Act of Sederunt July 28, 1744." Then he refers to a case of Edmonston v. Bryson, Kilkerran, Proof, No. 7, and continues, "I believe this matter has been carried still further, and that a chain of circumstances, indicating the intention of parties that the tenant should leave his farm at the expiry of his lease, has been held sufficient to supply the want of a warning or action of removing; and that this has been found in the following cases, though none of them appear to have been collected." And then he refers to three cases. I think that the circumstances of the present case fit completely within the rule laid down by Mr Bell.

We indicate no opinion as to whether a lease for one year of a small piece of arable land along with a house renders a formal warning necessary; but I may add that Mr Robert Bell, in a passage immediately following that which I have read, upon an examination of the cases on this point, expresses an opinion "that a tenant may be removed from a lease set for one year only without the formality of a warning or action of removing."

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the title of the appellants: Find on the proof that the respondent, after the date of the warning libelled, undertook verbally to remove from the whole subjects before the term of Whitsunday 1876, and further, that he acquiesced in the warning he had received, and allowed the incoming tenant to plough and manure the lands without objection: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment appealed from, and remit the case to the Sheriff with instructions to grant the prayer of the petition: Find the appellants entitled to expenses in both Courts, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report, and decern."

Beattie v.

Poor-Law Act—Settlement.—1st, Circumstances in which held that an absence of some months did not break the continuity of residence in the acquisition of a settlement under the Poor-Law Act. 2d, It is a ruled point that facts and circumstances indicating intention to return or not to return to the disputed parish may be an element in a question of residential settlement.

In this action of declarator the question for decision was, whether the settlement of the pauper, Robert Miller, at the time of his death, was in Hamilton, which was the parish of his birth, or in the parish of Cardross, where it was said he had acquired a residential settlement. Upon the answer to this question the pecuniary liability to support the deceased's wife and children depended. It appeared clearly upon the proof that Miller had resided continuously at Cardross from May 1862 to the end of 1868, with the exception of one disputed period of a few months prior to Whitsunday 1867. The question between the parties consequently came to be whether that period was or was not to be regarded as an interruption to the continuity of the residence. The material facts bearing upon this question may be sufficiently gathered from the opinion delivered by Lord Deas.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the deceased Robert Miller, mason, sometime residing at No. 50 Meuse Lane, Cowcaddens, Glasgow, who died in December 1871, resided continuously within the parish of Cardross for the period between May 1862 and the end of 1868, and thereby acquired a residential settlement in that parish, the benefit of which accrued to his widow and children: Therefore decerns against the defender, William Stuart Paterson, inspector of poor of, and as representing the parochial board of the parish of Cardross, in terms of the conclusions of the summons against him: Assolzie the defender, Alexander Laidlaw Smith, inspector of poor of, and as representing the parochial board of the parish of Hamilton, from the conclusions of the action directed against him, and decerns: Finds the defender, William Stuart Paterson, liable in expenses to the pursuer, and to the other defender, Alexander Laidlaw Smith," &c.

The inspector of Cardross reclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—Miller, who was by trade a mason, became a resident in the parish of Cardross in May 1862. In the end of 1866 he was still residing in that parish. He tenanted a house in Levenhaugh Street, Dennystown, which is in the parish of Cardross. The furniture was his own. In December 1866 or January 1867 he had a quarrel with his wife, and left her without money, and without informing her where he was going. In January he got a job at Arrochar from Mr Duncan, builder, Dumbarton, who had been one of his usual employers in the execution of contracts in different parts of the country. Miller continued at that job in Arrochar till May. His wife remained in the meantime, for about three weeks, in the house in Levenhaugh Street. At the end of that time she locked up the house and furniture, took the key with her, and went to Dumbarton, on the opposite side of the river Leven, and in a different parish, in order, apparently, to find the means of subsistence. She hired a furnished room in Quay Street, Dumbarton, where she supported herself by her labour till April, when she heard that her husband was at Arrochar, and forthwith joined him there. They remained together there for about six weeks, when the job being finished they returned to Dennystown. They could not resume possession of the house there because their lease of it had just expired, and the furniture had been sequestrated for non-payment of the rent. They consequently went into lodgings in Dennystown. In the following September they paid some money to the factor, and came to an arrangement by which they got back their furniture. Soon after they took another house in Bridgend, Dennystown, and it was not disputed that unless the period of absence in Arrochar fell to be deducted the residential settlement was complete.

In these circumstances it was contended for the parish of Cardross that the continuity of the pauper's residence there was broken by his absence during the three or four months preceding Whitsunday 1867. In support of this proposition it was contended that an intention on the part of the pauper either to abandon his residence in a particular parish or to retain it was not an admissible element of evidence in a case of this kind. An opinion to that effect was expressed by Lord Neaves in the note to his interlocutor in Hay v. Beattie, Dec. 1, 1857, 20 D. 146. But no decision was pronounced to that effect, and it is plain that the course of recent decisions has been the other way. I do not intend to go over the cases. But I may refer to the case of Greig v. Miles, July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1132, 39 Scot. Jur. 617. That was the case of a sailor who was absent on voyages for more than half of the whole five years, and yet the residence was held by the whole Court (the Lord President and Lord Benholme alone dissenting) to be continuous. I refer to that case particularly, because, in the subsequent case of Moncrieff v. Ross, Jan. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 331, the Lord President, although he dissented from the judgment, observed that the case of Greig v. Miles had set up the rule that the word residence may be sufficiently satisfied by constructive residence. I do not think we could have a better authority for saying that the rule has been established, and, accordingly, it was acted on in that same case of Moncrieff v. Ross. This was followed by a unanimous decision by the Second Division in Milne v. Ramsay, May 23, 1872, 10 Macph. 731, 44 Scot. Jur. 435. Therefore it can hardly be doubted that according to the course of decisions, the intention of a man to retain or abandon his residence is to be held an element to be taken into account in such cases, and that the mere fact of his bodily absence, though for a considerable period, is not of itself conclusive that the continuity of the residence has been broken.

I fully admit that the mere intention to return will not of itself preserve the continuity, and that, on the other hand, the length of absence may be such as in some cases to prove of itself that the continuity has been effectually broken. But in the present case I think the pauper retained his connection with the parish. He left his wife and his furniture there. I see no proof or presumption that he intended otherwise than to return to the parish. He did return so soon as his temporary object was served, and, in these circumstances, there appears to me to be no authority for holding that the continuity of his residence was broken. The only case which has been founded on to the contrary is Allan v. Shaw and King, Feb. 24, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 463. That was a narrow case. But there the pauper retained no connection with Shotts, the alleged parish of his residential settlement, but set up house for a time with his wife and family in another parish where he was working.

On the whole, as consistency in the decisions is of more than usual importance in this class of cases, I am for adhering to the interlocutor.

Beattie v.
Smith and Paterson.

LORD MURK.—This is a case of some nicety. The difficulty is to say whether it falls under the authority of the case of Allan v. Shaw and King, Feb. 24, 1875, or of the earlier cases of Greig v. Miles, Moncrieff v. Ross, and Milne v. Ramsay, referred to by Lord Deas. It is clear upon the evidence that the continuity of the pauper's residence in Cardross for five years was not broken, unless it was by his absence when working as a mason at Arrochar for several months in 1867, during the latter part of which period his wife was with him. In the case of Greig v. Miles a sailor was absent in pursuit of his calling at different periods for more than half of the five years. In Moncrieff v. Ross a fisherman was also absent for long periods, though he retained his house. Milne v. Ramsay was the case of a shoemaker, who was away on several occasions, sometimes in the prosecution of his trade as a shoemaker, at others as a farm-servant, and on one of these occasions for as much as six months at one time. In all these cases, however, the absent parties retained their houses, which were occupied by their families during their absence, and it was on that account held that these long periods of absence were not sufficient to break the continuity. In the case of Allan, where the contrary was decided, the pauper had not only removed himself from one parish to another, but after a time removed his family also, and so gave up all connection with the former parish. Now, if, in the present case, the wife and family of the pauper had continued to reside in Cardross parish during the whole period of his absence at Arrochar, we should have had the same circumstances to deal with as in the earlier cases. Because, when the pauper went to Arrochar he left his wife and furniture in his house in Cardross, which was rented by him till Whitsunday 1867, when he returned and again resided with his wife in Cardross parish, though not in the same house, for the lease of it expired at that term. But the specialty of this case is that shortly after the pauper went to Arrochar his wife left the house in Cardross and went to reside in Dumbarton parish, and that for about three months during the spring of 1867 neither the man nor his wife lived in Cardross. The question, therefore, to be decided is, whether the fact of the wife going away of her own accord to another parish when her husband was absent makes such a distinction as to lead to the conclusion that there was a break in the continuity of the residence. I have come to be of opinion, though not without considerable hesitation, that the circumstance of the wife having thus left the house is not sufficient to infer a break in the continuity. For the man remained tenant of the house and left his wife to reside there while he was absent, and I do not think that the mere fact of her having left the house during a part of the time, when he was away, is enough to take the case out of the general rule.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that a five years' residence as the foundation of an industrial settlement may, according to the authorities, be composed to a certain extent of periods of constructive residence. It has not been held that the whole five years may be so composed, nor has it been decided what portion of it may. That will be a difficult question when it arises, if it ever does. But all the length that the decisions have gone has been to hold that, though a man may go away occasionally for a few weeks or months, if he leaves his family and retains his house, his occasional absence will not break the continuity. I participate in Lord Mure's difficulty, because, if we adhere to this interlocutor it will be carrying the principle of constructive residence a step further. But, looking to the authorities, I cannot say that they will not warrant the judgment proposed.

THE COURT adhered.

Bankrupt—Revocation—Trust-Disposition—Marriage-Contract—Provision for Children.—A person who held two estates by disposition from his father, the one under reservation of the father's liferent, and the other absolutely, conveyed the first estate to trustees, and the second he conveyed in liferent to his father and in fee to the trustees. He reserved from his conveyances to the trustees his own liferent, power of management during his lifetime, and a power to burden to the extent of an annuity of £100 to any wife he might marry. The care of the trustees on the possession and management was only to be after the death of the grantor and of his father. The purposes of the trust were that the trustees should hold the estates till the eldest of any sons the truster might have should attain majority, and then convey them to the son. The trustees were at first in feist, and they concurred in granting certain leases, and also in granting a disposition of a small part of the estate.

Fourteen days after the date of the trust-deed the grantor executed a marriage-contract, which, inter alia, bore that he, in virtue of the power reserved to him in the trust-deed (described as granted in favour of "trustees for the purposes therein specified"), burdened the estates with an annuity of £100 payable to his widow, and made provision for any children he might have, "other than the child who shall succeed to the estates . . . under the direction with reference to a destination of these estates contained in the said trust-disposition." The grantor was married seventeen days after the date of the trust-disposition. Several sons were born of the marriage.

The grantor having become bankrupt, his trustee brought an action of reduction of the trust-deed. Held (1) that the deed was not in itself valid against creditors; and (2) that it was not, by the reference in the marriage-contract, made part of the marriage settlement so as to be valid against creditors in respect of the marriage and the birth of a son.

Lord Deas dissented, on the ground that the trust-deed was an absolute conveyance, executed in contemplation of marriage, delivered to and acted on by the trustees recognised in the marriage-contract, and that the two deeds formed the antenuptial marriage settlement, and were effectual against creditors.

Lord Young.
B.

THIS action was raised by the trustee in the sequestration of Stewart S. Robertson to set aside a trust-conveyance executed by the bankrupt on 12th April 1862.

By disposition dated 2d December and recorded in the Register of Sasines on 10th December 1861, David Souter Robertson of Lawhead conveyed, under reservation of his own liferent, the lands of Lawhead Tarbrax, and others, to his eldest son, Stewart S. Robertson, and he also conveyed to him the estate of Easterhouse absolutely.

By trust-disposition dated 12th April 1862 Stewart S. Robertson conveyed the estate of Lawhead to George Auldjo Jamieson and others.

trustees, reserving his father's liferent, as was done in the deed conveying the estate to him. The disposition further bore—"And I do hereby dis-ppose to the said David Souter Robertson, my father, in liferent, for his liferent use and enjoyment, and subject to his uncontrolled management during all the days of his life, and to the said trustees in trust as aforesaid, and to their foresaids in fee, heritably and irredeemably," the lands of Easterhouse; "but always with and under the exceptions specified in the said instrument of sasine, together with my whole right, title, and interest in the said several lands and others; but reserving always, as I do hereby specially reserve from the above-written conveyance of the said several lands and others in favour of the said trustees, my liferent use, possession, and enjoyment of the said lands and others, and the uncontrolled management thereof during all the days of my life from and after the death of my said father, and reserving also full power to me, either in contemplation of or after my marriage, to burden and affect the said several lands and others with an annuity or jointure in favour of any wife I may marry, not exceeding £100 per annum, to be made payable, the said annuity or jointure, to my wife, should she survive my said father and me, out of the said lands and others, or any part thereof, at two terms of the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, commencing the first payment of the said annuity at the first of these terms which shall happen after the death of my said father and me, for the subsequent half year, and so forth half-yearly thereafter during the life of my said wife after the death of my said father and me, and which power of granting such annuity or jointure hereby reserved by me may be exercised by my granting a bond of annuity to be contained in any contract of marriage, or by a separate bond to be executed by me in contemplation of or subsequent to my marriage; and it is hereby expressly provided and declared that, subject to the reserved liferent rights in favour of my said father and me, and my reserved right to burden and affect the said lands with an annuity or jointure as aforesaid, these presents are granted, and shall be accepted by the trustees acting in the trust hereby created, in trust, to the intent and purpose that they may and shall, immediately upon the death of my said father and me, enter upon the possession and management of the said lands and others above conveyed, and hold the same as a trust-estate, and apply the same, and the proceeds thereof, for the uses and purposes following, viz.—In the first place, for the payment of the expenses attending the execution of this trust and the management thereof. Secondly"—(This head provides for payment of the wife's annuity and expenses of management). "Thirdly, in the event of my dying survived by issue of my body, the said trustees shall hold the said lands and others, and shall apply the free balance or surplus of the annual income of the trust-estate, after deducting the burdens, expense of repairs, interest of debts, and annuity hereinbefore directed to be paid, and the expenses of management applicable to the collecting and recovering of the income or such portion of the said free balance or surplus as may be necessary for the maintenance, education, and advancement of my eldest or only son, or failing my having a son, or in the event of the decease of all my sons previous to the period hereinafter prescribed for conveying the said trust-estate, then for the maintenance and education of my eldest or only daughter, the said trustees having the fullest discretion as to what proportion of the said free balance or surplus shall be applied in any year for these purposes, and any balance of the said surplus arising in any year after applying the same as aforesaid shall be applied in payment of any debt which may then affect the trust-estate, or be added to and form part of the capital of the trust-estate under the management of the trustees. Fourthly, upon my eldest or only son attaining the age of twenty-one years, or failing sons, upon my eldest or only daughter attaining that age, or being married, whichever event shall first happen, my trustees shall convey and make over the trust-estate as then held by them, and, subject to any debts or incumbrances which may affect the same, to such eldest or only son or eldest or only daughter, as the case may be, and to his or her heirs or assignees whomsoever. Fifthly, failing my having children, or in the event of their all predeceasing the period prescribed for making over the said trust-estate to them as aforesaid, the trustees shall, in the event of my brother, the said David Souter Robertson junior, being then in life, continue to hold the said trust-estate, and shall pay over to him the whole free balance or surplus of the annual income thereof, after deducting as aforesaid; and in the event of his predeceasing the period of payment to him of the said free balance or surplus, under this direction, or upon his death, should he survive that period, the trustees shall apply the said free balance or surplus wholly or partially, as hereinbefore provided in the case of my children as aforesaid, for the maintenance, education, and advancement in life of the eldest or only son of my said brother, or of his eldest or only daughter, and shall make over the said estate to such eldest or only son or eldest or only daughter, and his or her heirs or assignees, at the period or in the manner hereinbefore directed with reference to my children. Sixthly, in the event of my dying childless, or of all my children and their issue predeceasing the period before prescribed for making over the said trust-estate to them by the said trustees as aforesaid, and in the event of my said brother dying childless, or his children and their issue predeceasing as aforesaid, the trustees shall make over the said trust-estate as held by them at the time to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of my said father. . . . Also I give full power to my trustees to make up and complete all proper titles in their persons to the lands and others hereby conveyed, with the fullest powers of administration and management of the trust-estate under their charge."

A notarial instrument, following on the disposition of 12th April 1862 was recorded in the General Register of Sasines on 17th April 1862 on behalf of the trustees and David S. Robertson, "for their respective rights and interests in the lands and others thereby disposed."

On 26th April, in contemplation of a marriage which had been arranged between the said Stewart S. Robertson and Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, a marriage-contract was executed by these parties and by David S. Robertson, the father of Stewart S. Robertson, and Miss Eliza Hamilton, the sister of the bride, whereby Stewart S. Robertson bound himself to pay an annuity of £300 to his widow in the event of her survivance, restricted to £150 in the event of her entering into a second marriage; "and in security so far of the personal obligation above-written for payment of the said annuity, and restricted annuity, and without prejudice thereto, the said Stewart Souter Robertson, in virtue of a power to that effect reserved to him in a trust-disposition, dated 12th April 1862, of the estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, in favour of George Auldjo Jamieson, accountant in Edinburgh, and other trustees, for the purposes therein specified, hereby provides and disposes to the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, in liferent during all the days of her lifetime, after the death of his said father and him, in case she shall survive them, not only a free yearly annuity of £100, to be uplifted and taken free of all burdens and deductions, at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, commencing the first payment of the said annuity of £100 at the first of these terms which shall happen after the death of his said father and him for the subsequent half year, and so forth half-yearly thereafter during the life of the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, after the death of the said Stewart Souter Robertson and his said father, furth of, in the first place, All and Whole the lands of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and others, . . . and furth of, in the second place, All and Whole the lands of Easterhouse and others, . . .

. . . or furth of any part or portion of the said lands and others, eadiest rents, maills, farms, profits, and duties of the same, but also All and Whole the said lands and others themselves, in real security, and for payment to the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton of the said annuity of £100, part of the said annuity of £300 payable to her as aforesaid, to be holden, he said annuity of £100, upliftable furth of the said lands and others, and also the said lands and others themselves, a me vel de me." (Here there is a provision as to payment of the annuity of £100 by David Souter Robertson in the event of his surviving his son.) "Further, the said Stewart Souter Robertson, in contemplation of the said intended marriage, binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to make payment to the child or children to be procreated of the marriage hereby contracted who shall be alive at his death, other than the child who shall succeed to the said estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, under the directions with reference to the destination of these estates contained in the said trust-disposition thereof in favour of George Auldjo Jamieson and others, as trustees foresaid, and to the issue then alive of any such child or children who shall not succeed as aforesaid, who shall have previously died leaving issue, of the sum of £5000 sterling at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the said Stewart Souter Robertson, . . . and the said sum of £5000 shall be divisible between or among the said children and issue of children entitled thereto as aforesaid, if there shall be more than one child alive, or who shall have died leaving issue, in such proportions as the said Stewart Souter Robertson shall appoint by any writing under his hand; and failing such appointment, the said provision of £5000 shall be divisible equally among the children and issue of children of the marriage entitled thereto as aforesaid, the issue of any deceased child being entitled to the share which such child would have drawn if he or she had been alive."

The marriage-contract trustees were to hold the estate of the husband for the following purposes:—"First, for payment of the expenses of executing this trust. Second, for payment of the annual interest or produce of the sums of money and others hereby assigned, during the subsistence of the marriage hereby contracted, to the said Stewart Souter Robertson or his assignees. Third, after the death of the said Stewart Souter Robertson, if he shall be survived by the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, then the interest of the trust-estate shall be applied in payment of the foresaid annuity or jointure of £300, or restricted annuity, to the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, in so far as the same may not be received from the said estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse; and should there be any surplus interest or income in any year after satisfying the said annuity, the same shall, in the discretion of the trustees, be either applied towards the maintenance and advancement in life of the said younger children of the marriage, or added to the capital of the trust-estate hereby assigned, to be divided as after-mentioned. Fourth, on the death of the said Stewart Souter Robertson, if he shall survive the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, or upon her death, should he predecease her, the trustees shall hold the trust-estate hereby assigned for behoof of the younger child or younger children of the marriage, in or towards implement, as the case may be, of the before-written obligation by the said Stewart Souter Robertson for payment of the sum of £5000 to the younger children of the marriage; and which sum of £5000, or whatever lesser sum the trustees shall then hold in virtue of the assignation before-written, shall be payable to and divisible between or among the child or children of the marriage (other than the child who shall succeed as aforesaid to the said estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse), and the issue of children entitled thereto, as hereinbefore provided in the case of the before-written personal obligation for payment of the said sum to the younger child or children of the marriage. Fifth," "And failing any child or children of the marriage, or issue of such child or children, then the trustees shall hold the said trust-estate hereby assigned for the representatives or assignees whomsoever of the said Stewart Souter Robertson." The deed then proceeded,—“For which causes, and on the other part, Miss Eliza Hamilton, residing at Fairholm, sister of the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, in contemplation of the said intended marriage, and in terms of an arrangement to the effect after specified, undertaken by her in treaty for the said intended marriage, hereby binds and obliges herself but only in the event of her succeeding to the entailed estates of Fairholm and others, in the counties of Lanark and Edinburgh, of which she is at present the presumptive heiress of entail, to make payment to the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, of the sum of £2000 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of four per centum per annum from the date of her succession to the said estates during the not payment, payable, the said principal sum of £2000, by half-yearly instalments of £100 each, commencing payment of the first of these instalments two years after the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas subsequent to the succession of the said Eliza Hamilton to the said entailed estates.”

Ann Scrivenor Hamilton conveyed all her property, including the obligation by her sister, to the trustees, excluding her intended husband's jus mariti, and he renounced his jus mariti with regard to all the property of his intended wife:—“And it is hereby provided and declared, that the said trustees shall have the fullest powers of managing, recovering, and realising the said estate, and particularly the said sum of £2000 which the said Eliza Hamilton has become bound to pay as aforesaid, as and when the same shall be received by them under the said obligation.”

On 29th April 1862 Stewart S. Robertson was married to Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, and five children were born of the marriage, the eldest son being David J. Robertson.

David S. Robertson granted a letter of obligation to pay an annuity of £100 to Stewart S. Robertson's wife in the event of her surviving her husband, in the event of her annuity not being paid from the husband's estate, and this letter was referred to in the marriage-contract.

On 15th September 1874 the estates of Stewart Souter Robertson were sequestrated, and John Clark Forrest was appointed trustee.

The trustee brought an action against George Auldjo Jamieson and others, as trustees under the trust-disposition of 12th April 1862, concluding for declarator that the estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, &c., under reservation of the liferent of David Souter Robertson senior, and the estate of Easterhouse, were transferred to and vested in him, as trustee for behoof of the creditors, from the date of sequestration; that the trust-deed of 12th April 1862, and the notarial instrument following thereon, were revoked by the sequestration, “without prejudice to the liferent conveyance of the said lands of Easterhouse and others to the said David Souter Robertson senior.”

A supplementary summons was brought containing conclusions for reduction of the trust-deed and notarial instrument following thereon.

David J. Robertson, the eldest son of Stewart Souter Robertson, was listed as a party to the action, and Mr James Bruce, W.S., was appointed his curator ad litem. No. 8.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The trust-disposition in question is sua natura revocable, and has been revoked by the sequestration. (2) The said deed, if irrevocable by the bankrupt's gratuitous acts and deeds, is invalid in competition with his onerous creditors, represented by the pursuer. (3) The operation of the said trust-disposition being postponed to the bankrupt's death, the lands and others in question fall under the intervening sequestration of his estates. (4) The said trust-disposition not being a de presenti divestiture of the bankrupt inter vivos, and being expressly or by necessary implication subject to the bankrupt's debts, the defenders' infetment forms no bar to this action. (5) The said trust-disposition being in fraud and to the hurt and prejudice of the bankrupt's creditors, the same should be set aside. (8) Evidence of the communings, conditions, stipulations, or other extrinsic facts alleged by the defenders is incompetent to modify or affect the terms and construction of the deeds referred to by the pursuer, or to exclude challenge in this question with the pursuer. (9) The marriage-contract forms no bar to this action, in respect—1. It was subsequent in date, and is extrinsic to the trust-disposition and the infetment thereon; 2. It leaves the trust-disposition an independent deed, and subject to all the exceptions now pleaded against it; 3. It in any case contemplates only a possible succession at the bankrupt's death, defeasible by the bankrupt's creditors.

David J. Robertson and his curator stated;—(Stat. 1) "The said Stewart Souter Robertson was married on 29th April 1862 to Ann Scrivenor Hamilton." (Stat. 2) "The engagement of marriage between the said Stewart Souter Robertson and Mrs Ann Scrivenor Hamilton or Robertson, on which the said marriage followed, was formed in July 1861. The disposition by David Souter Robertson, dated 2d December 1861, and also the trust-disposition under reduction, were executed in contemplation of the said marriage, and with a view to make provision for the same. The former deed was executed by the said David Souter Robertson in order that his son might settle the lands thereby conveyed in terms of the deed under reduction. The deed under reduction formed part of the marriage settlement between the said Stewart Souter Robertson and Ann Scrivenor Hamilton; it was stipulated for and obtained on behalf of the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, and the marriage took place on the faith of the settlement of the lands thereby made." (Stat. 4) "The trustees accepted office and completed their title to the said lands, the notarial instrument following on the said trust-disposition having been recorded on 17th April 1862."

The trustees pleaded;—(1) The trust-disposition in favour of the defenders being an irrevocable and delivered deed, and they being infet in virtue thereof, are entitled to be assoltized from the first declaratory and reductive conclusions of the action. (2) The trust-disposition not being gratuitous, but having been granted as a condition of obtaining a conveyance to the said lands, is not reducible on any of the grounds stated. (3) Upon the death of David Souter Robertson and Stewart Souter Robertson, the defenders are entitled to enter into possession of the lands conveyed by the trust-disposition, and to administer the same in terms of the trust.

David J. Robertson pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to entitle him to decree. (2) The trust-disposition under reduction being an irrevocable and delivered deed, and the trustees having completed their title thereon, decree cannot be obtained.

(3) The trust-disposition not being gratuitous, but having been granted as a condition of obtaining a conveyance to the said lands, is not reducible on any of the grounds stated. (4) The said trust-disposition was onerous, and cannot be set aside, in respect it formed part of the matrimonial settlement aforesaid, on the faith of which marriage has ensued. (5) The settlement of the lands in favour of the eldest son of the marriage having been an onerous provision, cannot be recalled by the said Stewart Souter Robertson, or by those deriving right from him, and the defender the said David J. Robertson is entitled to have decree accordingly. (6) The pursuer being in right only of the liferent reserved by the said Stewart Souter Robertson is not entitled to work the minerals in the said lands.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the trust-disposition in question is not valid against the creditors in the sequestration of Stewart Souter Robertson, represented by the pursuer: Therefore repels the defences, and finds and declares in terms of the first two conclusions of the original summons, and reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the supplementary summons: Grants warrant to and ordains the keeper of the Register of Sasines to record an extract of the decree in the division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Lanark: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuer in expenses and remits the account," &c.*

* "JUDGMENT.—Three questions were argued in this case, with much ability and a copious references to authorities:—(1st) Whether the trust-deed of 12th April 1862 is, with respect to the fee of the property thereby conveyed, good against the creditors of the truster? (2d) Whether, although not originally good against creditors, it is rendered so by the references thereto in the truster's marriage contract of 26th April 1862? And (3d) Whether, if neither originally good against creditors, nor rendered so referentially by the execution of the marriage contract and the marriage following on it, it became good on the birth of a son of the marriage?

"My opinion is against the defenders on all these questions.

"1. On the first question the defenders contended that the truster having conveyed the fee to trustees by a delivered deed, on which infeftment followed, it was thereafter beyond his own power, and consequently beyond the power of his creditors. The pursuer answered that, having regard to the quality of the conveyance as voluntary and gratuitous, and the purpose of the trust, which is to govern the truster's succession, or the descent of his property after his death, the deed could have no effect against creditors; and I think the answer is good. The arguments hinc inde are too obvious to require expression. The gratuitous character of the deed is indisputable, but the defenders urged that its purpose was not to govern succession, because the granter was thereby immediately divested of the fee which he conveyed to his trustees, and in which they were infeft. But the validity of a deed to place property beyond the reach of creditors depends on considerations superior to the theory of conveyancing. A man may impoverish himself by improvident gifts as well as by reckless expenditure, without remedy to his subsequent creditors. But here was no de praesenti gift except in the form and style of the deed by which the maker designed to regulate his succession with respect to the property which he meant to retain for his own use and enjoyment as long as he lived. It is trite law that a gratuitous entail, however formal and strict, and with the fetters applied to the entailor himself as institute, is not good against the entailor's creditors; and although an institute (or heir) of entail is a fiar, yet a fee tail (or tailzied fee, if that be the preferable term) is substantially and radically different from a fee-simple, and is, in truth, undistinguishable for any practical purpose whatever from the life estate, which the maker of the deed now in question thereby retained to himself. No entail is bad against the entailor's creditors not upon any technical rule of conveyancing, but on the consideration that it is against public policy to allow a man gratuitously to put an estate, the enjoyment of which he retains while

David J. Robertson and his curator reclaimed,—

No. 8.

During the argument the defenders were allowed to make an addition to the record. They then stated that the trust-disposition of 1862 was delivered to the trustees, who acted upon it. "They completed their title to the said lands by notarial instrument duly recorded on 17th April 1862. Further, as vested in the fee of the said lands, the said trustees executed various deeds affecting the estate. In 1866, the said George Auldjo Jamieson and James Auldjo Jamieson, as the acting trustees under the said trust-disposition, along with the said David Souter Robertson the eldest, and the said Stewart Souter Robertson, for their respective rights and interests in the said lands, granted to Eben Waugh Fernie, residing at Almondell, Linlithgowshire, a lease of the minerals of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, for the space of thirty years from Martinmas 1866. The said lease, which was dated 29th March and 2d and 5th April 1866, was thereafter assigned by the testamentary trustees of the said Eben Waugh Fernie to Robert Galloway, Torphichen Street, Edinburgh, and the assignation having been intimated to the said David Souter Robertson the eldest, Stewart Souter Robertson, and the said trustees they, along with the said David Souter Robertson and Stewart Souter Robertson executed a minute of acknowledgment of intimation, dated 26th and 29th December 1870 and 12th January 1871. A bond and assignation in security of the said lease having been at the same time executed by the said Robert Galloway in favour of the testamentary trustees of the said Eben Waugh Fernie, was intimated to the said David Souter Robertson the eldest, Stewart Souter Robertson, and the said trustees, and along with the said David Souter Robertson and Stewart Souter Robertson the said trustees executed a minute of acknowledgment of intimation of the last-mentioned dates. In 1867 the Caledonian Railway Company agreed to construct a branch line to Tarbrax, and the said trustees, considering that this line would greatly benefit the estate, resolved to grant, free of any money payment, a conveyance of a part of the trust-estate which was desired by the company for the purposes of the line. Accordingly a disposition of the said part of the trust-estate, dated 15th, 25th, and 26th June 1867, was granted to the company by the said George Auldjo Jamieson and James Auldjo Jamieson, as trustees then acting as aforesaid, with consent of the said David Souter Robertson the eldest, and Stewart Souter Robertson, and by the said David Souter Robertson and Stewart Souter Robertson, for all right of liferent or other lives, beyond the reach of his creditors, by any device whatever, for securing it to his heirs after his death. I am not prepared to hold that while this cannot be done by an entail it may be accomplished by a trust having precisely the same end and object, whereby the trustees are immediately infeft in the fee for behoof of heirs to whom the estate is destined after the truster's death.

"II. On the second question, I am of opinion that the references made to the trust-deed in the marriage-contract do not affect the character of the prior deed, nor its validity in a question with creditors. The trust conveyance and purposes of it, I assume, have been imported by reference into the contract in such a manner as to make them part of the contract, and give them validity as onerous accordingly, but I think this has not been done. On the contrary, I agree with the pursuer's argument that the language of the reference is such as to shew clearly that it was intended that the rights or prospects of succession referred to should stand on the deed that gave them, and upon it only.

"III. The third question is not, in my opinion, even arguable on the part of the defenders, and, at least, I cannot assent to the proposition that the claim put forward by the pursuer is dependent on the circumstance whether or not there is a son of the marriage now in life."

right which they respectively for themselves or others had or could claim in the lands thereby disposed in any manner of way. No money consideration was paid by the railway company to any of the granters of the said disposition."

The pursuer, in answer, stated that the deed and notarial instrument following thereon were prepared by Messrs Tods, Murray, and Jamieson, W.S. the agents of Stewart Souter Robertson, and that one of the trustees, Mr. Jamieson, was a member of that firm. "Further explained that no minute of acceptance of the pretended trust was made by the said trustees; that they held no meetings, and had no intromissions, and in no way interfered with or controlled the possession and management of the lands in question by the bankrupt and his father, whose mere instructions they followed in giving their concurrence as aforesaid. Further explained that, as the reclaimer in the said lands, the bankrupt, from time to time between the date of the said trust-disposition and his sequestration, expended the sum £700 upon improvements on the lands in question, thereby adding to the value of the said lands at the cost of his general estate now in the pursuer's hands."

The reclaimers argued;—The maker of the deed could not have revoked it, and his creditors could not be in a better position. The deed vested the estates in the trustees, who were bound to hold them for the purposes of the trust, and they were not entitled to denude in favour of creditors. The deed was de presenti in form, and conveyed the estate irredeemably, which shewed that it was not a mortis causa deed. If there had been an unlimited power to burden, the effect of the deed might have been that the liferent of the granter would have been virtually a fee; but here the power of burdening was restricted to granting an annuity of £100 a-year to a wife. The disposition took effect at once, and the only thing which was postponed was the possession and management. The marriage-contract and the trust-deed must be read together as constituting the provisions which were made in contemplation of the marriage which followed, and were thus highly onerous deeds. Under these the beneficiaries acquired rights which could not be defeated by the bankrupt nor his creditors.¹

The pursuer argued;—The trust-deed was a mortis causa deed not intended to come into operation till the granter's death. This was plain from the full management being left in the granter's hands during his lifetime. The mere fact that a tenant or a purchaser preferred to have the concurrence of the trustees in any act of management would not affect the question. The whole purposes were mortis causa, and did not take effect till the death of the granter.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case two questions have been argued to us—First, Whether the trust-deed of the 12th of April 1862 is good against the creditors of the truster? and, secondly, Whether, upon the assumption that that deed is not in itself effectual against creditors of the truster, it is rendered so by the references made to it in the subsequent marriage-contract of the truster of the 16th of April of the same year?

These are important questions, but the view which I take in regard to both of them is in accordance with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The subjects conveyed by the trust-disposition of the 12th of April are, in the first place, the lands of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and others; and, in the second place, the lands of Easterhouse and others. With regard to the first parcel of lands, the truster had acquired them from his father by a disposition made on the 2d December 1861, under which the father reserved his own liferent use and possession of these lands. The other parcel of lands—Easterhouse and others—were conveyed by the same disposition, but without any reservation of the father's liferent. The truster conveys both these subjects to certain gentlemen as trustees; and he reserves, with reference to the first parcel of lands, the liferent use and possession of his father, the said David Souter Robertson, as reserved in the disposition of the 2d of December; and with regard to the other parcel of lands, he disposes them to his father in liferent, "for his liferent use and enjoyment, and subject to his uncontrolled management during all the days of his life, and to the said trustees in trust as aforesaid, and to their foresaids in fee, heritably and irredeemably." He then further specially reserves from the above-written conveyance of both parcels of lands his own "liferent use, possession, and enjoyment of the said lands and others, and the uncontrolled management thereof during all the days of my life from and after the death of my said father; and reserving also full power to me, either in contemplation of or after my marriage, to burden and affect the said several lands and others with an annuity or jointure in favour of any wife I may marry, not exceeding £100 per annum, to be made payable" at certain terms. And it is "expressly provided that, subject to the reserved liferent rights in favour of my said father and me, and my reserved right to burden and affect the said lands with an annuity or jointure as aforesaid, these presents are granted, and shall be accepted by the trustees acting in the trust hereby created, in trust, to the intent and purpose that they may and shall, immediately upon the death of my said father and me, enter upon the possession and management of the said lands and others above conveyed, and hold the same as a trust-estate, and apply the same and the proceeds thereof for the uses and purposes following." Now, before coming to a consideration of the uses and purposes of the trust, it is important to note what is the effect of the deed up to this point. The father being the original owner of the lands of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and others, is liferenter by reservation of these lands, and he is liferenter by constitution of the other lands of Easterhouse and others, in virtue of the conveyance in liferent given to him by this deed. After the death of the father the liferent use and possession of both parcels of land devolves upon the son, the truster, and there is not only a full liferent use, possession, and enjoyment of the lands reserved, but there is also a reservation of the uncontrolled management thereof during all the days of the life of the truster after the death of his father; and it is only after the death of both these liferenters that this trust is to come into operation, for it is expressly provided in the passage that I last quoted that the disposition is granted and is to be accepted in trust to this intent, that the trustees are to enter into possession of the lands and hold them as a trust-estate only after the death of both the father and the truster. Now, for what purpose is this trust-estate to be taken possession of and administered by these trustees after the death of the truster? There is provision in the first and second purposes for payment of certain expenses; and then, "Thirdly, in the event of my dying survived by issue of my body, the said trustees shall hold the said lands and others, and shall apply the free balance or surplus of the annual income of the trust-estate [after certain deductions] "for the maintenance, education, and advancement of my eldest or only son, or failing my having a son, or in the event of the decease of all my sons previous to the period hereinafter prescribed for conveying the said trust-estate, then for the maintenance and education of my eldest or only daughter," the trustees having a full discretion as to how to administer for his or her benefit; and, "Fourthly, upon my eldest or only son attaining the age of twenty-one years, or, failing sons, upon my eldest or only daughter attaining that age or being married, whichever event shall first happen, my trustees shall convey and make over the trust-estate as then held by them, and subject to any debts or encumbrances which may affect the same, to such eldest or only son or eldest or only daughter, as the case may be, and to his or her heirs or assignees whomsoever." Then, failing the truster having children, it is provided, in the fifth place, that the estate shall devolve upon his younger brother and his family under certain provisions which it is needless to enter upon in detail, because they are not dissimilar to those that are provided with regard to his own family. And then, in the sixth place, in the event of both the brothers—both the truster and his younger brother—dying childless, or the children predeceasing the time of conveyance, "the trustees shall make over the said trust-estate, so held by them at the time, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of my said father."

These seem to me to be the material parts of the deed, and with regard to its general character and purpose there is really no room for dispute. It is a voluntary deed, and it is a gratuitous deed; and except in so far as it provides a liferent to the truster's father and to the truster himself, the purposes of the deed are purely and entirely testamentary. Everything that follows the decease of the truster and his father is a regulation of the truster's succession. I think it is impossible to dispute that. But, then, during the truster's lifetime the trust does not come into operation at all. He remains in possession of his estate with the full liferent enjoyment of the estate, and with uncontrolled power of management and administration. In short, the description of the truster's position, as we find it upon the face of this deed, is very like in all practical effects to that of an heir of entail in possession with the full beneficial enjoyment of the estate and the uncontrolled management of the estate. The result of all this seems to me to be, that until the death of the truster this trust-deed is dormant in regard to the fee of the estate. It cannot come into operation till then. Indeed, it is said, in express words, that it is only upon that occurrence that the trustees are to take and hold the estate as a trust-estate for purposes to be then carried into effect. Now, what are the purposes? 7.

vide the estate to the truster's eldest son ; failing his having a son, to his best daughter ; and failing that, then to provide the estate to certain other beneficiaries, being his younger brother and his children ; and failing all that, the estate is to revert and belong to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the truster's father, from whom both parcels of land originally came by disposition of a gratuitous character also in favour of the truster. The deed, therefore, it appears to me, so far as it is a trust-deed at all, and after the trust comes into operation, is simply a voluntary gratuitous testamentary deed, with a full reservation of the whole lifeerent enjoyment of the estate to the truster and uncontrolled powers of management.

Now, upon the authorities, I am of opinion that that is not a deed which is effectual against creditors. It would be quite idle to go over all the cases which bear upon this subject, and still more all the cases that have been cited to us, whether they bear upon the question or not. I content myself by saying that I think the result of all the authorities clearly is that such a deed as I have described this to be cannot be effectual against creditors.

That being so, the second question arises—Whether this deed, although not effectual in itself, has been made effectual against creditors by the way in which it is referred to and dealt with in the truster's marriage-contract ? Now, I do not doubt that such a deed as this might be dealt with in a marriage-contract in such a way as to incorporate the deed with the contract, and make it part of the stipulations of the onerous contract that the provisions of the prior deed should receive effect ; and if that were so, it is not necessary to dispute that the deed might thereby be rendered effectual against creditors, although not so in its original constitution. But has this been done in the marriage-contract ? That is the important question.

Now, the marriage-contract provides an annuity of £300 a-year in favour of the truster's wife, then his promised spouse ; and in part security of the personal obligation which he undertakes for the payment of this £300 annuity he exercises the power conferred upon him by the trust-disposition, of settling an annuity of £100 per annum upon his wife, and making that a burden upon the lands conveyed by the trust-deed. There is a further security granted for the lady's annuity which does not enter into the question we are now considering—a personal security granted by the truster's father. But this is the first reference in the marriage-contract to the trust-deed, and it amounts to no more than this, that the truster exercises the power reserved to him in the trust-deed of settling an annuity of £100 a-year upon his wife, and securing it upon the lands conveyed by the trust-deed. Then, further on, the truster, in contemplation of the marriage, “ binds and obliges himself and his foressaids to make payment to the child or children to be procreated of the marriage hereby contracted, who shall be alive at his death, other than the child who shall succeed to the said estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, under the directions with reference to the destination of these estates contained in the said trust-disposition thereof in favour of George Auldjo Jamieson and others, as trustees foressaid, and to the issue then alive of any such child or children who shall not succeed as aforesaid who shall have previously died leaving issue, of the sum of £5000 sterling, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the said Stewart Souter Robertson, with a fifth part more of penalty,” and so forth. And then, further, the truster, without prejudice to the personal obligations undertaken by him, assigns to certain trustees his general estate, and that in security for payment of this sum of £5000 to the children of the marriage other than the child who shall succeed to the estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse under the trust-disposition; and a clause follows declaring that the assignation is expressly restricted to the £5000, and that his general estate is not further bound, and that the assignation shall receive no further effect. Then, it is provided that in the event of the lady predeceasing her husband, and there being no child or children of the marriage, the trustees shall in that case make over and reconvey the whole trust funds and estate then in their hands to the said Stewart Souter Robertson, or shall hold the same for his behoof and at his disposal as he shall choose, and in the event of the lady surviving him, and there being no younger children other than the child or issue of the child entitled to succeed to the estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, the trustees are to pay over the same to such child or issue at such terms and on such conditions as the said Stewart Souter Robertson shall point out by any writing under his hand. And then follow the provisions on the part of the lady, which do not, so far as I can see, affect the question we are now considering at all.

Now, then, what is the nature and effect of the references in this marriage contract on the trust-disposition? In the first place, the truster exercises the power reserved to him by that trust-disposition of settling an annuity of £100 a-year on his wife, secured on the lands conveyed by the trust-disposition, and the only other reference to the deed is this, that the provisions of £5000 made by the husband in the marriage-contract, and in consideration of the marriage, which is to follow, are made in favour of the children of the marriage who do not succeed to the lands conveyed by the trust-disposition. If nobody succeeds to the lands conveyed by the trust-disposition then that reference to the trust-disposition will really have no effect at all, and the children will all succeed equally to the £5000, or in such proportions as may be appointed under a power reserved. But if the eldest son succeeds under the trust-disposition, then the £5000 will go entirely to the younger children, excluding the eldest. But there is no provision in this marriage-contract that the lands shall descend to the eldest or any other son. In short, the provisions of the trust-deed are not made stipulations or conditions of this marriage-contract; and if the provisions of the trust-deed are not made stipulations or conditions of this marriage-contract, then I do not see how the trust-deed can receive any greater support or efficacy from the reference to it in the marriage-contract than it had in its own original conception. It is referred to as matter of fact that the lands of Tarbrax and Easterhouse are settled upon the eldest son of the truster, and, failing him, upon certain other parties. That is assumed as a matter of fact, but it is not made matter of contract. The fact that the trust-deed exists is no doubt a fact assumed; and just because that provision has been made in the trust-deed that certain provisions are made in the marriage-contract that if the trust-deed receive effect, and the lands thereby conveyed descend to the eldest son, then the eldest son is not to participate in the £5000. But that is all; and as it is not made matter of contract that the disposition of the fee in the trust-disposition shall receive effect, it appears to me that the trust-disposition derives no strength whatever from the reference in the marriage-contract.

I am therefore of opinion upon the whole matter that this trust-deed, whether taken by itself or taken in connection with the marriage-contract, is not good against creditors. Whether it is a revocable deed in the event of the truster remaining solvent is a totally different question, upon which I give no opinion.

purely gratuitous testamentary deed may be made irrevocable, and yet may be bad against creditors. The truster may be personally bound, but for all that the estate may not be defended against the diligence of creditors. That is a distinction which runs through all the authorities, and a distinction, I think, perfectly sound on legal principle; but whether the deed in the present case is or is not a revocable deed I do not presume, nor do I think it necessary, to enquire, because I am quite clear upon the other point, which is the only point of any importance here in this case with the trustee in the truster's sequestration, that it is not good to exclude the diligence of creditors. I am therefore adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Forrest v.
Robertson's
Trustees.

LORD DEAS.—On 2d December 1861 Mr David Souter Robertson (whom I shall call Souter Robertson the first) conveyed one of several landed estates belonging to him to his eldest son, Stewart Souter Robertson (whom I shall call Souter Robertson the second), under reservation of his own "liferent use and possession thereof, and of the houses and others erected thereon, during all the days" of his lifetime. This deed was completed by registration, in lieu of infestment, in the Register of Sasines on 10th December 1861.

On 12th April 1862 Souter Robertson the second disposed the fee of the same estate, with his "whole right, title, and interest therein," under the two reservations after-mentioned, to trustees (who are defenders in this action), heritably and irredeemably, for the purpose, in the event (which has happened), of his being survived by issue of his body, of applying (under deduction of expenses and other outlays) such portion of the free income "as may be necessary for the maintenance, education, and advancement of my eldest or only son, or failing my having a son, or in the event of the decease of all my sons previous to the period hereinafter prescribed for conveying the said trust-estate, then for the maintenance and education of my eldest or only daughter," the trustees having full discretion as to the proportion to be so applied, and the surplus, if any, to "be applied in payment of any debt which might then affect the trust-estate, or be added to and form part of the capital of the trust-estate under the management of the trustees." The deed further provided—"Fourthly, Upon my eldest son attaining the age of twenty-one years, or, failing sons, upon my eldest or only daughter attaining that age or being married, whichever event shall first happen, my trustees shall convey and make over the trust-estate as then held by them, and subject to any debts or incumbrances which may affect the same, to such eldest or only son, or eldest or only daughter, as the case may be, and to his or her heirs or assignees whomsoever." The fifth and sixth purposes provided for the event of the truster dying without issue, or of all his issue predeceasing the period at which the trust-estate was to be made over to them, and need not be here narrated. Nor need any notice be taken of a liferent of the lands of Easterhouse conveyed back to the truster's father, Souter Robertson the first, which is not challenged in this action, any more than the validity of the original conveyance by Souter Robertson the first to his son Souter Robertson the second.

The first of the two reservations which I have mentioned was thus expressed—"Reserving always, as I do hereby specially reserve, from the above-written conveyance of the said several lands and others, in favour of the said trustees, my liferent use, possession, and enjoyment of the said lands and others, and the

No. 8. uncontrolled management thereof during all the days of my life from and after the death of my said father."

The second of the two reservations was in these terms—"Reserving also full power to me, either in contemplation of or after my marriage, to burden and affect the said several lands and others with an annuity or jointure in favour of any wife I may marry, not exceeding £100 per annum, to be made payable, the said annuity or jointure, to my wife should she survive my said father and me out of the said lands and others, or any part thereof, at two terms in the year Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, commencing the first payment of the said annuity at the first of these terms which shall happen after the death of my said father and me, for the subsequent half year, and so forth half-yearly thereafter during the life of my said wife after the death of my said father and me, and which power of granting such annuity or jointure hereby reserved by me may be exercised by my granting a bond of annuity to be contained in a contract of marriage, or by a separate bond to be executed by me in contemplation of or subsequent to my marriage."

The deed further bore—"Also I give full power to my trustees to make and complete all proper titles in their persons to the lands and others hereby conveyed, with the fullest powers of administration and management of the trust-estate under their charge."

These full powers of administration and management could, of course, only commence on the cessation of the powers of administration and management reserved to the father and son, Souter Robertson the first and Souter Robertson the second, as successive liferenters. But the right conferred to the fee of the estate was immediate and absolute, and the power to complete titles, which was at any rate incidental to and implied in the dispositive clause, was obviously intended to be also immediate. Accordingly, the title of the trustees and of Souter Robertson the first, "for their respective rights of fee and liferent as aforesaid," was forthwith completed by notarial instrument (in lieu of infeftment), duly recorded on 17th April 1862.

That the trust-deed was duly delivered to and forthwith acted on by the trustees is amply proved by the documents in process.

The record of sasines bears, under date 17th April 1862, that there was presented to the notary-public, on behalf of the trustees appointed by the trust disposition of the 12th of that month, and on behalf of the liferenters for their respective interests, the notarial instrument which is engrossed in the new General Register of Sasines, and which is equivalent to infeftment in the old form as of the first-mentioned date. Four years afterwards the trustees became parties to a lease of the minerals in the lands, dated in March and April 1866. Afterwards they became parties to assignments of that lease, executed in December 1870 and January 1871. And in the interval, viz., in June 1866, they, in their avowed and express character of "heritable proprietors of the lands" disposed, with consent of the liferenters, a portion of the lands, "heritable and irredeemably," to the Caledonian Railway Company by deed, which was recorded in the Register of Sasines on 19th July 1867.

I pause here to observe that, whatever may be said against the efficacy of the deed in a question with the granter's creditors, it is unquestionably in its terms an absolute and irrevocable conveyance of the fee of the estate. Upon the face of the deed and of the public records Souter Robertson the second stands feudally divested of, and the trustees feudally invested in, the fee of that estate.

A power is reserved to the truster to affect the estate with an eventual annuity No. 8.
to his wife of £100 per annum, but that power only suggests the observation that by the terms of the deed the truster reserved and retained no other power Oct. 27, 1876.
over the fee of the estate. The same remark applies to the reservation of his Forrester v.
eventual liferent, which liferent is in no respect amplified by calling it a "life- Robertson's ent use, possession, and enjoyment." Every liferenter has "the use, possession, Trustees.

and enjoyment" of the estate for the time being. Nor is the nature of the right changed by adding "and the uncontrolled management thereof during all the days of my life from and after the death of my said father." Some liferents are more ample than others, with respect, for instance, to mines and minerals, the granting of leases, &c. How far the words "uncontrolled management" may explain or amplify the nature of this liferent it is unnecessary to inquire, because it is quite obvious that there remains, in any view, a right of fee in the trustees for behoof of the truster's eldest son (whom I shall call Souter Robertson the third), which, by the terms of the deed and of the existing investiture, cannot be disposed of or affected by Souter Robertson the second, except in security of the £100 annuity; and the existence of this fee, whatever limitations may have been placed on its value, is sufficient to raise the present competition.

Now, I am not disposed to say that all this would be sufficient to exclude the grantor's creditors if the trust-deed were gratuitous. But if the trust-deed be an antenuptial marriage deed it is then undoubtedly an onerous deed, and that substantially resolves the present question into this—Is the trust-deed to be regarded as an antenuptial marriage deed or not?

I am prepared to answer that question in the affirmative.

To constitute an antenuptial marriage deed or marriage settlement it is not essential that the deed should be in its form a mutual deed. A unilateral deed followed by marriage may be quite enough. In the recent cases of *Smith Cuninghame's Trustees*¹ and of Mercer v. Anstruther's Trustees,² amidst all the differences of opinion that arose both here and in the House of Lords on various points, nobody doubted that Mr Anstruther's unilateral trust-deed, followed by marriage, constituted a valid marriage settlement, securing to his widow all the provisions contained in it, so far as the funds he thereby dealt with were held to have been his own or at his disposal. Still less is it necessary that the marriage provisions should be all contained in one deed, or that each deed should bear expressly to import into it the contents of the other deed with the formality, which would be necessary to exclude the objection to an entail, that it had been attempted to be made by reference. It is quite enough that the marriage deed, although unilateral, was made by the one party in contemplation of the marriage which followed, and relied on by the other party.

In the present case there was not only the unilateral deed, delivered to trustees for behoof of the future heir of the marriage, but there was the bilateral marriage-contract, in which the unilateral deed is narrated and referred to in terms which, I think, make it impossible to say that the wife and her friends were not entitled to rely upon it as having secured to the heir of the marriage the only provision which the husband made for that heir in contemplation of the marriage. Marriage settlements are, of all deeds, to be construed according to good faith, and not to be defeated by defective expression or want of technicalities. It is not in the mouth of the husband, or of any one claiming in right of the husband, to say that, although the terms of the deed were such as might naturally lead the wife and her friends to believe that the heir of the intended marriage had been provided for, this belief must be held to have been delusive wherever the deed at all admits of being construed otherwise.

This contract of marriage provides an annuity or jointure of £300 to the wife in the event of her survivance, restrictable to £150 in the event of her entering into a second marriage; and in security so far of this personal obligation, and without prejudice thereto, "the said Stewart Souter Robertson, in virtue of a power to that effect reserved to him in a trust-disposition dated 12th April 1862, of the estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, in favour of George Auldjo Jamieson, accountant in Edinburgh, and other trustees, for the purposes therein specified, hereby provides and disposes to the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton in liferent during all the days of her lifetime after the death of the said father and him, in case she shall survive them," a free yearly annuity of £100 furth of the lands of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and others, and the lands of Easterhouse and others, which are all thereby disposed to her in security.

Here there is a distinct and express recognition of the trust-deed as a valid and completed deed, by which the lands stood disposed to the trustees "for the purposes therein specified," and these purposes are, I think, referred to as purposes which the granter had no power to interfere with, except in virtue of and to the extent of heritably securing to his future wife a certain eventual annuity.

But if it could have been doubted that this reference to the trust-deed was sufficient to call attention to it as a deed executed in contemplation of the marriage, the doubt would, I think, be entirely removed by the exception which is made in it of the future heir of the marriage from all interest in the provision made by the contract for the other children of the marriage. The contract binds the intended husband "to make payment to the child or children to be procreated of the marriage hereby contracted, who shall be alive at his death other than the child who shall succeed to the said estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse, under the directions with reference to the destination of these estates contained in the said trust-disposition thereof in favour of George Auldjo Jamieson and others, as trustees foresaid, and to the issue then alive of any such child or children who shall not succeed as aforesaid who shall have previously died leaving issue, of the sum of £5000 sterling, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the said Stewart Souter Robertson," &c.

Could it reasonably be supposed to occur to the other contracting party or parties that this meant that the heir of the marriage was not to be provided for by the husband at all? On the contrary, I cannot look upon this as anything short of a representation that the estates of Lawhead, Tarbrax, and Easterhouse had been already secured to the heir of the marriage by a deed executed in contemplation of the marriage.

It is true that the trust-deed does not mention the particular marriage. But the proximity of dates is of itself sufficient to shew, beyond all reasonable doubt, that the marriage in view was the marriage which afterwards took place on 29th April 1862. The trust-deed was executed on 12th April, probably in order that the conveyance contained in it might be completed by recording the notarial instrument before the contract should either be presented for signature or the marriage celebrated. The notarial instrument was recorded on the 17th April—

The marriage-contract was executed on the 26th—and the marriage was celebrated on the 29th, all of the same month and year. To suppose that the marriage contemplated by the trust-deed was any other than the marriage contemplated by the contract, dated only a fortnight afterwards, would be somewhat extravagant. The trust-deed was, in my opinion, just as much an antenuptial marriage deed as if it had been embodied in or expressly adopted by the marriage-contract. The two deeds formed together the antenuptial marriage settlement, and if this were to be held questionable on the face of the deeds—which I think it is not—I could have no doubt at all of the relevancy of the averments contained in the defenders' second statement in the record, nor of the competency of proving these averments either by writing or by the real evidence of facts and circumstances.

These averments are in substance—1st, That the engagement to marry, which resulted in the marriage, was made in July 1861; 2d, That the conveyance by Souter Robertson the first to his son Souter Robertson the second, in December 1861, was granted with the view of enabling the latter to settle the lands on entering into that particular marriage; 3d, That the trust-deed was executed in contemplation of, and by way of provision for, that same marriage; 4th, That the marriage took place on the faith of that deed as forming part of the marriage settlement.

Assuming it to be proved or admitted that the engagement to marry preceded the execution of the trust-deed, I should be disposed to hold that the third and fourth of the above heads were matter of presumption requiring no proof. The second head (namely, the object of the conveyance by Souter Robertson the first) if it stood alone, might be of doubtful relevancy; but it is much the least material of the four. Of the relevancy and competency of proving all the other three heads, either by writing or by the real evidence of facts and circumstances, I have no doubt at all. There has been no renunciation of probation on either side, and I do not mean to suggest that the pursuers are precluded from even yet joining issue upon the above averments if they choose to do so. But the case has been decided by the Lord Ordinary, and pleaded to us by the pursuers, upon the footing that the facts averred by the defenders are irrelevant, and so long as that is the shape of the case the truth of the defenders' averments, so far as relevant, must be assumed.

Taking the case so, it does not appear to me to matter whether there have been several deeds or only one deed executed before marriage. If executed with a view to that particular marriage, and marriage has followed, the deed or deeds must be regarded as in the highest sense onerous, and the obligations contained in them fulfilled accordingly.

In the present case, besides the onerous consideration of the marriage itself, there were important considerations given by the lady and her friends in return for the provisions made for her and her issue, among which last provisions I think it impossible to suppose that they did not reckon the fee of the estate provided to the heir of the marriage. The marriage-contract bears, inter alia, that Miss Eliza Hamilton, sister of the bride, "in terms of an arrangement to the effect after specified, undertaken by her in the treaty for the said intended marriage, hereby binds and obliges herself, but only in the event of her succeeding to the entailed estates of Fairholm and others, in the counties of Lanark and Edinburgh, of which she is at present the presumptive heiress of entail, to make payment to the said Ann Scrivenor Hamilton, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, of the sum of £2000 sterling, with interest from the date when the succession might open to her." And by the immediately following clause the bride herself conveyed to the trustees named in the deed the whole means and estates, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or to which she might acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage, including all sums to become due and payable under the said obligation undertaken by her sister Eliza Hamilton (excepting only her paraphernalia and sums she might acquire by bequest, gift, or otherwise, under the amount of £100), all to be held in trust for her liferent use, exclusive of the jus mariti, and for the liferent of her promised husband, if he survived her, and for the issue of the marriage in default of issue. The eventual liferent of Miss Eliza Hamilton's £2000, and the eventual liferent of the bride's whole means and estates, thus stand irrevocably conveyed to Souter Robertson the second, and are of course attachable by his creditors. The treaty for the intended marriage, to which Miss Eliza Hamilton is said to have been a party, is obviously spoken of as a treaty which had preceded the execution of the marriage-contract. Miss Eliza Hamilton, so far as we see, had no interest to bind herself as she did, except to aid her sister in obtaining under that treaty better terms for herself and her issue than she might otherwise have got; and if these terms are not to be fairly fulfilled, the considerations in respect of which the wife disposed of her whole means and estate by the contract, and prevailed on her sister to dispose of a portion of her means and estate, will not have been made good to either of the two.

The question is not one, as the Lord Ordinary seems to put it, between Souter Robertson the second on the one hand, and his creditors on the other; but between Souter Robertson the third, the heir of the marriage, on the one hand, and Souter Robertson the second and those in his right, on the other.

The case has no analogy whatever to a gratuitous entail, to which it is likened by the Lord Ordinary, nor to a gratuitous deed of any kind, by which, as his Lordship rightly observes, it would be against the policy of the law to allow a man to put his estate beyond the reach of his creditors without putting it beyond his own reach. But it is not against the policy of the law to allow a man to put the fee of his estate beyond the reach both of himself and his creditors by an antenuptial marriage deed, completed by sasine (or its equivalent) in the public records, as the trust-deed was here; and if he reserves his own liferent, as is usually done in marriage-contracts or other antenuptial deeds, the effect of that simply is, that the creditors can attach the liferent which is his, but that will not enable them to attach the fee, which is not his.

The Lord Ordinary arrives at his result by putting and answering three questions. The first is, Whether the fee was at once put beyond the reach of the creditors by the trust-deed? He answers this in the negative, and then asks, second, Whether, although not originally good, the deed became good for that purpose (that is, for the exclusion of creditors) by the reference made to it in the marriage-contract? Having answered this also in the negative, his Lordship asks, third, Whether, although not good till then, it became good on the birth of a son of the marriage? and to this question also he gives a negative answer.

Now, with the greatest possible deference to his Lordship, this mode of reasoning is altogether fallacious. It ignores the only real question in the case, namely, Whether the trust-deed and the marriage-contract are, each of them, part and portion of what constituted the marriage settlement? In my opinion they are so, just as much as if they had been embodied in one continuous paper, with one testing-clause. Neither the trust-deed nor the marriage-contract would have been effectual for any purpose if marriage had not followed. But the effect of the trust-deed, the marriage-contract, and the marriage itself, are not to be separately met and overcome after the fashion of the Horatii and Curatii. They must all be taken together, and the question then put, What is their combined force and effect?

If they were to be separately considered at all, it would be a more apt illustration to ask whether there can be any doubt that the trust-deed would have taken effect as an antenuptial marriage deed if no other deed had been executed prior to the marriage? And if it would have done so, can the marriage-contract be regarded as intended to prevent the trust-deed from operating as it otherwise would have done? I am not able to take that view of the meaning of the contract. There is no inconsistency between the contract and the trust-deed. Separate trusts are created by the two deeds—the one for behoof of the life-tenants of the heritable estate and the heir, and the other for behoof of the widow and younger children. But there is nothing inconsistent or even remarkable in that. The provisions of the trust-deed are to no extent superseded by the provisions of the contract. The younger children are not at all provided for by the trust-deed, and the heir is not at all provided for by the contract. The two deeds are not only capable of standing together, but the usual purposes of a marriage settlement, where there are landed estates and personal funds to settle, are not accomplished unless the two deeds do stand together. The contract neither supersedes nor recalls anything in the trust-deed, either directly or by implication. On the contrary, the contract narrates and refers to the trust-deed as a good and subsisting deed, and on that assumption provides for the issue of the marriage in so far, and in so far only, as the issue had not been already provided for.

As regards the third question put and answered in the negative by the Lord Ordinary—Whether, if not previously good, the trust-deed became good by the birth of a son of the marriage?—it is really a mere question of words. There is a sense in which the trust-deed became effectual only by the birth of an heir of the marriage; for if there had been no heir of the marriage, male or female, there would have been no creditor in the obligation, whether contained in the trust-deed or in the marriage-contract, it being trite law that in marriage settlements there is no onerosity as to such provisions beyond the issue of the marriage. But that does not prevent the trust-deed from being a good deed ab initio, to provide for the eventuality of there being an heir of the marriage, and this was done just as effectually by the conveyance of the fee of the estate to the trustees for behoof of the expectant heir as if there had been a direct conveyance in favour of an existing beneficiary.

Upon the assumption that the trust-deed is to be regarded as an antenuptial marriage deed, the whole law applicable to it is to be found in the important and authoritative case of Herries, Farquhar, & Co. v Brown, &c., 9th March 1838, 16 S. 948.

In that case the husband, Mr Macdonald, bound himself by the marriage-contract to pay to the children of the contemplated marriage, if more than one besides the heir on whom the estate of Clanranald was thereby entailed, £20,000, and if only one child besides the heir £10,000, payable at such times and in such proportions as he (Mr Macdonald) should appoint, and failing such appointment, then equally, within six months after his death, bearing interest in any event from the date of his death; and in security of this obligation he granted a precept of sasine, which was followed by infestment in favour of trustees named in the contract in the said lands of Clanranald and others therein described. The contract further contained a precept of sasine, on which infestment followed, for infesting Mr Macdonald himself and the heirs-male of the marriage, whom failing the other heirs therein mentioned, in the said lands and estate, under the fetters of a strict entail, subject always to the burden of the provisions to the younger children and a life annuity to his wife.

Thereafter Mr Macdonald contracted large debts, and his creditors brought a declarator and supplementary declarator to have it found that neither the provision to the younger children nor the entail in favour of the heir of the marriage could compete with, and, still less, could be preferable to the debts so contracted.

As regarded the provision to the younger children (five in number) Lord Fullerton, Ordinary, found that these children were onerous creditors of their father to the amount of that provision, and therefore that the trustees infest in security thereof were entitled to compete and interfere with the diligence of the creditors according to the right and preference legally conferred by such security.

After a hearing in presence before the whole Court this judgment was unanimously adhered to. In the present case the trustees for the heir of the marriage are infest as absolute fiars of the estate. In that case the trustees for the younger children were infest in security only of their provision of £20,000, and for which provision they were held preferable to the father's subsequent creditors. In that respect therefore the judgment is a fortiori in favour of the preference claimed by the trustees for the heir over the creditors (who are all subsequent creditors of the father in the present case).

It is unnecessary to follow out the other branch of the case of Herries, Farquhar, & Co., which was resumed before the First Division of the Court, and argued in cases between the creditors of the father and the heir-male of the marriage, further than to observe that, in respect of the obligation undertaken by the father in his marriage-contract to execute an entail of the Clanranald estate, subject to the burden of the provisions to the younger children, it was found that the subsequent creditors of the father were "not entitled to do any diligence against the said lands or the price thereof so as to affect the rights of the said heir or heirs therein," reserving to the creditors under their decree against the father "all competent diligence against him and his life-interest in the said estate, or any part of the same, or the price thereof"—a judgment in its terms very analogous to what, I should say, would be the appropriate judgment in the present case, varying it only so far because here the heir is entitled to the absolute fee, whereas there he had only a right to succeed after his father as heir of entail.

The judgment in the case of Herries, Farquhar, & Co. has ruled the law and practice of the country for now close upon forty years, and if your Lordships were to agree with me in thinking that the trust-deed in the present case was part and portion of the marriage settlements of Souter Robertson the second, I do not suppose you would hesitate in applying to the case the principles recognised in that judgment.

I have thought it right, however, thus briefly to refer to it not only because it contains the law of this case on the assumption of the trust-deed being an ante-nuptial marriage deed, but likewise because I think the elaborate opinions then delivered, by some of the ablest Judges of recent times, naturally suggest that such a deed as this trust-deed, executed in contemplation of marriage, ought not readily to be disconnected with the high onerosity of the marriage itself.

LORD MURE.—With reference to the first question which was raised for our consideration,—viz., Whether this trust-deed, taken by itself, is sufficient to protect the estate against the diligence of the granter's creditors?—I have not had much difficulty in coming to the conclusion which your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary have come to, namely, that it is not sufficient. In that conclusion, as regards the deed itself, I do not understand that, taken by itself, Lord Deas differs in opinion. Upon the view of the deed itself I think that it is a voluntary and gratuitous deed, and that it is substantially a mortis causa deed made with a view to regulate the succession of the parties to that particular estate. There is no doubt that under it the trustees seem not only to have taken infetment, as they were quite entitled to do, but to have been parties to certain leases and arrangements which took place under it. But looking to the terms of the trust-deed itself, by which the whole uncontrolled management is left to the two liferenters during their lives, and to the clause which your Lordship in the chair referred to, by which it is only after the death of the survivor of the liferenters that the trustees are to enter into the possession and management of the estate, I do not think it can be held that they have at this present moment the position of being trustees in the management and possession of that estate. I think, therefore, that, as the deed is substantially in its terms a mortis causa deed, it cannot be held to protect the estate against the diligence of the granter's creditors.

Upon the other part of the case, namely, the effect of the marriage-contract which is said to have been entered into a short time after the date of the deed, I confess that I have had more difficulty—I mean with reference to the decision in the case of Herries, Farquhar, & Co., which Lord Deas has referred to. And that raises the question, Whether this trust-deed of Mr Stewart Souter Robertson was so dealt with in his marriage-contract as to make it part and parcel of that antenuptial contract, in the sense that it made the obligations undertaken under that marriage-contract the consideration for the granting of the trust-deed? Now, no doubt the trust-deed is referred to in the contract—your Lordship has gone over the clauses, and I do not mean to repeat them,—but as I read that contract it is referred to simply with a view to enable the party to avail himself of the clause of reservation, by which he is entitled to settle an annuity upon his wife, and make that annuity a real burden upon the trust-estate. Having referred to it for that purpose, the marriage-contract proceeds to create a new trust,—a marriage-contract trust, separate and distinct altogether from the trust created by the original trust-deed. Different trustees are named; there is a conveyance to them of certain moveable estate to which Mr Souter Robertson was entitled under the marriage-contract between his father and his mother; and these trustees are made the trustees for carrying out the terms of that marriage-contract trust, and for dividing the property so put in trust amongst the children of the marriage. And then there is a provision,—“For which causes, and on the other part,” the sister of Mrs Souter Robertson settles a certain sum of money upon her, and conveys it to those marriage-contract trustees, with a view to division among the children of the marriage. That is substantially the nature of that trust. Now, I do not see that this counterpart by the wife and her sister is made in any degree dependent on the terms of the first trust-deed. It is granted in respect of the provision which Mr Souter Robertson settled upon his children—viz. the £5000 settled by the new trust-deed—and the provision by the relation of the lady is the counterpart for that, to make the provision of £2000 in favour of these children in the same way. Now, then, is that a case in which the trust-deed is made part and parcel of the marriage-contract in the sense in which the trust-deed in Herries, Farquhar, and Company was to be held? I have come to the conclusion, after careful perusal of the case of Herries, Farquhar, and Company, that it is not,—that what has been done here does not bring this case within the provisions of the rules laid down in Herries, Farquhar, and Company. I think the mere reference to the deed as an existing deed, or referring to the fact that that particular estate had been settled in a particular way, is not such a reference as we find in the marriage-contract in the case of Herries, Farquhar, and Company. I do not see that this estate was settled in consideration for anything done under the marriage-contract. Nor do I see it stated in the marriage-contract that anything was done under the contract in consideration of the existence of that trust-deed. In the case of Herries, Farquhar, and Company it was quite the contrary. There the trustee under the first trust-deed became a party to the marriage-contract expressly, and undertook to reconvey the estate held by him in trust for the purpose of paying off the debts to Clanranald and the other heirs of entail. And the ground on which the Court came to the conclusion with regard to this undertaking on the part of the trustee, and the consideration in respect of which that undertaking took place, was in respect of the peculiarly onerous terms of the marriage-contract itself. As I read the opinions of the Judges, the mere fact of the marriage having been entered into was not held to make the transaction of itself so onerous as some of the authorities might imply. But, in the opinion of Lord Mackenzie, on that second branch of the case, viz. whether the entail stood good, his Lordship distinctly alludes to the fact of its having proceeded on most onerous considerations. He says (p. 978),—"Macdonald subsequently entered into the marriage-contract, 1812, and the trustee, Brown, was made a party to it in the express character of trustee infest in the lands. On most onerous considerations various stipulations were undertaken by Macdonald, the trustee, and him, the trustee; and in particular a sum of £10,000 was paid by the father of Lady Caroline to the trustee for the purposes of the trust. In consideration of this Macdonald, with consent of the trustee, Brown, bound himself to execute a strict entail of the lands which should remain after satisfying the trust, 1811, in favour of himself and the heir-male of the marriage, now defender, and the other heirs there mentioned. It was expressly declared that the fetters of this entail should be laid on Macdonald himself as well as on the heirs of entail, and that it should be an irrevocable deed. The trustee, Brown, went along with this whole obligation as an express consenter, &c. This was an obligation which was clearly binding on the trustee, and which was undertaken for a full onerous consideration"—the full onerous consideration being the £10,000 that the marriage-contract bore was advanced by the lady's father.

Now, in the present case, we have no stipulation in the marriage-contract that this estate of Tarbrax shall go to the eldest son,—no provision that it is to be held by him. On the contrary, the original trust-deed, as I read the marriage-contract, is simply referred to with reference to the fact that an estate had been settled under which there was a power reserved to burden it with an annuity in favour of the widow of the truster, who was then entering into the marriage; but I can find nothing in the terms of that deed which entitles me to say that there was any such onerous consideration as that which occurred in the case of Hurries, Farquhar, and Company, and in respect of which onerous consideration alone it was that the Court, as I read that judgment, came to the conclusion that the estate was protected against the creditors. On that ground I concur with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary in holding that neither the marriage-contract, nor anything that was done at the time of the marriage, can be held to have placed this estate in the position of being protected against the creditors.

M'Donald v. M'Donald.

Appropriate and Reprobate—Implied Condition—Entail—Entailer's Debts.—By an antenuptial contract of marriage the wife's fortune was conveyed to trustees, with directions, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to pay over the trust-funds to the children of the marriage, in such proportions, and at such time, and under such conditions, as the spouses should by joint deed appoint. A portion of the wife's funds, amounting to £25,000, was during the subsistence of the marriage advanced by the marriage-contract trustees on heritable bond over two estates (adjoining the husband's patrimonial estate) which had been purchased by him. The parents, on the narrative that it was their wish to entail those estates on the children of the marriage and their heirs, along with the husband's patrimonial estate, which was settled by the marriage-contract upon the eldest son, subject to the husband's power of making a strict entail, and upon the further narrative that the husband had agreed to execute an entail of the whole estates, and had executed the same, proceeded, in the exercise of their power of division, to provide that the above-mentioned sum of £25,000, secured over the husband's estates, should be "settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," the said sum being "the share of the trust-funds which we do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate, it being our desire and appointment that the said trustees under our marriage-contract . . . should, immediately on the death of the survivor of us, renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estates" of the same. The relative deed of entail by the husband, which was declared to be onerous and irrevocable, was executed on the same day as the deed of division, and each deed bore to be granted in consideration of the other. Infestment was taken upon the deed of entail in favour of the spouses as liferenters and of the eldest son as fiar.

After the death of his parents, the eldest son claimed that the above-mentioned sum of £25,000 should be paid over absolutely to him, and this he was found entitled to by a judgment of the House of Lords.

In a subsequent action brought against the eldest son by his brother (who was the next heir-substitute in existence under the deed of entail), for declarator that the eldest son was bound to make his election between the £25,000 and the two entailed estates, subject to the condition that they should be disencumbered of the £25,000, and that the defender had elected to take the £25,000, and was bound to denude of these estates, held that the eldest son was not put to his election, but that although he had taken the money absolutely, and kept it up as a debt against the entailed lands, he was also entitled to remain in possession of these lands.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk), that, although no case of election was raised in regard to the £25,000, the expressed intention of the granter of the entail that his eldest son should pay off the debt of £25,000 affecting the lands created an implied condition of the entail which he was bound to implement. (Vide M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees, June 17, 1875, ante, vol. ii. H. L. p. 125).

“In this action the pursuer, John Alan M'Donald, calls upon the defender, Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, his elder brother, and heir of entail now in possession of the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, in Perthshire, to denude of said estates in favour of him (the pursuer), in respect that he was bound to elect between these estates and a provision of £25,000, appointed to him by his father and mother, the late Sir John and Lady M'Donald, under a deed of appointment and division executed unico contextu with the deed of entail, and that he has elected to take the money.* The circumstances in which the action has been raised are as follows:—

“In 1826 Sir John M'Donald, then Lieutenant-Colonel M'Donald of Dalchosnie, was married to the now deceased Adriana M'Inroy (afterwards Lady M'Donald), daughter of the deceased James M'Inroy of Lude. By antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between them, dated 24th September 1826, Sir John M'Donald, in contemplation of the marriage, disposed to himself and Lady M'Donald, in conjunct fee and liferent, but for her liferent use allenary in case she should survive him, and to the heirs-male of the marriage, whom failing, the heirs-male of Sir John's body in any subsequent marriage, whom failing, certain other heirs thereunto specified, All and Whole his estate of Dalchosnie, in the county of Perth, reserving, nevertheless, full power to Sir John to execute a strict entail of the whole or any part of the said estate, providing only that he should in such entail first call to the succession the series of heirs specified in the contract, in the order therein narrated, and thereafter such other heirs as he should think proper, and should noways defeat or injure Lady M'Donald's liferent right. On the other hand, Lady M'Donald conveyed the whole share and interest of every kind and description in the estate of her father, the said deceased James M'Inroy, to certain trustees, who were to hold the same in trust for the conjunct liferent right and use allenary of the spouses, and after the death of the spouses to pay over or assign the whole to the child or children to be procreated of the marriage, in such proportions, and at such time, and under such conditions as Sir John and Lady M'Donald should, by any joint deed, or as Lady M'Donald, if the survivor, should, by any deed or writing signed by her, direct or appoint; and failing any such direction or appointment, to hold the same after the death of the survivor of the spouses for behoof of the children of the marriage, in certain shares and proportions specified in the contract. The shares were to be payable to the sons at the age of twenty-five, and to the daughters at that age or on marriage, but were not, in any case, to become vested interests until the death of the survivor of the spouses.

“It will thus be seen that, in virtue of the contract, the eldest son of the marriage and his male descendants had, subject to his mother's liferent, a right of succession to the estate of Dalchosnie which Sir John M'Donald could not gratuitously defeat, but which he might limit by the etters of a strict entail. On the other hand, an indefeasible right to the whole of Lady M'Donald's fortune was conferred upon the whole children of the marriage as a class, including the eldest son, the amount to be received by each being subject to appointment by the spouses, and the vesting being postponed till the death of the survivor of the spouses.

* There was also an alternative conclusion for damages sustained by the pursuer in respect of the defender making the said election and reprobating the deed of division and deed of entail.

"Several children were born of the marriage, viz. four sons and three daughters. The defender, Colonel Alastair M'Innes M'Donald, is the eldest son, and the pursuer, John Alan M'Donald, is the second surviving son; the other two sons predeceased their parents. The three daughters are all alive. Sir John M'Donald died on 24th June 1866, and Lady M'Donald on 7th November 1872.

"Lady M'Donald's fortune, derived from her father's estate, amounted to upwards of £50,000, which was received by the marriage-contract trustees for the purposes of the trust. A few years after the marriage Sir John M'Donald purchased two estates, named Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, adjoining Dalchosnie, at the price of £28,000, which, by expenditure on improvements, was increased to £30,000, for the purpose of paying which price he borrowed from the M'Innes trustees a portion of Lady M'Donald's fortune, amounting to £25,000, for which he gave them security in the form of a bond and disposition in security over the two estates so purchased. These securities were afterwards transferred to the marriage-contract trustees. The declared intention of Sir John in making the purchase was that these two estates, along with the family estate of Dalchosnie, should be permanently united as a family estate, and should descend, in the first instance, to the heirs-male of the marriage. This appears from the narrative of the deed of entail of the three estates, executed by Sir John M'Donald, on 18th July 1837, which begins by narrating the marriage-contract and the trust-conveyance therein of Lady M'Donald's fortune, and then proceeds as follows:—'And further, considering that the object of the said trust is to secure the liferent of the said funds to the said Adriana M'Innes or M'Donald during her life, in the event of her having children, and the succession to the fee of the same to the children, if any, of the said marriage, in such shares and in such manner as we, the said spouses, or the said Adriana M'Donald, if the survivor, may direct, and that the objects of the said trust may be fully accomplished by the purchase of lands to be entailed on the eldest son of the said marriage, and such provisions secured to the other children as I, the said John M'Donald, and the said Adriana M'Donald, may now or afterwards direct, and further, considering that I, the said John M'Donald, soon after the marriage, purchased the two estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, adjoining to Dalchosnie, and it being the desire of me, the said John M'Donald, and of the said Adriana M'Innes or M'Donald, to settle definitely, onerously, irrevocably, and mutually the said estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, belonging to me, the said John M'Donald, on ourselves and our family, and, failing our heirs-male, so far to alter the destination in the marriage-contract, with regard to Dalchosnie, as to settle it with the other lands, giving heirs-female of the present marriage a preference and priority over heirs-male of any subsequent marriage, and having, of even date herewith, executed a deed of appointment and division of the whole estate belonging to the said Adriana M'Innes or M'Donald, which deed and appointments therein contained are held as implement on her part of the mutual agreement between us for the settlement of our respective estates, Therefore, in implement on my part of the foresaid mutual agreement, I, the said John M'Donald, bind and oblige myself, my heirs and successors whomsoever, to entail and secure my whole lands and others particularly underwritten in lutely; and having elected to take and having taken the £25,000 absolutely, he is not entitled to any beneficial interest in these estates. (4) According to the intention of Sir John M'Donald, as declared in his settlements, it was a condition of the defender taking benefit thereby that he should not so act as to prevent Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch being disburdened of the debt for £25,000, and having acted otherwise, the defender has thereby forfeited all right to these estates, at least he is bound to make compensation to the pursuer for the loss and damage he has sustained by and through the election made by the defender. (5) The testator, Sir John M'Donald, having, in an onerous and irrevocable deed, agreed with his wife to entail his fee-simple lands of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch upon the defender and his heirs-male, in consideration of £25,000 of her fortune being applied in discharge of so much of the purchase price of these lands, and the defender having defeated this purpose, and refused to give consent to that application of the money, the consideration stipulated for has not been given, and the disposition of these lands, in so far as the defender is concerned, therefore fails. (6) The pursuer being—1, the next heir in existence called to the succession by the said deed of entail immediately after the defender and the heirs-male of his body, and the defender having no male issue, never having been married, the pursuer is entitled to require the defender immediately to cede possession to him of the said estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch; or, 2, the pursuer being the next heir-at-law of Sir John M'Donald after the defender, he is now entitled to the said lands; or, 3, in consequence of the election made by the defender, and the forfeiture of his right to the said lands, the rents thereof belong to the said heirs of entail, and ought, during the defender's lifetime, to be collected and applied for their behoof, so that each in his order may obtain benefit therefrom.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The discharge of the said bond for £25,000 over the entailed estates of Kinloch Rannoch and others not being a condition of the deed of entail of 1837, the defender was not put to his election between discharging the said bond and forfeiting his rights under the entail. (3) Separatim, the defender was not put to such election, in respect that upon a sound construction of the various deeds executed by his parents, and in particular of the joint settlement and division and deed of entail of 1837, it was not the intention of the granters to put him to such election.

Upon 27th March 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the closed record and whole process, assolizies the defender from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* NOTE.—(After the narrative given above)—"The result of all this is, (1) That the defender, Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, has been for nearly forty years, and still is, infest as fiar in the estates of Dalchoanie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, under a title absolutely unqualified except by the liferent of his parents and the fetters of the entail: (2) That in 1872 his right to a share of the marriage-contract trust funds, to which he had, from the day of his birth, a spes successionis indefeasible except by his own death during the lifetime of the longest liver of his parents, became absolutely vested in him: (3) That by the deed of appointment and division which did not, and could not, take effect until the death of Lady M'Donald, the share of the fund to which the defender was thus absolutely entitled was fixed by his parents at the sum of £25,000 (4) That the deed which so fixed it was not a settlement by Sir John and Lady

M'Donald.

M'Donald of any estate belonging to themselves, but was a mere appointment of a fund in which they themselves had a mere right of liferent, the fee being in the children : (5) That it has been settled by final judgment in a litigation in which the present pursuer, along with his sisters, appear to have keenly contested every point with the defender, that the defender is entitled to that £25,000 absolutely, and that the same is not to be applied in discharging the debt of £25,000 affecting the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch : And (6) that the defender has completed his title to the securities over Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, on which the money is invested, and has received payment of the money in whole or in part.

"It is in these circumstances that the pursuer, John Alan M'Donald, as the heir called to the succession of the entailed estates immediately after his elder brother, the defender, and the heirs-male of his body, has raised the present action against his brother for the purpose of having it declared that, under and by virtue of the deed of division and the deed of entail above mentioned, the defender was 'bound to make his election as to whether he would take absolutely and unconditionally the sum of £25,000 sterling, allocated to him by the joint deed of division, or take the said entailed estates subject to the condition of the same being discharged and disencumbered of the said sum of £25,000 sterling, and that he has made his election, and has claimed and taken the said sum of £25,000 sterling absolutely, and that he has thereby defeated and frustrated the intention of his said father in respect of the settlement of the said estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch under the said deed of entail, and has thereby in that respect reprobated the said joint settlement and deed of division and deed of entail, and that his right, title, and interest therein is now, and shall in all time coming, be void and extinct, and that the said lands and others, with the rents, maills, and duties of the same, have fallen, devolved, and accresced and do now belong to the pursuer as next heir appointed to succeed by the said deed of entail.'

"It will be observed that the summons relates only to Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, and not to Dalchosnie, the defender's right to enjoy the latter estate being admittedly indefeasible under the marriage-contract, and incapable of being affected by anything which his parents may have done in the deed of division and appointment. And the result of the pursuer's success in this action will be, that the entailed estate which his parents intended to be a united family estate, held by the male representative of the family, will be dismembered, Dalchosnie remaining with the defender, the eldest son, while Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch are carried off by the pursuer, a younger son and remoter heir. Nothing but the clearest evidence, not only of the power, but of the intention of Sir John and Lady M'Donald, to put the defender to his election, could, in my opinion, warrant the present demand of the pursuer.

"The first question, therefore, to be answered plainly is, whether Sir John and Lady M'Donald had power to put the defender to his election between the entailed lands of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch and the appointment of £25,000 of the marriage-contract free of all destinations or conditions? I confess that notwithstanding the very able arguments of Mr Trayner and Mr Fraser on behalf of the pursuer I have not much difficulty in answering that question in the negative. The pursuer rests his case, both on the record and in debate, on the ground that the deed of entail and the deed of division must be read together as forming the testamentary settlements of Sir John and Lady M'Donald. But I am of opinion that these deeds, which are said to raise this case of election, are neither of them testamentary in the proper acceptation of that term. The entail was in no sense testamentary. By it Sir John M'Donald voluntarily and during his lifetime, and nearly thirty years before his death, conferred upon his eldest son, the defender, the irrevocable and irredeemable right of fee in Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, without any indication ex facie of the deed that by accepting the estate he was to become bound to apply towards the extinction only referred to one another, but each bore to be granted in consideration of the other. The deeds were, so to speak, dovetailed into one another.

of the debt affecting them any part of the marriage-contract trust funds, which were indefeasibly settled upon the children of the marriage, and to a share of which the defender, as one of these children, had at all events a protected opere successionis. On the other hand, the deed of division was not testamentary of the granters, because the funds which were thereby divided by Sir John and Lady M'Donald belonged, not to themselves, but to their children, subject only to a power of appointment by the parents. Two considerations, therefore, are to my mind conclusive against the power of the granters to put the defender to his election. These are—(1) That long before the alleged case of election emerged the defender had become by an inter vivos deed of entail the irredemable proprietor of the entailed estates, so that he had not to choose between taking these estates and taking the appointed share of the trust-funds; and (2) that the separate deed of division was not a testamentary settlement of the granters conferring benefits on the defender to which he was not otherwise entitled. But, further, and even if the entailed estates had been conveyed and the power of appointment had been exercised in one and the same deed, and both had been testamentary, the condition annexed to the appointment was illegal and void, and no case of election could arise. This point has been expressly decided in England by the Master of the Rolls (Lord Romilly) in the case of Churchill v. Churchill, 1867, L. R. 5 Eq., p. 44, in which all the previous decisions are fully considered and commented on. The rule of law which underlies that judgment, and indeed all the decisions as to election and approbate and reprobate, is, that although res aliena scienter legata in a testament bequeathing a legacy to the owner of the res aliena, may put him to his election between claiming the legacy and taking his own property, yet if the testator made his bequest erroneously believing that he had the power, while he had it not, the legatee will not be put to his election. The rule is illustrated in the case of Douglas' Trustees v. Douglas, 1862, 24 D. 1191. Now, in the present case it is clear from the language of the deed of appointment that Sir John and Lady M'Donald believed that they were dealing with a fund belonging to themselves, or over which they had the uncontrolled power of disposal, but that was an erroneous belief, and as their appointment of £25,000, in so far as it was restricted and qualified by conditions annexed, was illegally restricted, the presence of these conditions in the deed cannot put the defender to his election.

"The second question to be answered is whether, assuming that Sir John and Lady M'Donald had power to put the defender to his election, it was their intention to do so? No such intention is expressed, and I am very clearly of opinion that none is implied, either in the deed of entail or in the deed of appointment. The terms of the latter deed, however, are founded upon by the pursuer as implying such an intention on the part of the granters. And there cannot be any doubt as to the desire of Sir John and Lady M'Donald that the defender's £25,000 should be applied for the benefit of the heirs of entail. But was that their leading and ruling motive and intention? I think not. In the first place, the words they use are precatory words, and these are not sufficient to raise a case of election. See Blacket v. Lamb, 14 Beavan, p. 482, as commented on by Lord Romilly in the case of Churchill already referred to. But in the next place, it is clear that the ruling motive and fixed intention of Sir John and Lady M'Donald, in executing the deed of entail and deed of appointment, were that the three estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, should, burdened or unburdened, descend to and be enjoyed by the heirs male of the marriage in their order, as a united and important family estate. The language of the two deeds, whether read together or separately, is not, in my opinion, capable of any other construction. As I read these deeds it is not conceivable that the granters thereof intended or could have contemplated, as the possible result of the defender refusing to allow his share of the marriage-contract fund to be applied in extinguishing the debt affecting Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, that the united family estate which they were so anxious to found so as to form one plan of settlement. It was true that the condition which Sir John and Lady M'Donald had sought to impose upon the appointment of the sum of £25,000 to the defender was beyond their powers. They could not prevent him challenging that condition as he had done, and taking the money absolutely. But although they could not take away the defender's right to challenge the condition, they could take away his interest to exercise that right, by making its renunciation a condition of his obtaining something else, which they might give or withhold at their pleasure, i.e., the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch. The defender could not at the same time take the gift and refuse to comply with the condition. This principle, whatever name it received, "approbate and reprobate," "election," "implied condition," was based on the clearest principles of equity, and had been applied in a great variety of cases.¹ It was not necessary for Sir John and Lady M'Donald to use any words expressive of their intention that the defender should make his election. Every settlor intended his whole settlement to take effect. No one could read the deed of appointment and the entail without seeing that Sir John and Lady M'Donald's plain intention was that the lands of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch should devolve on the series of heirs on which they were entailed disburdened of the bond for £25,000. This was expressly recognised in the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in the multiplepointing between the parties. The defender was bound to make his election whether he would take the entailed estates and the money with the condition of using the money to disburden the estates, or take the money without the condition should be dismembered, and that Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch should be taken away from the heir of the marriage, and enjoyed as a separate estate by a remote substitute, while Dalchosnie remained with the institute of the entail. I am therefore of opinion that it was not the intention of Sir John and Lady M'Donald to put the defender to his election.

"If I am right in these views there is an end of the case, and the pursuer having failed in maintaining his declaratory conclusions he is not entitled to prevail in his other conclusion for denuding and removing, or for compensation for the prospective loss or damage which he alleges he may sustain by the defender having claimed and obtained payment of the £25,000 absolutely for his own behoof. Indeed, even if a case of election had been made out, I could not have held that the defender had already made his election. He has already obtained possession both of the estate and of the £25,000, and if he was ever bound to make his election it is still open to do so.

"In conclusion, I have only to state that even if a clear case of election, such as that for which the pursuer contends, had been made out, I should have had great difficulty in sustaining any claim, either for denuding in favour of the pursuer or for 'equity of compensation,' seeing that the pursuer is at present only heir-presumptive under the entail; that he may never succeed to the entailed estate; that in any view the defender is, during his life, the only person interested in the rents of the estate and in the annual income of the £25,000; and that any claim of damage at the pursuer's instance is too remote and contingent to admit of being, in hoc statu, estimated or assessed, or provided for.

"On the whole, I am of opinion that the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses."

and relinquish the estates. By taking the £25,000 without the condition the defender had, in fact, made his election, and he must give up the entailed estates. If, however, the Court were of opinion that the case was rather of implied condition than of approbate and reprobate, then the defender could only keep the entailed estate by fulfilling the condition.

The defender's argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.¹

In the course of the debate the pursuer tendered a minute of amendment, by which he proposed to add a conclusion that "the defender is bound, as a condition of his retaining possession of the said estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, to free and relieve the said lands and estate of and from the burden of the debt of £25,000: . . . Or otherwise, that the defender, by having taken benefit under the said joint settlement and deed of division, and the said relative deed of entail, by his having obtained possession of the lands and estate of Dalchosnie immediately upon his father's death, and by his having taken possession of the said estate of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch upon his mother's death, is under obligation and is bound to free and disburden the said estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch of the said sum of £25,000 affecting the same."

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This case appears at first sight to be more complicated than it really is. When divested of superfluous matter it seems to come to a comparatively simple question, and one which is affected by several plain principles of law.

Mr M'Donald of Dalchosnie, who afterwards became Sir John M'Donald was married to a daughter of Mr M'Inroy of Lude, and their antenuptial contract of marriage is one of the documents requiring here to be specially considered. The contract disposed mainly of two matters. Sir John M'Donald settled his paternal estate of Dalchosnie upon himself and his intended wife in conjuncture fee and liferent, but for her liferent use allenarly, in case she should survive him, "and to the heirs-male of this present marriage." On the other hand Mrs M'Inroy conveyed to trustees her whole interest in her father's estate, to be liferented in manner there mentioned; and after the death of the survivors of the spouses, then to be paid over to the child or children of the marriage in such proportions, and at such times, and under such conditions as the spouses should appoint by any joint deed, or as the lady should appoint if she survived her husband. The other provisions need not be here specified.

The marriage took place shortly after the date of the contract, which was 8th September 1826, and several children were born of the marriage, and, among others, the pursuer and defender in the present action. Several years thereafter two other deeds were executed, on which the case principally turns.

On 18th July 1837 the spouses executed a joint settlement and deed of division, which narrates the contract of marriage and the fact that Sir John M'Donald had purchased the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, upon which, besides the price, he had expended a considerable amount in improvements. It was also stated that in the purchase of these estates a sum of £25,000 had been advanced from Lady M'Donald's funds, for which an heritable bond had been granted to her trustees, and which bond had been assigned to the trustees under the marriage-contract. Upon this narrative, and the further narrative that it was their desire "to settle definitely, onerously, irrevocably, and mutually the whole of the said estates of Dalchoania, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, belonging to him, the said John M'Donald, and also to divide, apportion, and settle the whole property, heritable and moveable, including the said sum of £25,000 secured over the lands of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch belonging to her, the said Adriana M'Donald, on themselves and their family," the spouses proceeded to make the appointment contained in the deed by which the said sum of £25,000 was settled upon the defender, their eldest son, and other members of their family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate. It was explained that this sum was allotted "as the share of the eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate;" to which allotment this addition was appended, "it being their desire and appointment that the said trustees . . . should, immediately on the death of the survivor of them, the said spouses, renounce and discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands and estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch of the same." The remainder of Lady M'Donald's property was to be equally divided among the younger children, exclusive of the heir.

M'Donald v. M'Donald.

Of the same date, 18th July 1837, there was also executed by Sir John M'Donald the deed of entail referred to in the record, to the nature of which I shall afterwards advert.

A great deal of the discussion which we have had relates to the question of election, or of approbate and reprobate. I think it doubtful whether those questions are properly raised in the present case.

It appears to me that the question referred to resolves always into this position of things, that some party who is in the position of donor makes to another an offer of two different things, upon the footing, express or implied, that the party favoured may either take or reject the two things offered. This state of things implies a choice with a power of rejection or acceptance, and the two things are linked together in such a way as to be inseparable.

I am unable to discover that this state of things occurs here. No doubt there are two matters dealt with, but they are not so dealt with as to give rise to any election. The parents of the two parties,—pursuer and defender,—executed a deed of appointment and division, but this was not made the subject of a proper offer for their acceptance. It was a positive and valid deed of appointment, by which there was given to the defender, the eldest son of the parents, the sum of £25,000, which the parents allotted and apportioned as his share. The deed contains other matters, and, in particular, declarations or statements as to the debt of that amount constituted over the heritable estates in question, and which debt it was the wish of the father and mother to wipe off by payment.

Now, the introduction of this matter into the deed of appointment might be looked at in one or other of two ways; it might be meant as an inherent and imperative condition of the appointment that the £25,000 allotted to the defender should be specifically applied to the extinction of the debt constituted over the estates to that amount, or it might be considered as something falling short of that qualification. In the process of multiplepoining previously brought to determine the rights of parties the pursuer and the other young children maintained that the appointment in favour of the defender was conditional and qualified, and consequently null, so that the whole divisible fund was to be divided equally among all the children. This Court sustained the plea, and set aside, accordingly, the whole appointment. But, upon an appeal to the House of Lords, that judgment was reversed, and it was decided that the appointment was good, that it was in itself an absolute appointment, and that what was said as to applying the £25,000 to the extinction of debt was merely the expression of a wish or desire that this should be done, but was not a condition of the appointment so as either to make it null or to make the desire expressed obligatory on the defender.

M'Donald v.

In so far, therefore, as regards the deed of appointment it was absolute and unqualified, and the defender was entitled to take the whole sum allotted to him without being under any obligation or restraint as to the application of the money.

But then the pursuer maintains that the deed of entail executed by the father on the same day imposed on the defender an obligation as to the use of the money allotted to him.

Now, it is true that the deed of entail thus executed by Sir John M'Donald was a voluntary deed, and that Sir John might have made it conditional if he had chosen. But the question is, whether he did so. He executed the deed as a de presenti deed, but he inserted in it no condition as to the use of the money he apportioned. The form of the entail was that he gave the entailed lands to himself and Lady M'Donald, and to the survivor, and to the heirs aftermentioned in fee. This was done upon the conditions, restrictions, and provisions after specified, but these were merely the usual conditions applicable to an entail. The deed then contains a procuratory and precept for infesting the defender and the other heirs of entail in the entailed lands, but there is no provision or condition either irritant or resolute in connection with the allotted money.

Upon this deed of entail infestment immediately followed in favour of the spouses in liferent, and the defender as the first heir of entail in fee. These infestments took place in the years 1837 and 1838, now nearly forty years ago.

It is in these circumstances that the pursuer brings the present action to have it found substantially that this entail binds the defender to apply the £25,000 allotted to him to the extinction of the debt forming a burden upon the lands in question.

It seems a complete answer to any plea of approbate and reprobate or of election that the defender was never put to any election by his parents. He took the allotment of £25,000, as the House of Lords found, absolutely and unconditionally, and was entitled to expend it or apply it as he pleased. It is said, however, that the entail executed in his favour was a conditional grant, which he could only accept upon the footing said to be indicated in it of applying his own £25,000 to the disburdening of the entailed lands to that extent. If there had been an offer by the father to put his son upon an election it might have been expected that the defender would elect to take or reject the entail as he pleased. But no such option was given. His father gave him the estate at once, the fee of the estate, taking only a liferent to himself, and he immediately infested the defender, then a mere boy, in the fee. The defender was thus left option in the matter, and was not by the figure of the transaction placed under any necessity of election. No. 9.

Accordingly the House of Lords has found that the defender has an absolute and indefeasible right to the money. It was not pleaded, and at any rate it is not found, that he was barred from taking the money by any condition or uncertainty as to the entailed estate. It was further held that all that was meant by the language of the appointment was an expression of desire that the money should be applied in a certain way, but which did not amount to an imperative obligation.

If this was the meaning and effect of the language used in the deed of appointment it seems impossible to transfer that language to the deed of entail, and give it there a more stringent meaning. If it was truly meant to qualify the entail the place to do that was in the entail itself along with other conditions, and certainly to infest the defender in the entail was an absolute reinstating of him into full and absolute right to the entailed estate as the heir first called.

In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to hold that this statement which occurs in the deed of apportionment can be read as being more imperative and more of a resolute condition in the deed of entail where it is not to be found. There seems no room for thus fettering the defender under either of the deeds, or of putting him to an option of election that was plainly never intended, and for which there is nowhere to be found any clear or unequivocal words.

Upon these grounds I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I may further state my doubts as to the pursuer's position for pursuing this action as a mere presumptive heir of entail, and also as to the propriety and suitability of the conclusions of the action, even in their most amended form, but I think it better to deal with the action on its proper merits so as to settle definitely the rights of the parties.

Neither of these deeds is testamentary.

LORD ORMDALE.—Although this case was debated at great length and very anxiously it does not appear to me to be attended with much difficulty.

The disputed question, as raised in the record and argued at the bar, is whether the defender has in the circumstances been so put to his election, or, in other words, has so acted that he must be held, on the principle of approbate and reprobate, to have lost all right to the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, and is bound to cede possession of them to the pursuer. Another question, suggested in the course of the discussion, from the bench, is whether, independently of the principle of election, or approbate and reprobate, a condition or obligation was, by the deed of entail and relative deed of division and appointment, imposed upon the defender to the effect that he must discharge the £25,000 debt with which the estates are encumbered, and can be compelled to do so.

It is unnecessary here to enter into a detail of the circumstances in which these questions have to be considered. They are set out in the record, and the Lord Ordinary has given a very distinct resumé of them in the note subjoined to his judgment, which is adverse to the pursuer.

It is essential, however, to bear in mind—(1) that the deed of entail under which the defender holds the estates in question, and which is not said to be in itself objectionable in any respect, was executed and duly recorded and infest-ment taken in virtue of it nearly forty years ago; (2) that it expressly bears that the object of the granters was to settle the estates on the defender and the heirs called in succession to him, "definitely, onerously, and irrevocably;" and (3) that since the death of his mother in 1872, his father having previously died, the defender has been in the full and—till the present action was raised in December 1875—unchallenged possession and enjoyment of the entailed estates.

And in regard to the sum of £25,000 which the defender derived from his mother in conformity with the marriage-contract between her and his father and relative deed of division and appointment, it is also very important to keep in view that he has been found entitled to payment of it, absolutely and unconditionally, by the Court of last resort, under an appeal from a judgment of this Court.

Notwithstanding these facts, about which there is no dispute, the pursuer who is the heir next to the defender and the heirs-male of his body entitled to succeed to the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, calls upon the defender now to denude of these estates in his favour on the ground that he is not entitled both to the £25,000 and the estates, and that having taken payment unconditionally of the money, he must give up the estates, in respect that having been put to his election either to take the estates or the money, but not both, and that having elected to take and having got payment of the money, he must surrender the estates to the pursuer. But why this should be the result, even supposing the defender had been put to his election, I do not very well see. He had got possession of the entailed estates prior to any question having been raised as to the money, and some years before he was found entitled to and received payment of the money. He must therefore on the pursuer's theory, supposing it to be maintainable at all, have been held to have made his election when he took possession of the entailed estates. So that the only course left for the pursuer was, on that ground, to have opposed the defender getting payment of the money. But no such ground of opposition to the defender getting payment of the money was taken by the pursuer or any one else, and the fact is undoubtedly, as has been already noticed, that he was found entitled by judgment of the House of Lords to payment of the money, absolutely and unconditionally. Again, supposing the pursuer's present grounds of action to be maintainable at all, it may well be asked why should he any more than the defender be found entitled to the entailed estates, free from the alleged obligation to discharge the £25,000 debt to which they are now subject. In no view can I see how any such result could be sustained, and yet were decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer in terms of the conclusions of his action such would be the result.

But it is unnecessary longer to dwell upon these considerations, as in every aspect of the pursuer's action it appears to me to be quite untenable, that is to say, the pursuer's assumption that the defender was put to his election between the entailed estates and the £25,000, or, to put it differently, his assumption that the defender must, by taking the money free from any obligation to free the entailed estates from the £25,000 debt, be held to have reprobated the deed of entail under which he took the estates, is ill-founded, whether the matter is examined and considered in connection with the deed of division and appointment, or the deed of entail, or both together.

In making the deed of division and appointment, the granters were not dealing with monies over which they had an absolute control, but with funds which they were bound to divide among their children, although no doubt they had a discretionary power to make the division in such proportions as they might consider right. They did accordingly appoint £25,000 of the funds to be paid to the defender, who was one of the parties having right to a share. But they were not entitled to impose upon him, as the condition of his receiving payment of that sum that he should apply it in payment of the debt with which the entailed estates were encumbered. And in point of fact, as was found in the House of Lords, no such condition was imposed upon the defender, although in the deed of division a desire was expressed that he should with the money pay off the debt on the entailed estates. If, indeed, it had been made an express or positive condition of his getting the money the appointment would have been altogether bad; but just because there was no such condition the appointment was held to be good and unobjectionable, and the defender found entitled to payment of the £25,000 absolutely and unconditionally.

Thus standing the matter as regards the deed of division and appointment, it was next to be considered how far the question is affected by the deed of entail. It was assumed in the argument for the pursuer that it was made a condition in that deed, either express or implied, that the defender could not take the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch and also the £25,000 without applying that sum towards discharging the debt of that amount on the entailed estates, and that as he had done so, he had approbated and at the same time reprobated the deed of entail; or to put it differently, that he must be held to have elected to take the money, and having done so, must give up the estates to the pursuer. But, as has been already remarked, the defender having taken the estates before he got the money, must be held to have then made his election, if there was election in the case at all, and the objection, if there was any room for it, taken on the principle of election, ought to have been raised, and could only have been raised, as against the defender's claim for the money. Irrespective of that consideration, the pursuer's ground of action appears to me to be in itself ill-founded. The deed of entail does not in itself contain any condition or obligation such as the pursuer relies upon. It is true that in the deed of entail there is a reference to the deed of division, but it is res judicata that what the pursuer calls an obligation to apply the money towards discharging the debt on the entailed estates is not an obligation at all. The Lord Chancellor (Session Cases, vol. ii., 4th series, H. of L. p. 131), makes this, I think, very clear. After quoting the portion of the deed of division which is said to constitute the alleged obligation or condition, his Lordship observes—"It is simply an expression of desire which could only be carried into effect with the consent of the person who by the previous clauses was made, according to my opinion, the absolute owner of the £25,000. If he consented, the trustees might discharge the estate. If he did not consent, the estate had to remain burdened with this bond, and this expression of desire would not be held in any way of itself to take away from that ownership which was created by the former clause." And it is vain, I think, to contend that although the allusion to discharging the debt in the deed of division and nomination is not of the nature of an obligation to do so in that deed, it must be held to become an obligation in the deed of entail, in consequence merely of its being there referred to in the most general way possible. To hold that to be so would, in my opinion, be contrary to the judgment pronounced in Carver v. Bowles, 2 Russell and Mylne's Reports, p. 304; Blacket v. Lamb, 14 Beavan's Reports, p. 482; and Woolridge

No. 9.

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

v. Woolridge, Johnson's Reports, p. 63. Thus, in Woolridge v. Woolridge was held by Vice-Chancellor Page Wood that where "there is an absolute appointment by will in favour of a proper object of power, and that appointment is followed by attempts to modify the interest so appointed in a manner which the law will not allow, the Court reads the will as if all the passages which such attempts are made were swept out of it for all purposes, i.e., only so far as they attempt to regulate the quantum of interest to be enjoyed by the appointee in the settled property, but also so far as they might otherwise have been relied upon as raising a case of election."

In regard, therefore, to election as between the entailed lands and £25,000, I have no difficulty in assuming that there is no sufficient ground holding that it arises in the present case.

And in regard to there being otherwise an obligation on the defender to charge the £25,000 debt, I cannot find it in the deed of entail any more than in the deed of division and appointment. There is certainly no such obligation expressly set out in the deed of entail. It is said, however, that it is in the deed of division and appointment, which, being referred to in the deed of entail, must therefore be read as part of it. But, as I have already explained, it has been decided by the House of Lords that what is said to be the obligation or condition in the deed of division and appointment is not an obligation or condition at all, a reference in the deed of entail to the deed of division and appointment cannot, in my apprehension, effect the pursuer's object. The desired obligation or condition would indeed require to appear in very explicit and unambiguous terms in the deed of entail, and a general reference to the deed of division and appointment, which is all there is, would not, I think, be sufficient in any view that can be taken of the matter. Besides, the pursuer did not maintain such a ground of action, and it is not reconcilable either with the argument or any of the conclusions of his summons.

I have only further to remark that were effect to be given to the pursuer's contention, on any of the grounds which have been adverted to, the great object of the makers of the entail would be entirely defeated, for the inevitable consequence would be a separation of the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch from the estate of Dalchosnie, a result which I can find nothing in this case warranting.

In my opinion, therefore, and for the reasons I have stated, there is no ground for disturbing the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which, I think, ought to be adhered to, and the pursuer's reclaiming note refused.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of opinion that the result reached by the Lord Ordinary in this case is right, and that the interlocutor under review should be adhered to, although I scarcely concur with the Lord Ordinary in some of the views upon which he proceeds, and which are fully explained in the observations appended to his interlocutor.

The object of the action is to have it found and declared that the defender, who is heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, is bound to give up possession of the said estates, and hand them over to the pursuer, who is the defender's immediate young brother, and who happens to be the next heir of entail now in existence. The purpose of the action, its sole purpose, is to put the pursuer in possession of these two entailed estates in place of the defender, his elder brother.

and the pursuer claims the estates as next heir of entail unconditionally, and without offering to clear the same of the debts or heritable bonds affecting the lands.

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

The ground of this demand is, that by the terms of his father's settlements, consisting of, first, the deed of entail of the said estates, and, second, a deed of apportionment and division of the same date, the defender was put to his election either to apply the sum of £25,000, allocated to him by the deed of division, in paying off the debt affecting the entailed estates, or, to renounce his interest in the said estates, and that having elected to take the £25,000 absolutely the defender is now bound to give up his interest and right as heir of entail. At the debate before your Lordships an additional conclusion was tendered, as an amendment of the summons, to the effect that if the defender was entitled even yet to retain the entailed estates he was bound, as a condition of so retaining them, to free and relieve the lands from the debt and burden of £25,000. I do not think, however, that this amendment makes any difference in the disposal of the case.

The question raised in the action is of great importance, and, in some of its aspects, is attended with a good deal of nicety and difficulty. The circumstances in which the question arises are very special, and involve the very minute consideration of Sir John and Lady M'Donald's antenuptial marriage-contract, and of the deed of division and apportionment following thereon, as well as of the deed of entail under which the estates now in question were finally settled.

In this consideration we are aided and must be regulated and guided, so far as the judgment goes, by the final and authoritative decision pronounced by the House of Lords in the previous litigation between the same parties, and which, of course, is binding on all concerned. This judgment was pronounced by the House of Lords on 17th June 1875, and it related to the validity and effect of the deed of division and apportionment by Sir John and Lady M'Donald.

In explaining shortly the view which I take of the present case I think it most convenient to begin with this judgment of the House of Lords, because it completely fixes and finally determines the rights of parties under one of the deeds in question,—I mean under the deed of apportionment and division, and determines conclusively the meaning and effect of that deed as between the present parties. This being finally established I do not find very much difficulty in determining the effect of the only other deed in question,—I mean the only other deed which is said to put the defender to his election, the deed of entail of 16th July 1837.

By the judgment of the House of Lords it is finally fixed that under the deed of division and apportionment the defender takes, and is entitled to take, the sum of £25,000 contained in the bond for that amount secured over the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch as his own absolute and exclusive property, free from all conditions, obligations, or limitations of whatever kind. The money is his own, unfettered in any way, to dispose of and apply at his own pleasure. It was not in the power of Sir John and Lady M'Donald to impose upon the defender any binding condition whatever as to the mode in which the defender should employ or expend that £25,000. They could not require him to expend it in disencumbering the entailed estates or in any other way whatever. They could not make a conditional appointment, and, whatever was their desire or intention, they could in no way compel the defender to carry it out.

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

It is no doubt quite plain from the terms of the deed of division and appointment what was the intention and desire of Sir John and Lady M'Donald. They wished the entailed estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch to be freed and disburdened of this debt of £25,000, which formed so considerable a part of the whole value of the lands, and they wished the estates so disburdened to descend to the series of heirs called in the deed of entail. The Lord Chancellor and the other Judges in the House of Lords are agreed upon this point, and I do not think there is room for two opinions. The Lord Chancellor says,—"Now, there is not the least doubt upon the view which must be taken of the whole of the joint deed of division, coupled with the deed entailing these properties, that the spouses intended and desired that the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, which had been mainly acquired by the £25,000 of trust property, should go in the course of the entail under which they were limited, and should go without the encumbrance on them of the heritable bond securing the £25,000 to the trustees of the trust-funds. And there is not the slightest doubt, at least not in my mind, that if Sir John and Lady M'Donald had been asked, is that what you desire? do you desire to execute an instrument which shall say that Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch shall go in the course of the entail under which they have been settled, discharged of the £25,000? they would have said, by all means, that is exactly what we want, let that be done in whatever way it can be done." But then the Lord Chancellor goes on to say that the question under the deed of appointment is, "How have they given effect to that general intention, and have they given effect to that general intention in a way which is open to objection upon the ground of its complete invalidity?"

The judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and the other noble Lords all concurring with him therein, was that while the apportionment of the £25,000 in favour of the defender was valid and effectual the expression of the wish and intention of Sir John and Lady M'Donald as to the application of that sum was altogether void and ineffectual as a condition, and the result of the judgment is that the appointment in favour of the defender of the sum of £25,000 is read as if it had been pure and simple, and as if the deed had contained no expression of wish or intention that it should be applied in disencumbering the entailed lands or in any other way. Everything which could be read as imposing a condition or obligation upon the defender to apply the £25,000 in any particular way is struck out of the deed and held pro non scripto as if the deed had contained no provision whatever excepting the appointment and apportionment of £25,000 to the eldest son.

The present case, therefore, starts with this, that the defender takes the £25,000 contained in the bond in question as his own absolute and unlimited property. It is as much his own as if it had been put into his pocket in coin or in bank notes, or as if he had earned it by his own industry. He takes it and he holds it free of all condition or obligation whatever, and this narrows the case to the inquiry as to the entailed estates. Does the defender take these estates as heir of entail free from any condition affecting his own property, and free from any other fetters or conditions than those usually attaching to an entailed succession?

Now, this, in my view, is the real question for decision in the present case: was the defender called unconditionally as the institute in the entail, or was it made a condition of the entail that he should not take or should not hold as stitute or as first heir of entail at all unless he applied certain independent property and money of his own in a particular way,—that is, unless he took 25,000 out of his own pocket to clear off once and for ever the burdens affecting the entailed lands?

No. 9.

Nov. 1, 1876.
M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

To put the question otherwise—but it is really the same question—did the late Sir John M'Donald intend that if the defender, his eldest son, did not take his own money, to the extent of £25,000, and pay off the burdens affecting the entailed lands, then he, the eldest son, should not succeed as institute of entail at all, but that the entailed succession should thereupon devolve upon the pursuer, the entailer's second son, who most certainly would be under no obligation whatever to apply £25,000 of his, the pursuer's, own money, or any sum whatever, in clearing off the entailed debts?

Now, I am utterly unable to say that this or anything like this was the intention of the late Sir John M'Donald. On the contrary, I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary that the intention of Sir John M'Donald, so far as we can gather it from his deeds, was that the whole estates should go to his eldest son in the first place, as the first heir of entail, disencumbered, if possible, of the £25,000 affecting the same, but that they should so go whether disencumbered or not. This appears evident from many considerations upon the face of the deeds. For example, it is clear that Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch were purchased because they adjoined the original family estate of Dalchosnie, and they were purchased in order that they might be united with Dalchosnie and might form one entire and undivided estate. It was never the intention of the entailer that Dalchosnie should go to one set of heirs, and Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch to another. But this separation would be the result if the pursuer's contention is well founded, for admittedly the defender, as the eldest son, is entitled to keep Dalchosnie, and the pursuer seeks to separate therefrom and appropriate to himself Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, and thus utterly to defeat the indisputable intention of the testator.

Still, farther, the defender, as institute of entail, was actually infeft, that is, put in possession of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, by the maker of the entail, Sir John M'Donald, so long ago as 1837. This infeftment was expedited in the defender's favour by the orders of Sir John M'Donald himself, the defender, his eldest son being then in minority, and the beneficial possession was no doubt postponed until the expiry of the liferent. But the very fact of Sir John M'Donald having, forty years ago, executed an irrevocable deed of entail, and expedited an absolute and irrevocable infeftment in favour of his son, shews in the clearest manner that the entail was not intended to be conditional, or to be either suspensive or resolutive in its effect, or to depend in any way upon what his son might long afterwards choose to do with his own separate and absolute money and property.

Yet, again, not to dwell upon other indications, it would be absolutely futile and useless to impose such a condition on the first heir of entail, that is, on the eldest son, when it was not imposed upon any of the subsequent heirs of entail, that is, when it was not imposed on the issue of the eldest son, who undoubtedly would take, free from all such condition, or upon the pursuer, as the second son, or on his issue, or on any of the subsequent heirs of entail. No doubt Sir John M'Donald wished the estates disencumbered, but if this could not be done—if he had no power to do it by means of the deed of apportionment—then there is not the slightest ground for supposing that he wished the encumbered estates, that is, the estates charged with £25,000, to go so encumbered to his second son rather than to his eldest. But this is the effect of the pursuer's contention, and I think this contention is altogether unfounded. It would not better the condition of the estates or of the family or of the heir in possession that the estates should go, subject to all their burdens, to a younger son rather than to an elder,—to a remoter heir rather than to a nearer,—and if Sir John M'Donald had been told, as he might have been told, you cannot compel your eldest son to apply that £25,000 in disburdening the estate, is there the slightest probability that he would have said,—then I will not give my estates to my eldest son at all, but I will separate them from Dalchosnie and give them to my younger son as first heir of entail, although most certainly my younger son has neither the will nor the means to free them from the burden with which they are charged.

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

In truth, and on what I think a sound construction of these deeds, reading them all together, for I quite assent to this as the sound mode of reaching the testator's intention, I think that the deeds do not raise a question of election at all. It was not the intention of the late Sir John M'Donald to put his eldest son to the election which the pursuer now seeks to impose upon him. I think such an idea never crossed Sir John M'Donald's mind, and if it had been put to him he would at once have repudiated it. If he had been told that he could not impose the condition upon his eldest son as a binding condition, what he would certainly have said would have been,—Well then I shall simply give my wish and desire, and leave it there. My eldest son, who has the £25,000, and has thus the means of clearing the estate, will be far more likely to do so, and thus fulfil my wish, than my second son, who has no such money and no such means. To suppose any other intention in the testator, to suppose that he wished the burdened estates to be taken from his eldest son and handed over to his second, is, mildly, to guess at the testator's meaning, and to make a will for him which he has not chosen to make for himself.

For if the testator, Sir John M'Donald, had really intended that if his eldest son, the defender, refusing to apply the £25,000 towards clearing the estates, should thereupon forfeit his life interest in the estates, which should devolve upon the pursuer, nothing would have been easier for him than to have said so, and the proper place to have said so would have been in the deed of entail itself. It might have been made a proper condition of the entail, duly fenced with irritant and resolute clauses, and this is very generally done when such an effect is intended. Even without fetters or irritant and resolute clauses it might have been made a personal condition binding upon the institute taken under the entail. But nothing of the kind is done here. All that we have in the deed of entail is the narrative of the deed of appointment and division, and from this simple narrative is sought to be inferred and spelled out so serious a condition against the defender, the institute of entail, as the forfeiture of his whole life interest. I cannot imply such a condition.

We were told that estimated actuarially the defender's life interest in the entailed estates is of much less value than the £25,000 which the pursuer demands that he should pay, and this may very easily be so. The defender's life might conceivably at least be a very precarious one, his prospect of possession might be short and uncertain, and as the whole rental does not exceed or does not much exceed the mere interest of the £25,000 it would be the hardest possible condition to make the defender pay the full capital merely for a precarious life rent. I cannot find such a condition or requirement in the deeds.

It is very remarkable, and I recur to this as an element in the question of No. 9. tention, that the condition which the pursuer now maintains to be an essential Nov. 1, 1876. condition of the defender's taking under the entail, is not found in the deed of M'Donald v. M'Donald. entail itself, but only, if at all, in the deed of appointment, which I am quite willing to call, as the pursuer's counsel did, the relative or counterpart deed. It then it is somewhat serious for the pursuer's argument that the expressions in the deed of appointment have been finally held by the highest authority, by the Court of the last resort, in a question between the same parties, not to be proper conditions at all, but merely expressions of desire, and, where directed to the marriage-contract trustees, to be expressions of desire which could not be carried out without the consent of the defender,—a consent which he was not bound to give. It is very awkward and very difficult for the pursuer to maintain that what in the deed of appointment itself is a mere expression of desire shall be held in another deed which simply narrates the deed of appointment without incorporating it to be a proper and obligatory condition inferring forfeiture of the entailed estates. I do not say this is conclusive, for it is possible that a thing may be made a condition in a pure beneficium which cannot be made a condition annexed to what is really payment of a debt. But although not conclusive the obstacle is very formidable to the pursuer, and I do not think he can overcome it. I think he has neither words nor materials to enable him to do so. The strong presumption is, reading the deeds together, that the words must have the same meaning and effect in both.

Questions of election, such as this is said to be, always resolve into the will and intention of the testator. If the intention can be gathered that the party favoured shall take the benefit, even although he resist the testator's wishes in certain other respects, then he is not put to his election, and it seems to me that this is the fair result of the whole testamentary expressions of the late Sir John M'Donald. Still farther, election is always or almost always of the nature of compensation, and followed by compensatory effects. The legatee or beneficiary who will not comply with the testator's intention forfeits his legacy, and then the legacy is applied, so far as it will go, in carrying out the intention. The child who, repudiating his provisions in a universal settlement, claims legitim, must give up these conventional provisions, and the amount thereof goes to the other children or to the residuary legatee, who suffers by the claim of legitim. But here if election were held to apply it would be a very anomalous case of election, for there is no room for compensation. No sum is set free which might go so far at least to fulfil the testator's intention. The testator's intention is no more carried out under the one alternative than under the other. The only difference is according to the pursuer's contention that the estates which are not to be disencumbered, instead of going to the eldest son, who has the means, and may very likely fulfil his father's wish of sending them down free of debt, are to go to the second son, who, whatever his wish may be, has not the means of carrying out his father's desire. I do not think that this is an election either contemplated or implied by Sir John; and on this main ground, while concurring in other respects with Lords Neaves and Ormisdale, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The parties to this action have changed, and indeed reversed, the positions which they held when they were last before us. In the former action of multiplepoinding the younger children of Sir John and Lady

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

M'Donald endeavoured to frustrate the manifest intention of the settlements of their father and mother by challenging the validity of the deed of appointment, in so far as it apportioned £25,000 of Lady M'Donald's fortune to the present defender. They maintained that the directions of that deed were a fraud upon the power reserved in the contract of marriage, inasmuch as they carried the benefit of the appointment contingently to persons who were not objects of the power. In defence the defender pleaded that the appointment to him was absolute, and not conditional; and in argument he stated that he was quite willing that the directions expressed in the deed of appointment should be carried out. The plea of the younger children was sustained by this Court, but the judgment was reversed in the House of Lords, where it was found that the defender was entitled to the sum allotted to him, unconditionally.

The pursuer, who is the next heir of entail entitled to succeed to the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, now brings this action, for the purpose of having it declared that the defender has forfeited his right to these entailed estates by taking this sum of £25,000, not having paid off the debts which affected these lands, as directed by the deed of division; and by an amendment of the summons, to which I shall afterwards refer, he has introduced a conclusion, modified in terms, but substantially coming to the same result.

The defender, on the other hand, now maintains that, having taken the £25,000 under the deed of division absolutely, he is entitled to keep up these debts against the entailed estate, notwithstanding the explicit intention expressed in the deed of division.

I had not much sympathy with the plea maintained by the younger children in the former action, which I thought, as it was ultimately found to be, unsound, because they were endeavouring to frustrate the manifest intention of the maker of this settlement. I have as little for the plea of the defender in this action, for he is as plainly endeavouring to obtain a benefit which no one can read these deeds without seeing that he never was intended to have. I am, however, greatly hampered in giving effect to my views as to the justice of the case and the legal rights of the parties, from the shape in which the pursuer, for very plain reasons, has chosen to make and maintain his claim.

After what has fallen from your Lordships I shall not detain the Court by any analysis of the two instruments on which this case turns. It is enough to premise that the joint settlement and deed of division, and the deed of entail, of the fee-simple lands of Kinloch Rannoch and Loch Garry, executed on the same day, by Sir John and Lady M'Donald, form one settlement of the estate belonging to them. Each deed is the counterpart of the other, and bears to be granted in consideration of the other. The deed of division bears to proceed on the narrative that the deed of entail executed on the same day "was granted by me," that is, Sir John M'Donald, "in consideration of the declarations and appointment hereinafter made in regard to the property of the said Adriana M'Donald my wife;" and the deed proceeds,—“Therefore we, the said John M'Donald and Adriana M'Donald, in consideration of the said deed of entail,” &c. “declare and appoint as follows.” And the deed of entail, on the other hand, proceeds upon the narrative by the entailer, Sir John M'Donald, “and having of even date herewith executed a deed of appointment and division of the whole estate belonging to the said Adriana M'Donald or M'Donald, which deed and appointments then contained are held as implement on her part of the mutual agreement between us for the settlement of our respective estates, therefore, in implement on t.

part of the foresaid mutual agreement, I, the said John M'Donald," &c. As far herefore as the deed of division and appointment contains provisions relative o the fee-simple lands which were thus gratuitously entailed, they relate to proerty over which the granters had full power, and which they might have disposed of as they pleased, and the combined effect of the two deeds constitutes heir settlement of these estates.

No. 9.

Nov. 1, 1876.
M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

Nor can there be the slightest doubt as to the substance, or rather the object, if that combined settlement. The parents intended that their eldest son should succeed to these lands (which Sir John M'Donald held in fee-simple), under the fetters of an entail, unencumbered. That was the result of the provisions which the spouses made, if they had been carried out in terms, and that of course was the object which they intended to accomplish. By appointing £25,000 out of the wife's fortune to the eldest son they enabled him to cancel these debts with which the estates were charged.

The defender, the eldest son, has, since the date of the judgment of the House of Lords, obtained an order from this Court on the trustees to transfer these bonds to him, and he has apparently assigned them, in part at least, for value to third parties; and he now maintains that he is entitled to keep them up against the entailed estate. The pursuer, accordingly, the next heir of entail, has raised the present action, the conclusions of which are the following :
 That it should be found and declared that, under and by virtue of the joint settlement and deed of division executed by the said Sir John M'Donald and Adriana M'Donald, and the relative deed of entail executed by the said Sir John M'Donald, "the defender was bound to make his election as to whether he would take absolutely and unconditionally the sum of £25,000 allocated to him by the said joint deed of division, or to take the said entailed estates subject to the condition of the same being discharged and disencumbered of the said sum of £25,000, and that he has made his election, and has claimed and taken the said sum of £25,000 absolutely, and that he has thereby defeated and frustrated the intention of his said father in respect of the settlement of the said estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch under the said deed of entail, and has thereby in that respect reprobated the said joint settlement and deed of division, and deed of entail, and that his right, title, and interest therein is now void and shall in all time coming be void and extinct," &c.

I am very clearly of opinion that, in so far as the pursuer demands that the right of the defender to the entailed estates shall be declared to be forfeited, his action is entirely untenable, not because the defender is not or may not be still bound to clear the estate of these debts, but because that obligation, if it exists, must be fulfilled according to its terms, and enforced by the ordinary compulsions of the law.

The pursuer maintains his case on the footing that by accepting the appointment of £25,000 without clearing off the debt, the defender had reprobated the deed of the entailor, and therefore had forfeited his right under the entail. But this is a misapprehension of the defender's right, as sustained by the House of Lords. There are three separate provisions contained in this deed of appointment, all of which are very clearly dealt with by the Lord Chancellor. The first is the declaration of the will of the granters that this sum of £25,000 should descend to the heirs of entail, a declaration which the Lord Chancellor holds to be equivalent to a gift of the fee to the defender. Then, secondly, there are the words of absolute appointment, which the Lord Chancellor held

No. 9.

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

to be unconditional ; and, thirdly, there is the direction and appointment on the trustees to cancel these bonds, which was held not to be the expression of a condition, but only of a wish or desire that the money should be so employed. As regards this last direction, all the noble and learned Lords were clear, not only that it could not receive effect, but that it never was intended to receive effect, without the consent of the eldest son. Thus, in taking the £25,000 as his absolute right, the defender acted entirely in conformity with the deed of division. He took the money without conditions, because it was given without conditions, and no question of election, or as we term it, approbate and reprobate, can possibly arise by the defender acting on the deed of appointment according to its terms.

This consideration might be held sufficient to dispose of the original conclusions of this action ; and although the amendment of the summons does contain a conclusion that it should be declared that the defender is bound to discharge these debts, this is only for the purpose of leading up to the conclusion that the forfeiture of the estate is the penalty to be incurred by the failure to fulfil the obligation. Apparently, and not unnaturally, the pursuer cares little whether these debts are cleared or not, if he is not to have access to the estate, for the payment would not confer any immediate benefit on the pursuer, and might never do so. And therefore he has been driven to maintain that by accepting this unconditional provision the defender, in some way which is not intelligible to me, has reprobated the deed under the terms of which he has implicitly acted.

But while I am very clear that by taking the £25,000 absolutely the defender has raised no question whatever of election, there remains the other and to my mind the only point involved in the conclusions of the summons which the case presents, whether, apart from election, he can take these estates which were entailed on him by Sir John M'Donald and yet keep up these debts against the entailed estate. I mean to express my opinion on this point as your Lordships have, but I have doubts how far, even if my views are sound, they can receive effect in this action. This point does not depend on any of the defender's actings in regard to the apportioned fund, but entirely on the injunctions or obligations laid upon him by the granters of the settlement, either directly or by clear implication. It is maintained by the pursuer that the deed of division, while it attaches no condition to the appointment, does yet clearly indicate the will and the intention of Sir John and Lady M'Donald that the defender should pay off these debts, and that Sir John M'Donald, as the fee simple proprietor of these lands, was entitled to attach this obligation to the settlement by any probative writing expressive of that intention.

On this subject I am of opinion—1st, That Sir John M'Donald may effectually impose this condition on his eldest son, by words expressive of the intention, in the deed of division. It can be of no moment that the obligation did not enter the investiture or the formal conveyance. Any purposes, conditions, or alterations may be effectually adjoined to a formal conveyance by any probative writing, contemporaneous or posterior, expressive of the grantor's intention. The destination itself may be so altered, and much more may conditions be so annexed to the gift. I should consider it a matter of law not admitting of dispute that if Sir John M'Donald had distinctly said in the deed of division that his eldest son should pay off these debts the direction might have received effect, and that it would not signify that the clause did not the conveyance. In the second place, I do not think that any light is thrown on this question by the series of English cases, commencing with that of Carver v. Bowles.¹ It was argued that in conformity with these cases the words in the deed of division which indicate the intention of the parties that the defender should pay off these debts, however clear, cannot be read, but must be blotted out of the deed. I have carefully studied these cases, and I am very clearly of opinion that the argument founded on them proceeds on a misapprehension of their true import. They decide no more than this, that where in the exercise of a power of appointment an attempt is made ineffectually to attach limitations to the appointment, the appointee may both take the fund absolutely, and other gifts contained in the same deed, without thereby giving force or vitality to the inoperative directions, on the principle of election. That seems to be the inevitable result of holding that these superadded directions were not conditions of the appointment, and so I am inclined to hold in this case. Such was the case of Carver v. Bowles. Lord Hatherley, in the recent case of Woolridge,² makes the observations which Lord Ormisdale has quoted. He says that the words must be blotted out of the deed, not only to the effect of denying them operation in limiting the appointment, but also of excluding any question of election. It was to these effects only that Lord Hatherley held that the words were to be considered as blotted out of the deed. Holding as I do that no question of election can be raised in this case under the judgment of the House of Lords, the decisions in question seem to be entirely in conformity with my opinion. If a testator leaves a legacy out of his own proper estate, and at the same time appoints to a fund under a power, and superadds words of limitation applicable to both, these may fail as regards the sum appointed, but they must receive effect as regards the legacy.

The question, therefore, is, whether the defender is bound to clear off these debts, or is entitled to keep them up; and that depends entirely on whether Sir John M'Donald, who was absolute proprietor of these lands, has validly expressed his intention that the defender in accepting this gift of the lands should take them under the burden of this obligation.

This intention can only be gathered by reading these two instruments in combination; and so reading them, while I am strongly impressed with the difficulties suggested by your Lordships, I cannot persuade myself that there is any doubt at all of what Sir John M'Donald intended. He, beyond all question, meant that his heir should pay off these debts, and should not keep them up against the estate. It is, I think, of no moment that the special manner in which payment was to be made, neither was, nor was intended to be, imperative, nor that in order to enable his heir to pay these debts he and his wife allotted to the heir an equivalent from his mother's estate. He was quite entitled both to impose the obligation and to give the means of discharging it; and in construing this mortis causa gift effect must be given to the avowed intention of the granters, even although the words in which it is expressed are the same as those which failed to limit the appointment. It is here, no doubt, that the apparent difficulty arises. The words which express the intention are used with reference to a special mode of giving it effect, which the granters could not enforce. But this does not touch the substance of the settlement, which did not limit this obligation to the use of the special fund. No doubt the obligation was only laid on the eldest son, because he only had funds out of which he could fulfil it. But the intention that he should clear off these debts and not keep them up, when he took £25,000 under the appointment, is plain enough.

The conclusion at which I should have been inclined to arrive, had the summons been framed for that purpose, would have been to have found that the defender is bound to pay off these debts, not in respect of his taking the £25,000 under the appointment, but in terms of the manifest intention of the granters of the entail. The conclusions for irritating the right of the defender are in any view untenable, and from these the defender ought to be assoilzied.

Vicennial Prescription of Retours—Stat. 1617, c. 13—Fraud.—An action of reduction of a retoured decree of service was brought after the lapse of five and six years, upon the allegation that the person served was not the true heir. The summons also contained vague allegations to the effect that the service had been obtained by fraud, perjury, and subornation of perjury. The defenders called were singular successors in the property taken up by the service. Including minorities, the full period of the long prescription had not elapsed. Held that the action was barred by the vicennial prescription of retours.

Observations on the vicennial prescription of retours.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Young.
R.

IN May 1819 Patrick or Peter Burd obtained a decree of general service as nearest and lawful heir of his deceased brother, Thomas Burd, before the bailies of Aberdeen, which decree was duly retoured to Chancery.

Thomas Burd was vested with a personal right to a share of heritable subjects in Peterhead, under a charter granted by the superiors of the subjects.

By disposition and assignation, dated October 1820, Patrick Burd sold and disposed the subjects which had belonged to his brother to one Kilgour, and assigned to him the charter above mentioned, with the precept of sasine therein contained, which was then unexecuted, and also the general service in his favour, in virtue of which Kilgour was infeft, conform to instrument of sasine also dated and recorded the same month of October 1820.

From Kilgour the property passed by various transmissions, some of them being by public sale, to the defenders of the present action, which was raised in December 1875 by Mrs Jessie Burd or Rocca, who alleged herself to be the granddaughter and heir of Thomas Burd before mentioned. The summons concluded for reduction of the decree of service in favour of Patrick Burd, and the disposition and sasine in favour of Kilgour. The defenders were called upon to make over the subjects to the pursuer.

The pursuer averred that Patrick Burd was not the nearest heir of his rother Thomas, who, on the contrary, had left lawful issue, his eldest son, also called Thomas, being Mrs Rocca's father; that Patrick Burd knew quite well that his brother had left issue, and that the service in his favour was obtained by fraud, perjury, and subornation of perjury; that Kilgour when he purchased the subjects knew that the seller had no good title, and that it was a matter of notoriety that the pursuer's father was a nearer heir than Patrick Burd. The pursuer stated that her father was born in 1802, and she herself was born in 1851, and was his only surviving child. No. 10.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, being the nearest lawful heir of one or more of the parties favoured by the last settlement of John Burd, is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses, in the event of expense being caused. (2) The defenders having no right to the share of the properties libelled, which is claimed by the pursuer, ought to be decreed to cede possession in her favour. (3) The defenders' pleas of prescription are inapplicable, because of the minorities of the pursuer and her father falling to be deducted from the forty years. (4) The pretended service and retour of 1819 being wholly null or invalid, cannot be set up by any prescription.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The action is excluded in respect of both the positive and negative prescription, or one or other of them. (3) The action is barred by the Act 1617, c. 13, establishing the vicennial prescriptions of retours.

On 8th March 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustains the third plea in law for the defenders: Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses,” &c.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The vicennial prescription was a plea personal to the person served.¹ (2) A decree of service procured by perjury was no better than a forged decree of service. It was a nullity which no lapse of time could validate.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) In the case of heritable property purchased bona fide on the faith of the records the fraud of the author could not injure his successor.² (2) It was now settled law that the vicennial prescription could be pleaded by a successor of the person served.³ (3) The action was excluded by mora and taciturnity. (4) In any view the allegations of fraud were far too vague to be admitted to probation.*

* In the course of the debate the pursuer tendered a minute of amendment with the view of making her averments more specific, in which it was stated that the only witness examined in support of Patrick Burd's claim of service was a woman of abandoned character, selected solely because she was ready and willing to commit perjury, who swore that Thomas Burd died unmarried, which was false, and known by her to be false; that she was suborned by Patrick Burd to commit perjury, and did commit perjury. Particulars in regard to Thomas Burd's marriage were given, and an extract of the proclamation of banns produced. It was further stated that Patrick Burd had seen the pursuer's father

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case, so far as it is necessary to resume them for the purpose of this advising, are these : On 22d May 1819 a person of the name of Patrick Burd was served nearest and lawful heir of Thomas Burd, the grandfather of the pursuer. The service took place before the bailies of Aberdeen. The ancestor had right to certain heritable subjects in the town of Peterhead. The right to these subjects appears to have stood upon an unexecuted precept of sasine in the person of the ancestor. In 1820 Patrick Burd sold the subjects to one Kilgour, and assigned to him the unexecuted precept of sasine. Kilgour made up titles to the subjects, and they have come down by several transmissions to the defenders in this case.

The object of this action is to reduce and set aside the defenders' title, on the ground that, although fifty-six years have expired since the service was expedited by Patrick Burd that person was not the true heir of Thomas Burd. One of the pleas stated in defence is the vicennial prescription of retour, established by the Act 1617, c. 13. The Lord Ordinary has sustained that plea. For my own part I should not have required the aid of that statute in arriving at the conclusion that this action cannot be maintained. Looking to the nature of the challenge, and the facts as they appear upon the record, I think that it is not the question for the pursuer to raise any such issue as she now attempts to do. The plea of mora and taciturnity is a perfectly good plea against a claim of this kind, unless circumstances are specifically stated, accounting for and ~~excusing~~ the silence and delay. In this case the father of the pursuer lived for thirty years after the date of the service, in the full knowledge, if the pursuer's statement be true, that the lands, which ought to have been his, were in possession of another. It is not said that he was out of the country. Moreover it is averred by the pursuer that it was a matter of notoriety that her father was nearer heir than Patrick Burd. If so, the pursuer's father must have known the true state of matters. The taciturnity of that man and of the pursuer, who now claims through him, is quite a sufficient answer to her challenge of the truth of what was found by the inquest on the service. Still less can allegations of perjury and subornation of perjury be entertained, where for upwards of fifty years no charge has been made either against the witness or the man by whom the witness is said to have been suborned.

I think that the considerations which I have stated are sufficient for the decision of the case. The Lord Ordinary has, however, sustained the plea of the vicennial prescription, and I am prepared to affirm that judgment. The facts of the present case give great strength to the plea. If the vicennial prescription was intended to protect singular successors purchasing on the faith of the records one can scarcely imagine a case to which that prescription would be more applicable than the present. I admit that, notwithstanding the two cases in his brother Thomas' house, and had been told that he was his son, and that "at the time of the service it was perfectly well known in Peterhead that Thomas Burd did not die unmarried, and that Peter Burd was not his heir. That was perfectly well known to Patrick Kilgour, the purchaser of the property, and to every subsequent purchaser of the property, or at least such purchasers and their agents knew that Peter's title to part of the property was disputed. They had all due notice of the pursuer's claim, or of her father's claim. In consequence of the doubtful character of the title the property nevertheless sold at its true value."

uries and a-half which have elapsed since the date of the statute, the subject of No. 10. he vicennial prescription is still in a somewhat misty state. If it were not for the authority of the cases of Neilson v. Cochrane¹ and Campbell v. Campbell,¹ Nov. 2, 1876. I should say that the operation and limits of the vicennial prescription are by no means clear. Sir George Mackenzie, who lived comparatively near the date of the Act, says, in his Observations on the Act 1617, c. 13, that it was intended in favour of singular successors. But in a notandum he retracts this statement, and remarks that what he said in general concerning singular successors was only meant of singular successors acquiring rights before that Act. But what raises the greatest difficulty on the subject are the dicta of the Judges in the Bargany case, who are all but unanimous in saying that the privilege conferred by the Act 1617, c. 13, is personal to the heir served. The point was not directly decided, because the retour in that case bore on the face of it that the person served was not the true heir. Then, however, came the subsequent case of Neilson v. Cochrane, in which very little seems to have been said on the opinions in the Bargany case,¹ and very little on the fact that in the case of Neilson the heir served was dead at the date of the challenge. Still the case of Neilson v. Cochrane is a direct authority for holding that the vicennial prescription can be pleaded by a singular successor of the heir served, and the point seems to have been assumed by the Court as a matter of course in the subsequent case of Campbell v. Campbell. Looking to these authorities, I am prepared to hold in the present case that a singular successor may plead the vicennial prescription after the death of his author.

It is said, however, that the service was radically bad, in respect that it was obtained by fraud. Questions of considerable subtlety might have arisen if there had been a relevant and sufficient allegation of fraud. For I am not sure whether in that case the defenders could say that their title as singular successors excludes the action. A general service establishes propinquity, and although part of the property which belonged to the ancestor has been transferred to a singular successor, that will not prevent the true heir from reducing the service of the false heir. In that case it might be contended that the title of the singular successor is annulled, not on the ground of fraud, but because it flows a non domino. But I do not think that these questions arise in the present case, because the allegations of fraud and subornation of perjury are far too vague to be admitted to probation.

I think, therefore, that this action cannot be maintained, and that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the amendment for the pursuer, No. 71 of process, allow the same to be received, and also the certificates from the Register of Marriages and Births, Nos. 72 and 73 of process, and having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for Mrs Jessie Rocca and husband against Lord Young's interlocutor of 8th March 1876, refuse said note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of, with additional expenses," &c.

Executor—Confirmation of Mother—Next of Kin—Moveable Succession Act, 1855, 18 Vict. c. 23.—Held that the interest conferred by the Moveable Succession Act, 1855, upon a mother in the succession of her deceased child entitled her to be confirmed executrix qua mother in the absence of others having a preferable title.

Executor—Joint appointment.—There is no incompetency in the confirmation of two persons as joint executors though claiming the office in different characters.

1ST DIVISION.
Commissary of Renfrew.
M.

IN this case the petitioner, Mrs Sarah Turnbull or Muir, applied to the Commissary of Renfrew to be decerned "executrix-dative qua next of kin" to her deceased son, Alexander Muir.

In respect that another petition had been presented by Mrs Jessie Reid or Muir, widow of the deceased, for confirmation qua relict, the Commissary appointed intimation to her of the mother's petition.

A minute was thereafter lodged by the widow and mother agreeing to an appointment as joint executrices.

The Commissary-depute (Cowan), on 27th April 1876, in Mrs Sarah Turnbull or Muir's petition, found in law that "a mother is not one of the next of kin of her children, and that the petitioner is therefore not entitled to be decerned executrix-dative qua one of the next of kin, as craved," and therefore dismissed the petition.

The petitioner appealed to the Commissary (Fraser), who, on 10th May 1876, dismissed the appeal.*

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session, and argued—Under the Moveable Succession Act, 18 Vict. c. 23, the mother, failing the next of kin, who in this case did not seek confirmation, was entitled to be decerned executrix. If her character was misdescribed in the petition that was not sufficient ground for dismissing it,¹ but an amendment should have been allowed. There was no valid objection to a joint appointment.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Commissary-depute has found in law "that a mother is not one of the next of kin of her children, and that the petitioner is therefore not entitled to be decerned executrix-dative qua one of the next of kin, as craved," and he therefore dismissed the petition. The Commissary on appeal adhered to the interlocutor, and on the same grounds.

I am not disposed to differ from the Commissaries in holding that a mother is not one of the next of kin of her children in a certain sense of the term. In the law of moveable succession next of kin is a technical term expressing a certain degree of relationship, and in that sense certainly a mother is not one of the next of kin of her children.

But I think that the Commissaries have dealt too strictly in dismissing this

* "NOTE.—A mother is clearly not one of the next of kin, and it is a misapprehension of the Act 18 Vict. cap. 23, to suppose that it made any change upon the common law in this respect. It provided certain remedies for admitted grievances, by giving a right to the succession in personal estate to persons who by the common law would have had no such right; but this privilege did not import them into the class of next of kin. The objects and scope of the Act are well explained in the case of Turner v. Cooper, 27th Nov. 1869, 8 Macph. p. 222."

tion. If the petitioner was entitled to be confirmed qua mother they might have allowed the petition to be amended, and have then confirmed her as executrix qua mother. It has been stated to us that the next of kin do not desire to be confirmed, and the only other party in the field is the relict. A minute was signed by the petitioner and the relict craving a joint appointment. But the commissary-depute seems to have doubted the competency even of a joint appointment in different characters.

Now, I am of opinion (1) that the mother of a deceased may in the absence of the next of kin be confirmed executrix-dative qua mother in consequence of the interest conferred upon her by the Moveable Succession Act, 1855; and (2) that it is conformable to well recognised practice that two parties, each of whom might be confirmed separately, should be confirmed jointly, though in different characters. The reason is that interest in the succession is the general ground of confirmation. No doubt the element of relationship enters into the question also, and other parties having a better title will exclude such a claim as that of a mother. But there is no reason why the principle, that, in the absence of the next of kin, a party having a beneficial interest in the succession may be confirmed should not apply to the case of a mother as well as to that of a widow or a creditor. An interest in the succession has been created in the mother by the Moveable Succession Act. It differs from other interests in the succession in that it is of a more restricted nature. But it is sufficient to entitle her to be confirmed in the absence of any one having a preferable right.

I think therefore that the course we should adopt is to send this petition back to the Sheriff, with a direction to him to allow the petition to be amended, and to proceed therein as shall be just.

LORD DEAR.—It is said in the sacred writings that the parent provides for the children, and not the children for the parent. How far this text may have influenced the law of Scotland in preferring collaterals to parents it is unnecessary to inquire. Other passages, however, in the sacred volume recognise, in general terms, the duties between parents and children as reciprocal. I am disposed to think that the recent amendments of the law, making the right of succession in personal estate to some extent reciprocal, are more in accordance with the law of nature than the law as it stood before the Act. Be this as it may, however, the fact that the law as it formerly stood excluded the father and mother from all interest in the succession was probably the reason why the nearest collateral relations were commonly called the next of kin, although they really are not in any proper sense nearer of kin than the father and mother. At all events the exclusion of the father and mother from all interest in the personal succession appears to me to have been the reason why they could not be confirmed, for I agree with your Lordship that interest in the succession is a material thing to look to in such a question. The appointment of executors-dative is within the ordinary commissary jurisdiction, to be exercised according to circumstances, although with due regard to practice. The present practice seems to have originated in the instructions given in 1666 by the archbishops and bishops to the Commissaries, and the officers of the Commissary Court.¹ Among “the orders to be observed in confirmation of all testaments” there is the following:—“If there be no nomination or testament made by the defunct, or if the testament-testamentar shall not be desired to be confirmed, ye shall confirm the nearest of kin desiring to be confirmed; and if the nearest of kin shall not desire to be confirmed, ye shall confirm such of the creditors as desire to be confirmed as creditors, they instructing their debts; and if neither nearest of kin, executor, or creditor, shall desire to be confirmed, ye shall confirm the legators such of them as desire to be confirmed, and instruct that they are legators. And if no person having interest foresaid shall confirm, ye shall confirm your procurator-fiscal, datives always being duly given thereto before; and if after the said datives (but before confirmation) any person having interest shall desire to be surrogat in place of the procurator-fiscal, ye shall confirm them as executors surrogate in place of the procurator-fiscal." In giving these directions the archbishops and bishops were rather supposed to be encroaching on the province of the Court, and accordingly to give the directions undoubted authority, and at same time to preserve the judicial power intact, the injunctions were ordered to be recorded in the Books of Council and Session, "under protestation always that the recording of the said injunctions should be no ways prejudicial to the privileges of the Lords of Session, or derogate in any sort from their jurisdiction in civil causes."¹ These instructions, which were acted upon, seem obviously to recognise that under certain circumstances any person having an interest in the succession may be confirmed.

The only distinction made was that if there were various applicants they should be confirmed in a certain order. There was no distinction or difference in the validity of the decerniture and confirmation if actually made. From the terms of the instructions it was at one time contended that none but those specially mentioned were to be confirmed. But this was settled to the contrary in the authoritative case of Crawford, June 10, 1755, M. 3818, where the general disponees came forward and claimed the office, and in a competition between them and the next of kin the Court preferred the general disponees.

Thus the only reason why the father and mother were not confirmed under the former practice obviously was the want of interest in the succession, and this anomaly having been removed by the Act of 1855, no reason remains for any longer excluding them from the office.

It is apparent on the face of this petition that the petitioner is the mother. The only room for doubt therefore was whether she was entitled to be confirmed as one of the nearest of kin. If this had been done I think it would not have invalidated the appointment. It is no great stretch to say that a mother is one of the next of kin of her children. But all question would have been avoided by allowing an amendment of the prayer of the inferior Court petition, and simply confirming her executrix qua mother, and I see no objection whatever to this still being done.

I think it right to add that I can see no sufficient objection to the confirmation of two persons either in the same character or in different characters. Inconvenience may sometimes result in the management of the executry estate, but there is no incompetency in the appointment.

It is right also to add that the appointment of an executor-creditor is hardly a proper analogy, as that rests directly on the statute 1695, c. 41, and the appointment of a judicial factor is regulated by Act of Sederunt. But these analogies are not necessary to justify the result.

Bankruptcy—Agent—Sale.—An agent employed by the trustee in a sequestration became the purchaser of a decree for payment belonging to the bankrupt estate, which he assigned to a third party. The assignee having charged upon the decree, the debtor presented a note of suspension, on the ground that the sale by the trustee was null, the purchaser being the agent employed in the sequestration. Suspension refused.

Noble v. Campbell.

THIS was a suspension of a charge served by Ann Noble or Campbell and others on Alexander Noble, shipmaster, Fraserburgh, for the sum of £19, 14s 9½d, decerned for in an action instituted by Charles L. Forrest, trustee on the sequestrated estate of William Y. Gray. The suspender alleged that Forrest assigned without value the debt and diligence in question to Robert Anderson, writer in Fraserburgh, who transferred it to John Proctor, who transferred it to the respondents.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note.

The complainer reclaimed, and at the bar was allowed to add to his statement with reference to the assignation to Anderson being without value the allegation that Anderson was then the agent in Gray's sequestration.

The complainer argued ;—The assignation by Forrest to Anderson was invalid, because it was a purchase by the law-agent in the sequestration of property belonging to the sequestrated estate. The sale was ultra vires of the trustee, and was null. Anderson therefore could not give any right to his assignee.¹

The respondents argued ;—If the sale was illegal, it could only be rescinded by the creditors of the bankrupt estate. Until it was challenged by the creditors it was a valid sale.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The grounds of suspension maintained before the Lord Ordinary have not been argued to us, and the only objection now amounts to this that the chargers have no title, because the sale by Gray's trustee to Anderson was a nullity, and no right could be thereby transmitted to any one, and none therefore to the chargers. I think that contention is supported entirely upon the argument that Anderson was disqualified from purchasing because he was the agent in the sequestration. Now, there is no statutory nullity which so disentitles him. Indeed, an agent is not an officer in bankruptcy proceedings, and is not so recognised. An "agent in a sequestration" is a misnomer. The party so termed is nothing more or less than the law-agent of the trustee, and there is nothing beyond a common law relationship between them. Therefore,

I assume that this sale might be reducible at the instance of creditors; but it is just as clear that if not so reduced it is perfectly good, not only by express confirmation, but by silence signifying acquiescence. There is no ground here for suggesting that any one connected with the estate offers any objection. That being so, I think the title of the chargers good, and that we must refuse the note.

Proof—Witness—Divorce—Criminating Question—Statute 37 and 38 V. c. 64 (Evidence Further Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1874), sec. 2.—Section 2 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1874, enacts that “no witness shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to shew that he or she has been guilty of adultery.” Held that it is the duty of the Judge to prevent such questions being put to the witness, so as to save him from the necessity of declining to answer, unless he volunteers to answer or make a statement; and when such a question has been put, and the witness has declined to answer, neither the question nor the declinature of the witness can be recorded in the notes of evidence.

1ST DIVISION.
 Ld. Craighill.

IN the course of a proof in an undefended action of divorce by Archibald Cook, miner, Thornton, against his wife, Margaret Leslie or Cook, on the ground of adultery, the following point arose under section 2* of the Evidence Further Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1874, and was verbally reported to the First Division by the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship stated that the defender had been examined, and admitted that she was married to the pursuer in 1872, and five months after the marriage had separated from him, and had never seen him again until the day of the proof, and that she gave birth to a child on 30th May 1876. In the pursuer's condescendence it was stated that John Mackie was the father of the child, and on being examined as a witness he admitted that he was on intimate terms with the defender. The pursuer's counsel proposed to ask him whether he had carnal intercourse with the defender in July 1875, at a place which was specified in the condescendence. The question had not been recorded, and the witness being asked by the Lord Ordinary whether he objected to answer, replied that he did. The counsel for the pursuer thereupon asked the Lord Ordinary to record the question and the declinature of the witness to answer in the notes of evidence, and referred to the case of Kirkwood v. Kirkwood, Dec. 9, 1875, ante, vol. iii. p. 235.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion that the object of the statute plainly is that a witness shall not be put in the position of refusing to answer, and therefore it enacts that he shall not be liable to be asked such a question as that which has been put. In these circumstances, if the question is put it is the duty of the Judge to object, and to allow nothing to be taken down

* Section 2 enacts that “no witness shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to shew that he or she has been guilty of adultery.”

If the witness volunteers to answer the question or to make a statement he must of course be allowed to do so, and what he says may be recorded. The protection afforded by the statute extends this length, that it is not to be allowed that a witness shall be obliged even to decline to answer such a question as that about which we have been consulted by the Lord Ordinary.

Harbour—Right of Harbour Trustees to Maintain a continuous Quay Wall.
—Circumstances in which, in virtue of possession upon an ancient grant of harbour, and upon the terms of local Acts, statutory harbour trustees were held entitled to construct and maintain a continuous line of quay wall along a harbour, and to prevent the proprietor of an adjoining shipbuilding yard from having a launching slip or opening through the quay wall into the harbour.

Observations (per Lord Ormisdale and Lord Gifford) on the rights conveyed by a grant of harbour.

ALEXANDER WEIR was the owner of a shipbuilding yard upon the north side of the river Ayr, at some distance below the bridge of Ayr.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
R.

Two openings communicated with the river by which vessels could be admitted to a dry dock and a patent slip on Weir's premises. The openings were respectively thirty-six and thirty-five feet broad, with a tongue of land nineteen feet in breadth between them. This frontage to the river, extending to ninety feet, was in the centre of operations which the Ayr Harbour Trustees were executing for the benefit of the harbour, and there being a deficiency of berthage accommodation in the harbour a question arose between them and Weir as to his right to maintain these openings.

The present action was raised in April 1875 by the Ayr Harbour Trustees against Weir, to have it declared that they had "right to construct and maintain a continuous river or quay wall along the north side of the harbour of Ayr, and also to make and maintain a quay or roadway by or along the top of said river or quay wall sufficient and suitable for all uses and purposes connected with the said harbour," and that the defender had "no right or title to form or maintain a dock or launching slip or other opening in or through the said river or quay wall along the north side of the harbour of Ayr, or otherwise to interfere with the said wall, or with the quay or roadway by or along the top of said wall." The summons also concluded for interdict against the defender "using the said dock, launching slip, or other opening in the said wall, except with the consent or under the authority of the pursuers." There were other conclusions which were not insisted in.

The defender's title to the property belonging to him was a disposition by James Scott in his favour, dated 31st May 1871. Scott obtained his title to the subjects by a feu-disposition, dated three days before, from the magistrates of Newton-upon-Ayr. The property conveyed was specially described and stated to be bounded by "the public road running along the north quay," but at the end of the special description these words were added,—“Together with the buildings and other erections thereon, pertinents thereof, and whole rights and privileges thereto belonging, including any right of property, servitude, or other right which may belong to us and to the said community of freemen in and to the ground, buildings, and erections situated between the harbour of Ayr and the patent slip and dry dock shewn on said plan."

The defender maintained that the ground to which these words referred belonged to the burgh of Newton, and now to him, unburdened by any right in favour of the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, of which the result was shortly as follows:—The burghs of Ayr and Newton-upon-Ayr were created by crown-charters of very ancient date, the lands granted to Ayr being on the south side of the river, and those granted to Newton being on the north side of the river. In 1400 King Robert III. granted the burgh of Ayr (which was originally created by William the Lion) a charter "cum portu burgi supra dicti," and the grant of "free port" or "port and harberie," was renewed by subsequent royal charters.

No right of port or harbour was ever given to the burgh of Newton-upon-Ayr.

By an Act of Parliament passed in 1772 the administration of the harbour, which down to that date had been under the management of the town-council of Ayr, was placed in trustees, who represented the burgh of Newton as well as that of Ayr. The trustees were empowered "to raise, repair, and make sufficient, or cause to be raised, repaired, and made sufficient, the dykes, piers, quays, and other works, at present belonging to the said harbour of Ayr; and to alter and extend the same, or any part thereof." The Act, however, did not transfer to the trustees any right of property in the harbour buildings and works.

Acts were passed from time to time for the improvement of the harbour, and alterations made in the constitution of the trust.

By the Ayr Harbour Act, 1835, sec. 13, the property in all the lands, heritages, piers, quays, walks, and ways built or established under the previous Acts or otherwise was declared to be vested in the trustees.

Another Act was obtained in 1855 to continue and amend the Act of 1835, which expired in twenty-one years, and the Act of 1855 contained a similar vesting clause.

The 40th section of the Act of 1855, which substantially repeated a similar clause (sec. 17) in the Act of 1835, was as follows:—"That it shall be lawful for the trustees, and they are hereby authorised to deepen, cleanse, scour, and preserve the said harbour of Ayr, and to heighten, repair, and make sufficient the quays and other works at present appertaining to the said harbour, and to alter and extend the same, or any part thereof, as they shall judge to be necessary for the more effectual improvement of the said harbour, and for scouring and cleansing the bed and channel of the river of Ayr, in, through, and from the said harbour of the bay of Ayr, and also to make, widen, and maintain roads and passages on both sides of the said harbour for the use thereof."

It was proved that from an early date to the present time the harbour of Ayr extended throughout the river so far as navigable, including the north as well as the south side. A series of minutes of the town-council of Ayr from 1596 to 1771 was produced, in which frequent reference was made to the north side of the river as forming part of the harbour, and to the existence of a dyke along the north side of the river, which was repaired from time to time by the burgh of Ayr as part of the harbour works.

The shipbuilding yard now belonging to the defender was formed on ground belonging to the burgh of Newton in the early part of the 17th century. In 1814 permission was given by the harbour trustees to the nants of the yard to make a temporary opening for launching, and the emission was repeated from time to time. The present openings had existed in a permanent form from about the year 1840, but the minutes of the harbour trust and the correspondence engrossed therein shewed that the trustees claimed the right to shut the openings when they should sink fit, and that this right was recognised by the tenants of the yard.

 From the beginning of this century at least a road had existed running along the north quay, and which was carried over the openings in question by bridges.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and grants interdict against the defender as concluded for: Quoad ultra *seco*lizes the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns; but finds him liable to the pursuers in expenses since the date of the interlocutor of 6th January last, by which a proof was allowed."*

* Note.—(After a narrative of the facts, of which an abstract has been given)—"In this state of the facts, and as there has been no hostile or counter possession on the part of the defender's predecessors in the property, I am of opinion that the pursuers have established their alleged right of property in the ground in dispute, including the harbour roadway, which I think forms the north boundary of the defender's property. This being so, the pursuers are, in my opinion, entitled to make and maintain the continuous quay wall proposed, and the defender has no right to have the openings which he desires left for fishing purposes.

"I am farther of opinion that even if the defender's right in the quay wall and harbour ways along the north bank of the river were not a right of property in the ground itself, they would still be entitled to succeed in this action, for the reason that they are entitled to make and maintain the quay walls that are necessary for the harbour traffic on the north as well as on the south side of the river. In the case of a port or harbour of large extent, including, it may be, several miles in the course of a river of considerable breadth, it would be difficult for the proprietor of the harbour to maintain that he was entitled to put up quays for the landing and shipment of goods at any part of the properties adjoining the river he might think fit. But in the present case the whole extent of the river which is navigable is small, the traffic is and has always been of immense to both burghs situated on its banks, and the banks on both sides have been used and possessed for harbour purposes as a necessary adjunct or pertinent to the harbour for time immemorial. Holding that the north bank fronting the defender's property is within the limits of the harbour, and keeping in view the entire absence of any possession on which the defender could found as an exercise either of a right asserted by his predecessors or acknowledged by the harbour trustees, to make or maintain openings in the river bank for launching purposes, I am of opinion that in any view the defender holds his property subject to the burden of submitting to the erection of such quays and walls as may be necessary for harbour purposes; and I think the harbour trustees, in the exercise of their powers, are the judges of what is necessary for that purpose.—Craig, i. 15, 15, and opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Magistrates St Monance v. Mackie, March 5, 1845, 7 D. 586. The right of harbour, which imposes duties and obligations on the proprietor, must, I think, in such a case as this, carry with it the right to use the banks for the loading and shipment of goods, and, if necessary, the right to erect walls, not only as a protection to the harbour, but as quays for the accommodation of the traffic. The erection of walls may be absolutely necessary for the protection of the harbour, from the river, and the grant of harbour implies a power to erect such works at least within the limits of the port. It is only a reasonable extension of the same principle, that the power of making the banks available for loading and unloading purposes should be held as included in the grant."

Argued for the defender;—A grant of port or harbour was an incorporeal right. It gave a monopoly for levying dues; and it also gave a right of using the shore for the purpose of loading and unloading goods, provided always that the part of the shore so used was accessible from the land without going through enclosed private property. If the grantees of the harbour required ground for the extension of the harbour or for the erection of quays or docks, he must purchase it. An incorporeal right like that of harbour could not be converted by possession into a right of feudal property. Possession might be of use to explain the grant, but if a grant of harbour never carried any land, possession of land upon a mere grant of harbour was possession sine titulo, and could not prescribe a right of property.¹ The charters in favour of the burgh of Ayr were bounding charters, all the lands conveyed being on the south of the river, so that the burgh could not acquire by prescription lands to the north of the river. Further, any possession which the harbour authorities had in this case could be ascribed to their right of user, and it was a well established principle that if the possession could be ascribed to some lower right than that of property such possession would not prescribe a right of property.² The possession alleged by the pursuers consisted in the repair of a rough wall on part of the north side of the river the purpose of which was evidently to keep the river in its course. It was built on ground belonging to the burgh of Newton, and therefore belonged to that burgh as proprietors of the ground. The acts of possession chiefly relied on by the pursuers were moreover on the part of the statutory trustees, who were not vested with the rights conveyed in the charters,³ and whose possession therefore could not interpret the charters. There never was a time when the slips in question were required in launching that they were not so used. The possession of the ground hitherto had by the harbour authorities had been consistent with the use of the premises for the purpose of building and launching ships. Because the owner of the shipbuilding yard had submitted to an unessential interference it did not follow that he was bound to submit to an interference which would render his property useless for the purpose to which it was put. The permission asked by some of the tenants could not affect the rights of the proprietors, the burgh of Newton, or their successor, the defender.

The pursuers founded on immemorial possession by themselves and their predecessors following upon the ancient charters in favour of the burgh, and fortified by the Ayr Harbour Acts, and upon the absence of any counter possession, except by express license.

No. 14.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The able argument which we have heard in this case has diverged into many important general questions both of law and of antiquarian history. But that on which the decision, in my opinion, turns is entirely free of the more difficult topics which have been raised, and the question will be found to be solved substantially by the terms of the statutes under which the Ayr Harbour Trustees act. Nov. 7, 1876.
Ayr Harbour
Trustees v.
Weir.

The only question in controversy is raised in the first two declaratory conclusions of the summons. The first of these is, that the harbour trustees have under their statutes right to maintain a quay wall along the Newton or north side of the river of Ayr, and that the defender has no right to cut through this quay wall by his slip. The second is, that the pursuers are entitled to maintain a roadway on and along the quay wall.

In support of their contention the pursuers have thought it necessary to found upon the ancient charter of the burgh and port of Ayr, and to contend, as the Lord Ordinary has found, that in virtue of this grant they were entitled to occupy land for harbour purposes on each side of the river without any farther title. The question thus raised is a very large one, and attended, in my opinion, with great difficulty, but I think it wholly unnecessary to determine it in deciding this case.

It is an entire fallacy to suppose that this case arises between the grantees of the port of Ayr and the burgh of Newton. It is true that the pursuers have all the rights of the grantees of the port, but they have also all the rights of the burgh of Newton, and represent the communities on both sides of the river, excepting in so far as private individual rights, or adverse prescriptive possession can be instructed. Now, these harbour trustees by a series of statutes extending for nearly a hundred years have express right given them by the Legislature to perform the very operations the right to construct and maintain which is the subject of this declarator. In particular, by the Act of 1835, section 17, they are expressly authorised to construct and maintain quays and roads on both sides of the river; and in the more recent Act of 1855 this power is given still more in detail in the following words, sec. 40:—"To lighten, repair, and make sufficient the quays and other works at present appertaining to the said harbour, and to alter and extend the same, or any part thereof, as they shall judge to be necessary for the more effectual improvement of the said harbour, &c.; and also to make, widen, and maintain roads and passages on both sides of the said harbour for the use thereof." For the purpose therefore of establishing their right to maintain quays and roads on both sides of the river Ayr the historical inquiry and the legal argument founded upon it are quite unnecessary, and do nothing to strengthen the express statutory right, which, looking to the ground assumed by the defender, is, to my mind, perfectly conclusive.

No doubt, although the title of the trustees to occupy and maintain these works for the public interest is conclusively given by the statutes, I can conceive a difficult question arising had there been contrary prescriptive possession on the part of the defender. But, in the first place, he has no title on which he could prescribe, for his own feu is admittedly outside the disputed ground. He says that he has all right which the burgh of Newton possessed in the river bank. But these rights, so far as available for harbour purposes, are truly transferred to

No. 14.

Ayr Harbour
Trustees v.
Weir.

and held by the harbour trustees, acting for or representing the burgh of Newton as well as the port of Ayr. But, in the second place, there has been no prescriptive possession. This ground has been used from time immemorial as a quay wall, and the acts of the defender and his predecessors proceeded on an express license from the pursuers, which they were entitled at any time to recall.

On these simple grounds I am prepared to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMDALE.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, although not disposed to give the same effect to the Acts of Parliament as I understand your Lordships are of opinion they are entitled to. I do not think that independently of right duly and legally established by prescriptive possession under habile titles the statutory enactments would by themselves have been sufficient to support the pursuers' claims in the present action. To illustrate my meaning, let it be supposed that there had been an encroachment by the harbour authorities on private property the year before they obtained their Act of 1835, I can see nothing in that Act or any of the others which would give them a right to retain property so acquired. But it is unnecessary to go into that question because it appears to me that there is ample evidence of legal possession and title, independently of the Acts of Parliament to support the pursuers in what they now claim, although certainly the statutes are important as clearing up and confirming what might otherwise be attended with some doubt and obscurity.

In the first place, there is a grant of harbour conferred by the pursuers' ancient charters. What precisely was meant, especially as regards limits and extent, to be given by the grant of harbour in these charters is not very precisely defined. But clearly such a grant must be held to include a right to land for the purpose of loading and unloading vessels at some place or places within the bounds of the harbour, which, again, may be defined or limited by possession. The next question, therefore, is, what has been the state of possession in the present instance? I can have no doubt upon the evidence (which I have gone over and considered with great attention) that the old dyke extending along the north side of this harbour has been in the possession of the harbour authorities for centuries, or, at any rate, time immemorial; and farther, that that old dyke, if not in all respects identical with the present quay, occupied the same line of ground or nearly so. This of itself goes far, if not completely, to establish the pursuers' right, especially where it is kept in view that there has never been any grant of harbour in favour of the burgh of barony of Newton. It is said, however, that that burgh had certain property of which the south boundary was the sea or river Ayr, just where the disputed quay exists. I am unable, however, to find any express reference to any such sea or river boundary in the defender's titles. But supposing that the burgh of Newton had originally such a boundary they must, I think, be held on the proof to have lost it by the counter possession of the harbour authorities. It does not appear to me to be doubtful that the harbour authorities could acquire by immemorial possession, and as pertinent or accessories to their right of harbour, a quay, and road along the quay, there being no counter possession, for I cannot hold the nominal and precarious possession, which some of the Newton feuars or tenants had by the tolerance of the harbour authorities and on the undertaking to surrender it whenever required.

any available possession at all in the present dispute. Irrespective, therefore, of the statutes I think there are good grounds, on the evidence, of possession under a habile title, for holding that the pursuers have established their case in terms of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 14.
Nov. 7, 1876.
Ayr Harbour
Trustees v.
Weir.

I may add that at first I had some difficulty as to the terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, no precise limit to the right claimed being here stated, but I understand that what is really claimed is a frontage of ninety feet in length of the old quay wall, so that in this view I have now no difficulty in giving effect to the pursuers' claim to the quay and roadway in question, "sufficient,"—and this is a very important qualification,—“and suitable for all uses and purposes connected with the said harbour.” And, if I am right in this, the pursuers are entitled to have effect given to the subordinate conclusions of their summons as a matter of course.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion.

The first question which arises in this case is, whether the town of Ayr, as grantee of the right of harbour in the river of Ayr, had and has a good and sufficient title to prescribe a right of quay and roadway on the north side of the river Ayr? I think they had. The right given to the town of Ayr, and now vested in the harbour commissioners, was not a right of harbour extending, as such rights sometimes do, over a large extent of sea adjoining an estate or barony, and with an extensive and often somewhat vague coast line, and entitling the grantee to levy dues on all ships coming within the limits specified. On the contrary it was a specific grant of the port and harbour of Ayr, being the mouth of the river Ayr, limited on north and south by the natural banks or shores of that river, and probably originally both banks of the river at its mouth were simply parts of the natural foreshore, the river being for some way up a tidal river. Now, I am of opinion that a grant of this kind forms a good and sufficient title on which to prescribe a right to construct wharfs or quays and roadways on both sides of the river constituting the harbour proper. It is implied in a grant of harbour that the grantee shall be entitled to fence the harbour by proper fences, such as walls or quays, at least such a grant is a good title on which to prescribe such a right. Indeed, I think it evident that the old wall on the north side of the harbour (for there is no question about the walls and quays on the south side) was at first erected on the proper foreshore. In the old minutes of the town-council occur such expressions, relating to the old north wall, as “the dyke is not sufficient to keep the water in its course.” To confine a tidal river within limits it is necessary to build on the foreshore, for if the building were above high-water mark it could never in the proper sense of the words be said to confine the water at all, and although there is no direct evidence as to how far the foreshores extended at the date of the grant, I think there are sufficient grounds for presuming (especially after such long possession) that the quays and roadways on both sides of the harbour were really built on the solum of the foreshore if not in the very alveus itself. I do not doubt that a grant of harbour is sufficient to give the grantees a right to build on such a solum. But further, this quay wall was built before the memory of man, and is shewn to have been possessed from time immemorial, as far as susceptible of possession, as a pertinent of the harbour, and the question is, to whom does it belong? I think the answer must be, to the town of Ayr. They built it. It never belonged to Newton-on-Ayr. Further, the town of Ayr were in possession of a stripe of ground behind the quay, on which ballast was laid down, so that, as was quite natural if not absolutely necessary, the town of Ayr, as proprietors of the harbour, had a stripe of ground on either side thereof. Then come the statutes which give the harbour trustees all the rights originally vested in the town of Ayr. Accordingly, I think that the property of the dyke was in the town of Ayr, and is now in the harbour trustees.

Trustees v.
Weir.

The next question is, how broad a space are the trustees entitled to? That too must be determined by possession, and I am of opinion that possession on the town of Ayr, and of the harbour trustees as their successors, has been proved for the full breadth of the quay and roadway in dispute. The very fact that the properties to the south are fenced off from and bounded by the south side of the roadway affords strong presumptive proof that the roadway is their northern boundary, and there is no contrary evidence whatever.

So much for the right of property in the solum of the north quay and roadway. The next question is an extremely important one. It is this, have proprietors or persons holding property behind or to the south of the quay and roadway a right to cut through the quay wall so as to give them access to the harbour and river by means of launching slips or otherwise? Now, this may be a question of circumstances. A vague right of harbour and port extending over many miles of coast may not entitle the harbour trustees to prevent anyone with property adjoining or bounded by the sea or sea-shore, from having access to the sea, and from launching ships therein, or from landing or embarking at pleasure, and reaching the sea. But this is not a mere grant of free access embracing a great extent of coast and including the foreshores of, it may be, many proprietors along many miles of coast where it could never have been intended to exclude the proprietors having a sea boundary from the sea. The present case is that of a grant of a harbour proper, where ships are to lie, and around which permanent quays and costly structural works are to be erected, and in such a case I do not think that a back proprietor can cut through quays and harbour walls and claim a right to launch ships directly into what is strictly and properly a harbour. I do not say that if any such proprietor adjoining the harbour had done so for the prescriptive period, he might not have prescribed a right to do it. But here everything done by the proprietors of this shipbuilding yard was by express leave and license of the harbour trustees or of their predecessors. There has therefore been no possession adverse to that of the harbour trustees. I think, therefore, that in the special circumstances of this case, as instructed by the evidence, and considering the very limited character of this harbour, the possession had by the trustees and their predecessors, and the absence of any adverse possession by the defender, we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it right to observe that this is not a declaration of property in any proper sense. The pursuers ask us to find and declare—(reads declaratory conclusions of summons). Beyond that the pursuers do not ask us to declare that any right of property is vested in them.

 Millar v.
 Birrell.

Husband and Wife—Mutual Settlement—Jus Mariti—Legitim—Testing-Clause—Executor—Personal and Transmissible.—A and his wife caused a mutual settlement to be prepared disposing of their whole estates after their deaths. The deed was duly signed by A before witnesses; but although his wife signed it, she did not do so, nor acknowledge her signature, before witnesses. The deed contained a declaration that the provision for their daughter B was to be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of her husband. After the death of A, his widow and three children, including B (whose husband had deserted her), entered into a minute of agreement, whereby, on the narrative that the testing-clause of the settlement had not been filled up, they agreed to hold that the estate was intestate succession, and proceeded to divide it among themselves. The husband of B was no party to this agreement, nor, though he afterwards returned and lived with his wife for a short time, did he either approve of or challenge it. After the death of the mother and of B's husband A's executor became bankrupt. B's son, as executor to his father, claimed in the sequestration one-third of his grandfather's estate, as the share ab intestato due to his mother, which had passed juri mariti into the estate of his father. In an appeal against the rulings of the trustee and Sheriff-substitute, who rejected the claim, the Court allowed the trustee to complete the testing-clause of the mutual settlement, and thereafter held (1) (diss. Lord Ormisdale) that the mutual settlement, as completed, was valid and effectual as a testamentary settlement of the means and estate of the father; (2) that by the terms of the settlement the jus mariti and right of administration of B's husband had been effectually excluded; and (3) (diss. Lord Ormisdale) that when B's right to legitim emerged on the death of her father the same did not vest in her husband ipso jure, and that whether he could have claimed it effectually or not his executor was not entitled to claim it.

Husband and Wife—Right of Administration—Executor—Legitim.—Opinions, in conformity with Stevenson v. Hamilton, Dec. 7, 1838, that in the above circumstances the husband would not have been entitled to claim his wife's legitim.

Writ—Testing-Clause—Deed produced in Judgment.—Where a deed with an incomplete testing-clause was produced in a process by one of the parties who did not found upon it, held that the opposite party was entitled to have the testing-clause completed and effect given to the deed in the process.

Succession—Mutual Settlement.—A deed bearing to be a mutual settlement by a husband and wife contained a conveyance by the husband of his whole estate in favour of his wife in liferent and his children in fee, and a corresponding conveyance by the wife of her estate in favour of her husband and children. The deed was signed by the husband before witnesses, and by the wife, but not before witnesses. Held (diss. Lord Ormisdale) that it was effectual as a testamentary settlement of the husband's estate.

or Martin, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispose to and in favour of the said William Martin in life, for his life, for his life only, and after his death to and in favour of" their children "equally amongst them in fee," her whole means and estate: "But declaring that these presents, so far as in favour of the said Janet Martin or Millar, are granted exclusive of the jus mariti of the said James Millar, her husband, and that the property and effects, heritable and moveable, shall not be affected by his debts or deeds, legal or voluntary, nor by the diligence of his creditors, and that the same shall belong to and be used by her and payable to her without the intervention of her said husband in any way whatsoever."

Mr Martin signed this settlement before witnesses in the office of his agent; but although Mrs Martin signed it also, she did not do so before witnesses, nor did she ever acknowledge her signature before witnesses.

After Mr Martin's death, his widow and three children, Thomas, William, and Janet (whose husband had left her without making any provision for her, and was then resident in Australia), entered on 9th February 1869 into an agreement whereby, upon the narrative that the settlement above referred to, "although executed, not having the testing-clause filled up, the parties hereto have agreed to disregard the same, and to act as if the said deceased William Martin had died intestate," they agreed to divide the estate left by the deceased in certain proportions among themselves.

William Martin junior was confirmed executor-dative to his deceased father, and proceeded to administer the estate in accordance with the provisions of the agreement of 9th February 1869.

James Millar, the husband of Janet Martin, about the year 1872, returned to Scotland, and resided with his wife for some weeks, and then again left her. He lived for about three years in his native country, but did not contribute to his wife's support, and eventually died on 11th February 1875, survived by his widow and five children. He was ignorant of the existence of the agreement above referred to, but he took no steps in connection therewith. His son, Thomas Millar, was duly deemed executor-dative to him.

Mrs Martin, the widow of William Martin, died in 1874, and in 1876 William Martin junior became bankrupt, and Alexander Birrell was appointed trustee on his sequestrated estates.

Thomas Millar, as executor-dative of his father, James Millar, lodged a claim in William Martin junior's sequestration, in which he claimed to be ranked as a creditor for the sum of £193, 4s. 10d. as the share of the moveable estate of William Martin senior which fell to his mother, Mrs Millar, as intestate succession, and as such passed under the jus mariti of his deceased father, James Millar, to whom he was confirmed as executor-dative.

The trustee, Mr Birrell, rejected this claim on these two grounds—(1) that the agreement of 9th February 1869 was a binding agreement, and was acted on in good faith by all parties; and (2) that under the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861,¹ as Mrs Millar was, at the time she executed the agreement, living apart from her husband, who was not contributing to her maintenance, she was entitled to enter into the arrangement without her husband's consent.

Millar appealed, and a record was made up, in which the appellant pleaded;—(1) The sum claimed to be ranked having fallen under the jus mariti of the said deceased James Millar, and never having been paid or compensated, the appellant, who is now in right of the same as executordative foresaid, is entitled to have his appeal sustained, and said sum ranked as claimed, with expenses. (2) The foresaid agreement not having been entered into by the said deceased James Millar, or by any one legally representing him, is no bar to the appellant's claim. (3) The foresaid agreement having been entered into by Mrs Janet Martin or Millar at the time she was a married woman, without consent of her husband, and dealing as it does with funds which did not belong to her, but to her husband, in virtue of his jus mariti, the same is null and void, and no bar to the appellant's claim. Millar v.

Birrell.

The trustee pleaded ;—(1) Assuming that the deceased William Martin died intestate, and that the family agreement produced had not existed, or that it does not bar the appellant's claim, still the claim is erroneous, inasmuch as it contains no deduction for payments made by the executor out of the deceased's executry. (2) Assuming, again, as in preceding plea, the claim is erroneous—1, inasmuch as it contains no averment that the said James Millar had ever exercised his jus mariti in reference to the fund claimed by the appellant, and, in terms of the Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 1861, made a reasonable provision therefrom for Mrs Millar's support and maintenance, and contains no deduction in respect of such a provision, which did not fall within the executry of James Millar; and, 2, inasmuch as, upon the death of the said James Millar, Mrs Millar would, out of the fund claimed by the appellant, be entitled to a jus relitæ, and no corresponding deduction is made in the claim,—(3) The family agreement produced was validly and legally entered into by the said Mrs Millar, she and her husband living as they were at the time separately; and her position as a party thereto is fortified by the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 1861, especially inasmuch as the said James Millar never made provision for her support from any fund to which she succeeded by the death of her father. (4) The deceased James Millar never repudiated the said agreement to which his wife was a party; and that being so, it must be held to have been homologated or acquiesced in by him. (5) The said James Millar never put forward any claim of the nature of the one made by the appellant; and that being so, he must be presumed to have passed from it. (6) The family agreement produced excludes the appellant's claim, the more especially so, inasmuch as it was duly implemented by the bankrupt, and Mrs Millar, upon the death of her mother, received her quota under it.

The Sheriff-substitute (Beatson Bell) allowed parties a proof of their averments, in the course of which the facts, as stated above, were established. Upon the call of the trustee, the appellant, Millar, by the hands of his agent, produced the settlement by Mr Martin senior and his wife, but in an incomplete state, the testing-clause not having been filled up. In his evidence Millar deposed that he had got the settlement from his grandfather, William Martin, who, he said, "distinctly said he did not wish it completed."

On 20th June 1876 this interlocutor was pronounced :—"The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties' procurators on the appeal, minutes held as a closed record, and proof led, Finds in point of fact (1) that the appellant is executor-dative of his father, James Millar, formerly farmer, who died at Annfield, Auchterderran, on 11th February 1875, survived by his widow, Janet Martin or Millar, sister of the bankrupt William Martin, who was the son of William Martin senior, formerly farmer, Kirkcubotts, who died there on 5th February 1869; (2) that at the date of the death of the said William Martin senior the said James Millar, the appellant's father, was absent from this country, being in Australia or elsewhere abroad, where he resided for many years apart from his wife (who had remained in this country), and never remitted any funds for her maintenance; (3) that after the death of the said William Martin senior the mutual disposition and settlement, No. 35 of process, was found, but the same not having been completed by the filling up of the testing-clause, an agreement, No. 8 of process, was entered into by his widow and children, including the bankrupt and Mrs Millar, by which they agreed to deal with his estate as intestate, and regulated the manner in which it should be divided by the bankrupt, who undertook to get himself appointed executor, but to this deed the appellant's father was not a consenting party; (4) that the bankrupt accordingly got himself decerned and confirmed executor to his father, and intromitted with and managed the estate, and although some questions arose as to whether the agreement was being duly carried out, no challenge of the agreement was ever made by any of the parties thereto on the ground that the appellant's father was not a consenter thereto; (5) that about three years before his death the appellant's father returned to this country, and for some time resided with his wife, and was aware of the existence of the agreement, but never took any steps to vindicate his right to the share of the deceased William Martin's estate which had vested in his wife as one of the next of kin and beneficiaries ab intestato of the deceased, and which would have fallen under his jus mariti: Finds in point of law (1) that the succession of the late William Martin senior was rightly dealt with as intestate; but (2) that the appellant's father having lived for three years or thereby after returning to this country, and having become aware of the existence of the agreement, and having taken no steps to vindicate his jus mariti in the share of the estate which would have fallen to his wife ab intestato, his son and executor, the appellant, is now barred from insisting in his father's jus mariti over said share: Therefore sustains the decision of the trustee appealed from, refuses the appeal, and decerns: Finds the appellant liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—As to the first question debated, whether William Martin senior died testate or intestate, I am of opinion that the mutual settlement, No. 35, not having any testing-clause, cannot be held as a testamentary deed, and having been produced in Court cannot now be completed—(Hill v. Arthur, 6th December 1870, 9 Macph. 223). The effect of this intestacy, then, was to vest a share of the estate of the defunct in Mrs Millar, his daughter. The appellant contends that this fell under his father's jus mariti, and that he, as his executor-de-facto, is now entitled to rank for it against the estate of the bankrupt, the executor of the defunct, his father, William Martin senior. But for the circumstances which occurred after the death of William Martin senior this would have been so; but I am humbly of opinion that these circumstances were such as to bar the appellant from insisting in his claim. The agreement, No. 8 of process, no doubt required the consent of Mr Millar to its validity as regards him, and had he died without coming to the knowledge of his wife's succession to a share of her father's estate his son and executor might probably have succeeded in vindicating his father's rights. But he came home three years before his death; he lived for a time with his wife, and he had business conversations with his son, the appellant. No doubt the appellant says he did not inform him of the nature of the agreement, but he also says that within a week of his return he informed his father that such an agreement was made, and that it was not worth the paper it was written on. Of course, from want of his consent, that was a distinct incitement to the father, who does not appear to have been in such circumstances as readily to give up his rights to assert his claims, and he lived a time amply sufficient for the purpose of such assertion, but he took no steps. His wife also says she thinks he was aware of the agreement, but never called it in question in any way. Some speculation as to the reasons for his silence was addressed to me during the debate. The incomplete mutual deed excluded

Millar appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

No. 15.

At the hearing on 15th July 1876 counsel for the trustee moved the Court for leave to fill up and complete the testing-clause of the mutual settlement by William Martin and his wife. The following interlocutor was pronounced :—" On the motion of the respondent, and before answer, allow him to borrow from the process the mutual settlement, No. 32 of process, in order that he may, if so advised, complete or fill in the testing-clause thereof, reserving all questions as to the competency of so doing, and all questions as to the effect thereof or of the said mutual settlement."

Millar v.
Birrell.

When the case was again called on 20th July counsel for the trustee stated that the testing-clause had been filled up as regarded William Martin senior's signature, but as the deceased Mrs Martin had neither signed in the presence of, nor acknowledged her signature before witnesses, it was impossible to fill it up with reference to her signature.

Argued for the appellant, Millar ;—(1) The mutual settlement of William Martin senior and his wife was wholly invalid owing to its not having been properly executed. It was a mutual settlement only formally executed by one of the parties, and was therefore not binding upon either. It was moreover, at the date of Mr Martin's death, an undelivered deed. In the case of Macmillan,¹ where a deed in a somewhat similar position had been sustained, the deed had been holograph of the party whose succession it was held to rule. The succession of William Martin was therefore intestate succession. (2) That being so, Mrs Millar had no right during the lifetime of her husband to enter into the agreement disposing of her father's succession without her husband's consent. No married woman could waive her legal rights without her husband's consent. Mr Martin having died intestate his daughter's claim for legitime passed under the jus mariti of her husband, and on his death transmitted to the appellant, his executor-dative. Taciturnity or delay in making a claim for legal rights of this sort did not operate against the claim.² Apparent acquiescence did not affect it.³ The Conjugal Rights Act, sec. 16, which was relied on by the trustee and the Sheriff-substitute, had no bearing on this question as between the executor of the husband and the debtor.

Argued for the trustee, Birrell ;—The Sheriff-substitute was clearly wrong in supposing that the mutual settlement had been produced "in his jus mariti, and had he challenged the agreement it might still have been completed, as it had not then been produced in judgment. Again, under sec. 16 of the Conjugal Rights Act he would have been bound to make a provision for his wife's maintenance from the sum to which she had succeeded, and the whole to which she so succeeded would have been insufficient for her maintenance. He, soon after returning, again separated from his wife, and made her no allowance, apparently not being in a position to do so. The reason which really actuated him must be matter of speculation only, but his failure to act during all these years is a fact which, I think, under the circumstances, amounts to homologation of the agreement on his part. It is unnecessary to consider whether he himself might at the close of life have attempted a challenge ; but I am clear that, having died without doing so, the right to such challenge did not pass to his executor-dative, but that he is barred by the fact of his father having died after three years' acquiescence in the state of things he found in existence on his return to this country."

judgment in the sense of the decision of the Court in Hill v. Arthur.¹ It was moreover quite competent to fill up a deed after the death of the granter.² (2) The mutual settlement must therefore be held to be operative to a certain extent, that is, so far as regarded Mr Martin's provisions to his children.³ (3) Mrs Millar's right to anything from her father's estate was exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and the appellant's claim as executor of the husband was excluded. (4) Apart from that, a husband or his representative were not entitled to exercise the wife's choice as to claiming legal rights. Wherever the claim would be against the wife's interests he could not interfere.⁴

LORD GIFFORD.—This case is now in a somewhat different position from that in which it stood when the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against was pronounced. The testing-clause of the deed or settlement, No. 35 of process, has now been filled up under the authority of the interlocutor of this Court dated 15th July last, and the deed is now ex facie a completed deed so far as regards the late William Martin. All questions regarding the competency or effect of filling up the testing-clause and all questions as to the deed itself, and, in particular, all questions arising from the signature of Mrs Martin not being attested, are left open under the said interlocutor of 15th July, and these questions are now to be determined so far as necessary for the disposal of the present appeal.

The appeal arises in reference to the sequestration of the estates of William Martin, the son and executor-dative of the said deceased William Martin, the granter of the settlement which I have just referred to, and the appellant's claim in the sequestration, the validity of which claim is now in question, is a claim by the appellant as executor of his father, the late James Millar, who was husband of Mrs Janet Martin or Millar, the daughter of the said deceased William Martin. His demand is for a share of the moveable succession of the said deceased William Martin, who died in February 1869, as the appellant maintains, intestate. The appellant claims the share of the intestate succession which he says devolved upon his mother, and through her jure mariti upon the appellant's father.

Now, the first point which arises is, as the case now stands, Did the appellant's grandfather, the late William Martin, die intestate or not? Is the deed, No. 35 of process, the testing-clause of which has now been filled up, a valid and effectual testament by the said deceased William Martin? The Sheriff-substitute held that the late William Martin did die intestate, the deed No. 35 being without a testing-clause when it was before the Sheriff-substitute. His Lordship also held that the deed thus imperfect having been produced in the Sheriff Court process, that is, in the appeal against the trustee's deliverance in the sequestration, the testing-clause could not thereafter be filled up.

Now, I am clearly of opinion that the production of the deed in the Sheriff Court appeal formed no bar to the testing-clause being thereafter filled up in common form, and that the general rule applies that a testing-clause which is always or almost always filled up after execution, may be filled up at any time he trustee or by any party founding or claiming thereon, or having an interest Millar v.

 o claim thereon as a completed deed. It was not produced by any beneficiary Birrell.
 nder the deed, or by any legatee or party favoured thereby. It was produced n 7th June 1876 by the appellant himself, or, rather, by the agent to whom he appellant had handed it for the purpose the night before, and it then stood without a testing-clause. The appellant says that he found it in his safe in an envelope, unopened, and he states elsewhere that he got it from his grandfather, the late William Martin, the granter of the deed. No doubt he also says that his grandfather said he did not wish the deed completed, but I cannot take that off the appellant's hands. It is his mere unsupported verbal statement, and would enable the appellant to set up the deed or not just as he pleased by his unsupported parole. If a testator does not wish his written settlement to stand he should say so in writing, or actually cancel the deed with his own hands. I take the deed, therefore, just as if it had been found in the repositories of the deceased William Martin, and I take it to be perfectly clear that it was not in the power of the appellant, Thomas Millar, by incidentally producing the deed in the Sheriff Court appeal long after the deliverance of the trustee, to prevent the testing-clause being filled up by any party who had an interest to get this done. Even if the deed had been produced incomplete by a legatee or beneficiary, who actually founded upon it, this would not prevent other legatees or other beneficiaries who had not founded upon it from insisting that it be duly and regularly completed in common form. But the appellant had an interest to destroy the deed or to render it invalid, for he was maintaining that his grandfather had died intestate, and it would be monstrous to hold that by producing the deed without the testing-clause being filled up, or by keeping the deed back, or in any other way he could at his own hand render it inoperative. I need not go into the cases on this point; it is too clear for argument. I am of opinion, therefore, that it was competent to fill up the testing-clause, and that this has now been well and competently done.

The next question is this,—Is the deed, No. 35 of process, as it now stands, a valid and effectual settlement of the late William Martin? I am of opinion that it is. No doubt it was originally intended as a mutual settlement between the late William Martin and his spouse, Mrs Janet Greig or Martin. It is in point of form such a mutual settlement, and, in point of fact, it bears to be signed by both the spouses, although, unfortunately, Mrs Martin does not appear to have signed in presence of witnesses, and so her subscription is not duly attested. At the same time it is worth noticing that in the deed of agreement to which the wife is a party it is stated that the deed was executed, although the parties had agreed to disregard it. Now, if this had been a question between the spouses, or between the husband or his representatives, as against the wife or her representatives, the objection might have been fatal.
 The deed as a mutual deed is certainly not complete. But the deed or mutual settlement is more than a mutual settlement. It is besides a separate settlement by each of the spouses mortis causa of their respective estates, to take effect after the death of both of them, and, as such, I think it must receive effect, as William Martin's mortis causa settlement, because it is quite complete as to him, although in reference to Mrs Martin it is incomplete, her signature not being attested. By the deed the late William Martin first makes a liferent provision in favour of his wife, should she survive him, and then, "after her death," he gives the whole of his estate to his three children, Thomas Martin, Janet Martin or Millar, and William Martin, equally among them. In this manner Mrs Martin gives her husband the liferent of all her estate, and then, after her husband's death, and by way of mortis causa provision only, she gives the fee of her estate to the same three children equally. Now, this is a complex deed. It is, first, of the nature of a mutual settlement, or it may be a mutual contract between husband and wife, and so far it may be inoperative because it was never duly completed by both parties; but then it also embodies a separate testament by the husband to take effect after his wife's death, and with which she has nothing to do; and the deed being fully and regularly completed by William Martin, I do not see any reason why his regular separate testament should not receive effect. Both spouses are now dead, and I think equity clearly requires that the written and expressed will of the late William Martin to take effect after his wife's death should now be carried out. I think this is not only in accordance with equity, but also with authority. In Macmillan v. Macmillan, 28th November 1850, 13 D. 187, it was expressly held that a mutual will, holograph of the husband but not attested, and not holograph of the wife, was valid as the husband's will, though it would be totally ineffectual as to the wife's succession. On the whole, I have not much difficulty in holding that the deed, No. 35 of process, though probably invalid as a mutual settlement as between the late William Martin and his wife, if she had disputed it, and if any such question had arisen, is perfectly valid, and must receive effect read as a mere mortis causa settlement of the late William Martin to take effect after the death, both of himself and of his spouse.

Now, what does this mortis causa settlement of the late William Martin really do? No doubt it gives one-third of his estate to his daughter, Mrs Janet Martin or Millar, the appellant's mother, and this third, in the ordinary case, and if there had been no specialty, would have passed jure mariti so far as moveable, to her husband, the late James Millar, the appellant's father. But then William Martin's settlement contains this very important clause,—“*Expressly declaring that these presents, so far as in favour of the said Janet Martin or Millar, are granted exclusive of the jus mariti of the said James Millar, her husband, and that the property and effects, heritable and moveable, shall not be affected by his debts or deeds, legal or voluntary, nor by the diligence of his creditors, and that the same shall belong to and be used by her and payable to her without the intervention of her said husband in any way whatsoever.*” Now, this effectually excludes the appellant's father, James Millar, from any interest whatever in William Martin's succession. His jus mariti and right of administration as husband of Janet Martin or Millar are effectually excluded. The property bequeathed is left to Mrs Millar by herself alone, and her husband could not interfere with it in any way. If so, neither can the appellant, as executor of his father, the late James Millar, make any claim to any share of William Martin's succession. He has nothing to do with it. It belongs to her mother, who is still alive, and who is a witness in the present proof, and it belongs to her alone in her own right.

It follows, therefore, that the appellant's claim in the sequestration was rightly rejected by the trustee in the sequestration, and that the trustee's deliverance was rightly affirmed by the Sheriff-substitute, although I reach this result on different grounds from those on which the trustee and the Sheriff-substitute proceeded. No. 15.

For, in the view which I take of the case, it is not necessary to consider the validity or effect of the deed of agreement entered into by the members of William Martin's family for the distribution of his estate. I would have had difficulty in holding that that agreement was binding upon the appellant or upon the appellant's father, who was no party thereto, and who is not shewn to have been ever fully cognisant of its terms. I would also have had a difficulty in founding anything on the Conjugal Rights Act, as protecting the rights of the appellant's mother, Mrs Millar, who is not a party to the present process or a claimant in the sequestration at all. But I think all these questions are quite superseded by the view of the case based upon the validity of William Martin's settlement; and if I am right in holding that this deed utterly excludes the appellant and destroys his title to claim in the sequestration, that is, destroys the only title upon which he founds in his affidavit, it follows that his claim must be rejected and disallowed.

Nov. 8, 1876.

Millar v.

Birrell.

If I am right in holding that the appellant, and his father, in whose right he now claims, are entirely excluded from all share of the late William Martin's succession by the terms of Mr Martin's will, which, although intended to be a mutual will between him and his wife, is nevertheless effectual as regulating his own succession, the only other possible plea open to the appellant is that, repudiating the will and the conventional provisions therein made in favour of Mrs Millar, he can, as representing his father, claim her legitim free from the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration.

Now, in the first place, I greatly doubt whether such claim of legitim could be insisted in under the present affidavit. The affidavit makes no mention of legitim. It is simply a claim for share of succession ab intestato by one of the next of kin. Even if it were a summons, I doubt whether the one claim could be converted into the other, for the claims rest upon wholly different grounds and different principles, and they give rise to different defences and objections, such as collation inter liberos, and similar pleas. The case is not bettered by its being an affidavit in a sequestration, where, without an amending affidavit, the trustee can deal with nothing but what is sworn to.

But, even if the claim for legitim were open in the present appeal, I think it is excluded. A husband has no absolute right to repudiate his wife's conventional provisions, and claim her legitim. It is always a question of circumstances, and where a wife's father has made large provisions for his daughter, but excluded her husband's jus mariti, the husband has no absolute right to renounce or to compel his wife to renounce these large provisions in order that he may claim and get into his own pocket for himself or for his creditors a comparatively small, or at least a much smaller amount of legitim. This was quite fixed in the case of Stevenson v. Hamilton, Dec. 7, 1838, 1 D. 181.

In the present case, even if the appellant's father were alive, and was claiming legitim in right of his wife, I do not think he would be allowed to do so.
Such a claim would reduce the wife's provisions to one-third of what they would otherwise be, for Mrs Millar's legitim would only be one-ninth of her father's executry, whereas her share under his will is one-third. I do not think her husband could compel her to take the smaller amount merely to get quit of the exclusion of the jus mariti. This would be plainly inadmissible. Still farther, it is in evidence that the appellant's father was abroad, and had left his wife unprovided for for at least three years. I think the wife, Mrs Millar, was entitled, without her husband's consent, to take up her father's succession, and to deal with it as she did in the deed of agreement, and I think that deed of agreement did not require her absent husband's consent. And yet again the appellant's father, the late Mr Millar, never himself claimed legitim in right of his wife. He returned to this country, and survived for some years, without making any such claim. The appellant now is in a very unfavourable position for making such a claim as in his place; and on these grounds, even if the claim for legitim were now open, I think it should be disallowed.

For these reasons I come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute, although, in consequence of the emergence of new circumstances, the grounds of judgment are quite different.

LORD NEAVES.—This is a case of some peculiarity, and requiring considerable attention. I concur in the opinion now delivered, and on the same grounds, with some, it may be, unimportant modifications, which, however, may strengthen the judgment.

The mutual deed in process was a deed in all respects complete except for the omission of the wife in not signing before witnesses, and the not filling up of the testing-clause. That the wife did sign the deed is apparent both from her signature being appended to the deed, and from the fact that the agreement, which she certainly signed before witnesses, bears that she had executed the mutual deed.

It was erroneously held in the Sheriff Court that because the deed was produced in judgment the testing-clause could not be afterwards filled up. There certainly is a rule that if a deed is produced in judgment it cannot afterwards be filled up, but that raises the question, what is production in judgment? Suppose an incomplete deed produced in a multiplepoinding, not to be founded on but for some collateral purpose, can that be said to be production in judgment? It may have been for comparatio litterarum to prove handwriting, or it may have been recovered under a diligence. If that is not production in judgment to the effect of preventing an incomplete deed from being filled up, still less can it be so where a party, who has an interest to set aside such a deed, produces it in a process possibly with the view of preventing its completion. I cannot, therefore, think that this deed was produced in judgment when it was produced as it was—no one founding upon it. If the law were otherwise it would just come to this that if a person to whom an uncompleted deed was adverse wished to nullify that deed he would only require to get hold of it and produce it in a process in order completely to avoid its effect.

This deed as it is now completed is undoubtedly a probative tested deed as regards Mr Martin senior, and as such must regulate the succession to his estate. That being so, the question comes to be, what is the effect of this deed as now filled up. It was originally a mutual deed, and I am not prepared to say that a mutual deed requires to be authenticated by both parties. The signature of one may be enough—especially in such a case as this when one signed before witnesses and the other signed also but unfortunately not before witnesses. I rather take it a mutual deed between landlord and tenant does not need the signature of both parties, provided there be an acknowledgment of its execution as there is here.

This, then, being a probative writ as regards Mr Martin senior, the result is that his daughter is to get a certain share of his estate, but only exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband. We have the authority of the case of Stevenson v. Hamilton for the proposition that the right to legitim, where there is in the impudicated deed a provision excluding the husband's jus mariti, does not vest in the husband ipso jure. The bequest of an option to a married woman, where one alternative would give the estate to herself and the other let it pass to her husband, was there held not to vest ipso jure. At all events the opinion of the Court must be taken about it. And the Court might refuse the husband any interest in the succession, at all, or at least qualify his interest in such a way as not to leave the wife at the mercy of a spendthrift husband. That, as I have said, was the principle established in the case of Stevenson v. Hamilton. Take the case here of the husband who had deserted his wife, who might have appeared after an interval and overturned all that had been done in his absence. The idea of his so doing is out of the question. But even if he had had the power when he died, who was to exercise it? Certainly not his executor. When he was alive whatever right he had was as his wife's curator—his son and executor can never be that. He cannot come and take ex bonis of his father what that father never claimed. This appellant, then, has no right to this fund at all. His father never exercised the option, if any, which is said to have belonged to him. The appellant, then, has no status and no title now to make that option, which it is doubtful whether he might have made but did not. That I take to be the equity of the case also, and so I concur with the opinion of Lord Gifford, and adhere to the proposed judgment.

No. 15.

Nov. 8, 1876.
Millar v. Birrell.

LORD ORMDALE.—I have been anxious to hear the views of some of my learned brothers, whose opinions I understood to be different from my own, before definitively adhering to the opinion I had myself, after much consideration, previously formed. I regret, however, that I am unable to concur in the opinions which have been delivered.

The dispute in this case relates to that portion of the estate or succession of William Martin senior, who died in February 1869, which fell to his daughter Janet, who was then the wife of James Millar, since deceased.

The appellant, as executor-dative of James Millar, claims right to the estate & funds so arising, in respect, as maintained by him, that it vested jure mariti in Janet Martin's husband, the said James Millar, and consequently now belongs to the appellant, as Millar's executor-dative. This claim is resisted by the respondent, the trustee on the sequestrated estate of William Martin junior, as executor-dative decerned to his father, William Martin senior, to whom he says the fund in dispute belongs in virtue of the alleged agreement, No. 8 of process, entered into by the children of William Martin senior, including his daughter Janet, after the death of her father,—her husband having deserted her and being then absent from the country. To this the appellant replies that no effect can be given to the alleged agreement, in respect that the daughter Janet could not by any act or deed of hers deal with a fund which on the death of her father had vested in her husband jure mariti, and now belongs to the appellant as his executor-dative. The appellant accordingly claimed to be ranked as a creditor for the fund on the sequestrated estate of William Martin junior.

The respondent, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of William Martin junior, pronounced a deliverance repelling the appellant's claim, and on an appeal to the Sheriff-substitute his deliverance was affirmed, "in respect that the appel-

No. 15. lant's father having lived for three years or thereby after returning to this country, and having become aware of the existence of the agreement, and having taken no steps to vindicate his jus mariti in the share of the estate which would have fallen to him ab intestato, his son and executor, the appellant, is now barred from insisting in his father's jus mariti over said share." And from the explanatory note to his judgment it appears that the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded on the assumption that the appellant's father had died intestate, and that the agreement on which the respondent relies had been so homologated and acquiesced in by the appellant's father as to bar him and the appellant, as now in his right from disregarding it.

Nov. 8, 1876.
Millar v.
Birrell.

But the case presents itself in a somewhat different aspect now from what it did when before the Sheriff-substitute. It is now said that William Martin senior did not die intestate, in respect the testing-clause of the deed, No. 35 in process, quoad his signature, has been filled up, and that, accordingly, the succession of William Martin senior must now be regarded as a testate and not an intestate one. In opposition, however, to this view it was argued that the deed having been produced in judgment in an improbativè condition, the filling up of its testing-clause thereafter could have no effect. The rule or principle of law on which this argument was founded is no doubt a sound one in itself when the facts admit of its operation, but I am quite clear they do not in this case. The deed was not produced in judgment, in any correct sense of that expression, by the respondent, who now founds upon it, before the testing-clause was filled up, and therefore I concur in holding that the testing-clause might, if there were materials for it, be still filled up.

But that is not sufficient to dispose of the case, for the question still remains whether the agreement by Janet and the other children of William Martin senior, excluding as it does the jus mariti and right of administration of Janet's husband, is good and effectual against the appellant, and this depends upon whether the Sheriff-substitute is right in holding that the appellant's father had barred himself by homologation or acquiescence from challenging it. The first question, therefore, which presents itself for the consideration and determination of the Court is, whether this ground of judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is sound or not? Now, I am quite unable to go along with the Sheriff-substitute in holding, on the proof, that the appellant's father acquiesced in or homologated the agreement. No act whatever of homologation is established; and neither can I discover any evidence of acquiescence. On the contrary, the proof clearly shews that the appellant's father never even saw the agreement, or knew what was its nature or effect. And neither is there any evidence of its having been represented to him as a good and binding deed, and that he ever adopted any such view of it. On the contrary, it would rather appear that it had been represented to and held by him as a worthless and unavailing deed. And if I am right in this, it is difficult to understand on what ground it can be held that the appellant's father, or the appellant himself, as now in right of his father, is barred from maintaining that the agreement is not effectual against him.

If, then, the alleged agreement is to be held, as I think it must, to be an ineffectual and inoperative deed against the appellant, the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against, as well as the preceding deliverance of the trustee, must be set aside. And if so, there must, I rather think, be an end to the present litigation.

But it was argued that, independently of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment.

the ground upon which it is founded, the case of the appellant is untenable, in respect that both the mutual settlement and the agreement, Nos. 8 and 35 of process, are valid and effectual deeds. With reference to the mutual settlement, the case of Macmillan v. Macmillan (28th November 1850, 13 D. 187) was cited in support of it; and on the strength of that case it was contended that the deed was sufficient, as it now stands, to carry at least the whole means and estate of the husband, William Martin. I would have been very willing to hold it to be so if I could, but I am not satisfied that I can. In Macmillan's case the ground of judgment was that the deed there was of the nature, not of contract at all, but simply of wills by husband and wife, just as if they had been separate and unconnected with each other. Here, however, we have a mutual disposition and settlement partaking so largely, as it appears to me, of the nature of contract, as to make it impossible to hold that one part of it, viz., that relating to the husband's estate, can be held to be operative and effectual independently of the other part, which relates to the wife's estate. In this view, and seeing that there are no witnesses to what is said to be the wife's signature, and that the testing-clause is not filled up, and admittedly cannot now be filled up in so far as the wife is concerned, I am not satisfied that the mutual settlement can be given any effect to at all. And this was plainly the view on which the parties appeared to have acted in entering into the agreement, which is the other deed founded on, for in that deed they expressly state that Martin senior had died intestate. And it is certainly to be regretted before coming to the conclusion that the mutual disposition and settlement is effectual, even as regards the husband's succession, an investigation had not been gone into of all the circumstances in which the deed had been left uncompleted not only during the husband's own life but for about seven years after his death.

Supposing, however, the settlement, No. 35 of process, is to be held as a good and effectual deed quoad Martin senior's own estate, I am unable to see how it can effect the legitim which fell to Janet Martin or Millar on the death of her father. Neither the father or mother, nor both together, could by any post-nuptial or testamentary settlement defeat a claim for legitim. This neither was nor could be disputed. But it was maintained on the authority of the case of Stevenson v. Hamilton (1 D. 181) that the legitim accruing to Janet Martin or Millar on the death of her father did not fall to and become vested in her husband. That case, however, does not appear to me to be in point. There it was merely held by a narrow majority of the Court that an insolvent husband and his creditors were not, in the special circumstances which there occurred, entitled to enforce his wife's legal claims to the effect of repudiating her father's settlement, which she had expressly ratified,—the repudiation being in the highest degree injurious to her and her children. But here, 1st, there was no settlement by the wife's father at all, supposing I am right in holding, on the grounds I have stated, that the settlement, No. 35 of process, is invalid; and at any rate, 2dly,—and this is the important point—there has been no ratification by the wife of her father's settlement, supposing the deed, No. 35 of process, to be an effectual one. On the contrary, the alleged agreement, No. 8 of process, which was executed by the wife, proceeds expressly on the narrative that the settlement, No. 35 of process, was not a valid or effectual deed, and, therefore, that her father must be held to have died intestate. It seems impossible, therefore, to hold that the principle of election which influenced so much the majority of the Judges in the case of Stevenson v. Hamilton has any place in the present case. That specialty therefore, as well as others, being wanting here, it appears to me that the present case cannot be treated as an exceptional one at all, as Stevenson v. Hamilton was, but must be held to be governed by the general rule which, as stated by Lord Jeffrey and acknowledged by all the Judges in that case, is undoubted law, that all moveable rights vested in a wife at the time of her marriage, or accruing to her during its subsistence, and as to which the jus mariti had not been effectually excluded, are necessarily carried to the husband by the assignment implied in marriage.

I regret, therefore, that in the circumstances, and for the reasons I have now stated, I feel myself obliged to hold that the Court ought to recall the Sheriff's substitute's judgment appealed against, and also the deliverance of the trustee and to remit to the trustee in the sequestration to reconsider the appellant's claim and to sustain the same in so far as he may find it to be sufficiently established. To the extent to which there was legitim fund or estate accruing to Janet Martin or Millar on the death of her father I am at present unable to see any sufficient answer to the appellant's claim.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have found this case attended with great difficulty and have not come to a conclusion without giving weight to the observations of Lord Ormidale. I concur, however, with Lord Gifford and Lord Neave with regard to the question of legitim the case is ruled by that of Stevenson v. Hamilton.

With regard to the deed, the matter is somewhat peculiar. The father of the appellant's mother signed it before witnesses, and has since died. His wife acknowledges in the subsequent deed of agreement that she also signed the mutual deed, and the objections there taken to the deed is that the testing-clause was not filled up. But the wife's signature really was appended to the mutual deed to the knowledge of her husband, and he was entitled to rely upon the signature, whether written before witnesses or not, as she could have afterwards acknowledged it before witnesses.

On the whole matter I concur with the majority of your Lordships that the mutual deed is an operative one.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find (1) that the deed No. of process, the testing-clause of which has now been filled up, is valid and effectual as a settlement of the personal means and estate of the deceased William Martin; (2) that by the terms of said deed the jus mariti and right of administration of Janet Millar, the husband of Janet Martin or Millar, is effectually excluded; and (3) that the present appellant is not entitled, as the right of his deceased father, either to claim legitim, as due to her mother, or to claim any share whatever of the succession of the said deceased William Martin: Find the respondent entitled to one-half of the taxed expenses in the Sheriff Court; and, with these variations, affirm the judgment appealed from, dismiss the appeal, and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses in this Court, except those relating to the first day's discussion, and remit," &c.

 Webster's Trustees v.
 Webster.

Succession—General Disposition—Special Destination.—A testator left a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, which should belong to him at the time of his death. Subsequent to the date of his settlement he purchased certain heritable subjects, and took the disposition in favour of himself and his assignees and disponees, whom failing, to his sister and her heirs and assignees whomsoever. Held that the subjects belonged to the sister as heir of provision, and were not carried to the trustees by the general disposition in their favour.

MR JAMES WEBSTER died in January 1875, possessed of considerable personal property, but his only heritable estate consisted of two subjects, which he had acquired in 1874, as after-mentioned. 2ND DIVISION.
R.

He left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 11th June 1864, and relative codicils, the last being dated April 1867, by which he conveyed to trustees All and Sundry lands and other heritable and real estate of every description, and wherever situated, as also the whole moveable estate which should belong to him at the time of his death. The trustees were directed at his death to pay £150 to each of his six brothers and sisters, including his sister Ann who lived with him; to pay over to his said sister the free income of the residue, and to allow her the use of his household furniture, plate, linen, &c., so long as she should remain unmarried; and in the event of her marriage, to pay her a further sum of £500 in addition to the £150 payable at his death, and her equal share of the residue; and upon her death or marriage, to convert the whole trust-estate into money, and pay over the proceeds equally among the testator's brothers and sisters, including Ann if she was alive.

In 1874 Mr Webster acquired the villa at Trinity village, Brechin, where he and his sister lived, for the sum of £500. By the disposition in his favour the sellers, "at the special request of the said James Webster, as evinced by his subscription to these presents," sold and disposed the subjects "to the said James Webster and his assignees and disponees, whom failing, to Ann Webster, also residing at Trinity village, sister of the said James Webster, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee."

Mr Webster also about the same time bought a small adjoining pendicle of land for £10, and took a disposition in similar terms.

One of the testator's brothers died in 1872. His other brothers and sisters survived him. His sister Ann was born in 1813, and had lived with him for thirty years prior to his death.

Miss Ann Webster claimed the heritable subjects as heir of provision to her brother under the dispositions in his favour.

His trustees, on the other hand, maintained that the heritable subjects were conveyed to them by virtue of the general conveyance contained in the trust-disposition and settlement.

The trustees and Miss Ann Webster presented a special case, in which the questions submitted to the Court were:—"1. Whether, in virtue of the general conveyance by the said James Webster in his trust-disposition and settlement, the subjects contained in the dispositions, . . . belong to the parties of the first part in trust, for the purposes mentioned in the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicils? or 2. Whether the said subjects contained in the two dispositions before-mentioned now belong to the said Miss Ann Webster, as heir of provision of the said James Webster, in virtue of the destinations therein contained?"

Argued for the trustees;—The destination of the heritable subjects was to "James Webster and his assignees and disponees," whom failing, &c. The assignees and disponees must be looked for in the trust-deed of 1864, otherwise this clause would be meaningless. The contention for the other side would involve this result, that if his sister Ann had predeceased him, the subjects would have been carried to her heirs (who might not have been his heirs) in preference to his own heirs. The substitution in favour of Miss Webster was perhaps inserted to meet the contingency of Mr Webster cancelling his trust-settlement and executing no other.

Argued for Miss Webster;—The case of Glendonwyn shewed that the onus of proving that the terms of a general disposition derogated from a prior special destination is upon the party supporting the general disposition.¹ In cases of this kind the difficulty generally arose from the conflict of the two maxims, "special derogates from general," and "posterior derogates from prior," but here the two principles concurred in favour of Miss Webster. The expression "assignees and disponees" could be satisfactorily explained as meaning assignees and disponees of the particular subjects. The construction adopted by the trustees rendered the substitution in favour of Miss Webster nugatory.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question arises between a general mortis causa conveyance by Mr Webster of his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes and a special destination of a subject purchased by him long afterwards contained in the disposition which he took from the seller. The question is, in the first place, which of these deeds is to rule, and, in the second place, whether there are any words in the special conveyance which indicate the intention of the testator that the subject should fall under the antecedent trust-disposition and settlement.

There are two legal presumptions which may arise in such cases, first, that a special conveyance derogates from a general conveyance, and, second, that a later deed derogates from a prior deed. In most of the cases upon this subject, such as those of Glendonwyn and Thoms,² the general conveyance was later than the special conveyance, and accordingly these two presumptions came into conflict. But here the two presumptions concur, for the special conveyance is the later, and therefore, prima facie, the later destination must rule.

But then it is said that as the special title is taken to "James Webster and his assignees and disponees," these terms must apply to his assignees and disponees under his general settlement. There is, however, another meaning which can be attached to the words which I have quoted, i.e., to James Webster and any one to whom he may convey the particular subject by subsequent assignment or disposition. The words will bear either construction. But there was no reason for taking the title, failing his assignees and disponees, to James Webster, if he intended it to fall under his general disposition, for a simple conveyance to himself would have had this effect. It has been suggested that and Mr Webster's signature to it, indicate that he had a specific object in view ; and I am satisfied that both the express words and the disclosed intention occur in shewing that the subject was not intended to fall under the general settlement, but was to go to his sister, failing any subsequent assignation or disposition of it by himself. Trustees v. Webster.

LORD NEAVES and LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—This is entirely a question as to the intention of the late James Webster. What did the late Mr Webster mean by the terms of his trust-deed and codicils of 1864 and 1865, and by the terms and destination in which he expressly took the two special dispositions of 1874, which special dispositions in testimony of his will and wish are subscribed by himself ?

Even although Mr Webster had not subscribed these two special deeds the question would not have been materially altered, because a purchaser who takes the disposition to himself in special terms, and with substitutions or destinations over, is held by acceptance of the deed to make it his own settlement of the subjects purchased.

In such cases the mode in which the question generally arises is, whether a substitution or special destination in the settlement of a particular subject is evacuated, destroyed, or altered by a subsequent general disposition and settlement of the testator's whole estate. In the present case the question arises differently and in a somewhat unusual form, for it is whether Mr Webster's general trust-deed and settlement of 1864 is innovated upon, or whether an exception thereto is created by the special conveyances which he took in 1874. In both cases, however, and indeed in all such cases, the true question is, Quid sit voluntas testatoris ?

Looking to the whole circumstances of the present case as disclosed in the deeds and in the special case for the parties, I am of opinion that the subjects contained in the two dispositions of 1874 belong to Miss Ann Webster and not to the trustees under the general settlement, and I think the questions put should be answered—the first in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

In getting at the intention of the late Mr Webster, from the deeds and circumstances before us, I begin by supposing, contrary to the fact, that the two special dispositions had been taken by Mr Webster first, and that then some years afterwards, at a greater or at a lesser interval, he had executed his general trust-disposition and settlement and codicils in the terms which are now before us. If this had been the case, would the general trust-disposition and settlement have evacuated the destinations in the special deeds and carried the subjects to Mr Webster's testamentary trustees for the general purposes of his settlement ?

Now, I think this would not be the effect of such a general settlement. I think the special settlement and destination effected by the dispositions to the villa at Trinity village and small piece of ground adjoining would not have been held to be superseded and destroyed by the mere general words in Mr

No. 16.

Trustees v.

Webster's universal settlement. General words in such a deed are always open to construction, if the intention of the testator can be gleaned, and I think the general rule is, that a special subject, precisely and definitely settled in a particular way, or in favour of a particular heir or substitute, is not affected by mere general words used by a testator in settling his whole means and estate. The subject specially settled is held not to have been in the testator's view unless the contrary can be shewn, and in general a special provision should be specially revoked. There are very numerous instances of the application of this rule, the latest and most authoritative of which, trenching to some extent upon cases which preceded it, is the case of Glendonwyn v. Gordon, as decided in the House of Lords 19th May 1873, Law Reps. 2 Scotch Appeals, 320. I do not think there is anything in the present case which, supposing the general trust-deed to have been last in date, would have indicated the testator's intention thereby of cutting down the previous special destinations.

Now, I think the case actually before us is more favourable for Miss Webster the special donee or substitute, than it would have been had the general disposition been latest in date. Posteriora derogant prioribus applies emphatically in such cases as the present—the latest expression of the testator's will receives effect even though it be contrary to preceding indications; and the latest will in the present case is expressed in the special dispositions.

Mr Webster made his general settlement in 1864, containing various provisions in favour of his sister, Miss Ann Webster, who was the only one of his sisters who resided with him. In 1874, having occasion to buy the villa a question for the occupation of himself and sister, he took the titles both of the villa and of the adjoining ground to himself and his assignees and donees, whom failing, to his sister, Ann Webster, in the terms of the deeds before us, both of which he specially subscribes in token of the destination being the expression of his will. Now, I cannot help holding that by these deeds Mr Webster intended to give his sister, Miss Ann Webster, an additional benefit in his succession. He surely meant something by inserting her name as the donee or substitute, and although undoubtedly he reserved full power of himself disposing of the subjects, I think he intended that, failing any subsequent disposal thereof by himself, it should go to his sister.

The contention for the trustees makes the special insertion of Miss Webster's name in the dispositions of 1874 absolutely meaningless unless the testator be supposed to have intended to destroy his general settlement and die intestate, and this seems to me to be a most unlikely supposition. Miss Webster is only to take, the trustees say, failing them, the general testamentary trustees. I cannot think that this was Mr Webster's intention. I feel certain that had he so intended he would have expressed himself very differently. No doubt a difficulty arises from the expression in the special deeds after Mr Webster's own name, "and his assignees and donees," for undoubtedly in one sense his testamentary trustees are his assignees and donees, but I think this is not the true meaning of the words. His "assignees and donees" mean, I think, special assignees or special donees in the special subject conveyed by the deed, and not mere general assignees in his general settlement. The intention was that, notwithstanding the destination of the villa to his sister, Mr Webster might sell or convey it to whom he pleased, but that failing such special sale or conveyance Miss Webster should inherit it. Mr Webster never altered the special destination, and he never sold or disposed of the villa and ground, and I think we should now give effect to his will and purpose by finding that Miss Webster is entitled to the villa and pertinents in addition to her provisions under the general settlements. No. 16.

Parent and Child—Legitim—Collatio inter liberos.—Large cash advances made by a father to a son in business, and entered in the father's books as "By gifts payable to my son James as he requires it:" "By allotted for his business, free gift:" and "By given over as free gift,"—held to be advances to account of legitim.

THIS was an action for payment of legitim raised in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire by Andrew Douglas against his brother, James Earl Douglas, the sole executor and universal disponee under the settlement of their father, Thomas Douglas. 2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire. I.

The father was twice married, the pursuer and defender respectively being the only issue of the first and second marriages. He died on 13th March 1875, predeceased by both his wives, leaving a mortis causa disposition and settlement, dated 4th August 1869, by which, upon the narrative of his affection for his son James, and of having already made provision for his other son Andrew, he disposed and conveyed to his son James his whole means and estate, and appointed him his sole executor. This deed contained a clause revoking all prior mortis causa settlements; but a prior settlement, executed on 9th July 1860, was to the same effect, save that a trust was constituted until his son James should attain majority, which he had done before the date of the second deed. The trust-settlement of 1860 also contained a statement in the inductive clause that the testator had already made provision for his other son Andrew.

In point of fact, Mr Thomas Douglas had in a postnuptial contract between him and his first wife (there having been no antenuptial contract of marriage between them) provided a sum of £800 to his son Andrew, and by a subsequent mutual settlement by himself and his second wife he provided a further sum of £600 to Andrew, which sums were declared to be in full of all claims of executry, legitim, or other legal claims whatsoever competent to him by and through the decease of his mother, or through Mr Douglas' death.

During his lifetime he had handed over three sums, amounting together to £6000, to the defender. These sums were entered in a ledger kept in the handwriting of the deceased thus:—

Say three thousand pounds

Douglas v.
Douglas.

The defender maintained that these sums were intended by his father as gifts over and above legitim, that he was not bound to collate them, and that the legitim fund, being one-half of the free executry, fell to be divided equally between himself and the pursuer.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne), after a remit to an accountant, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the true nett value of the deceased Thomas Douglas' personal estate, including interest to 13th September 1875 (being six months from Thomas Douglas' death), may be held to have amounted to £6740, whereof one-half or £3370 is, in the circumstances of the case as stated on record, the legitim: Finds that there is evidence in process to establish that the defender received from his father, the deceased, during his lifetime, sums of money exceeding in amount the whole legitim fund, which sums he is, in a question with the pursuer, the deceased's only other child, bound to collate or impute towards legitim: Finds therefore that his claim to legitim must be held to have been satisfied, and that the pursuer is entitled to the whole legitim funds; and, having regard to these findings, decerns against the defender as executor of his deceased father for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £3370, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent from 13th September 1875 until paid."*

The Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) adhered.†

* "NOTE.— . . . As to these (the cash advances), the question comes to be whether the mode in which they are entered in the deceased Mr Douglas' ledger (for the defender offers no evidence upon the point except his own oath, which it need hardly be said is inadmissible) is sufficient to establish that it was the deceased's intention that they, or any of them, should be in addition to legitim, and so exempt from collation. Now, I think it might, with some plausibility, be argued that the way in which the advance second in date (viz. the £1000 credited to defender under date 31st December 1866) appears in the ledger suggests, that so far from the deceased intending it as a præcipuum over and above legitim, he intended it to be an advance towards the defender's portion or share of legitim, for he describes it as a sum 'allotted for his (i.e. defender's) business;' but be that as it may, it seems to me that no higher inference can be drawn from the fact that the deceased speaks of one of the advances as a 'gift,' and of the other two as 'free gifts,' than that he did not intend them to be treated as loans of which repayment could be demanded; and accordingly I hold that there is nothing to take any of the three advances out of the general rule, according to which advances made by a father to a son in his lifetime are, in a question of legitim, subject to collation."

(The Sheriff-substitute then proceeded to negative a contention for the pursuer; which was not maintained in the Court of Session, that the defender was bound to replace into the legitim fund the whole sums which he had received from his father in his lifetime, and that the pursuer was entitled to one-half of the fund so formed.)

† "NOTE.— . . . As to the moveable estate left by the deceased, it falls in this case to be divided into two parts, (1) the dead's part, and (2) the legitim. As to the first of these—the dead's part—there seems to be no room for any dispute. The defender is entitled to the whole of it, in respect of the testament (No. 17 of process) executed by his father. As to the second of these—the legitim—it is now admitted that the pursuer is entitled to a share of the legitim fund, notwithstanding the terms of the testament, No. 17. The question now arises, whether the defender be entitled to a share of this legitim fund. It admits that he got from his father during his life three sums at least, viz. £3000, £1000, and £2000, making together the sum of £6000. In such circumstances the Sheriff considers that, looking to the amount of the legitim fund in this case, the defender is excluded in respect of such gifts from claiming any share of the fund, and that the pursuer is entitled to the whole of it."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

 he intention of the father in this case to favour his younger son was shewn conclusively by the testamentary deeds which he executed, and which shewed that he was strongly impressed with the resolution that his elder son should get no more, having been already provided for. The very days on which the gifts were made, Christmas-day and the last day of the year, shewed their true character. There was no case in which advances stated by the father to be “gifts” or “free gifts” to the son had been held subject to collation.¹

The pursuer supported the judgment of the Sheriff.²

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that this case has been very properly disposed of in the Court below, on grounds which are satisfactorily and clearly explained by the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute. (His Lordship stated the facts).
 I have no doubt that these sums were intended as gifts and not as debts; and the learned Sheriffs have come to the same conclusion. The entries made by the father in his books shew this very clearly; nor does it signify whether the gift was made by the father paying the money down or allowing his son to draw on him as occasion required. These sums are carried to the credit of the son's account in the father's ledger, and there is no reason to think that they were ever considered as debts he was bound to repay.

But the question remains, was this “free gift” a præcipuum over and above the legitim, or must the appellant collate it before he can claim a share of the legitim fund?

This question belongs to a class which has been the subject of much discussion among all jurists who follow the civil law, whence we have derived the doctrine. I think it is well settled with us that a donation by a father to his son during his life, to set him up in the world (as these advances certainly were) is subject to collation, unless the father has, either expressly or by some clear implication, declared his intention to the contrary. The law is so stated by Mr Bell in his Principles, and is entirely borne out by the authorities quoted by him —from the case of Skinner, in 1775, to the recent case of Nisbet, in 1865.
 Domat's Treatise on the Civil Law was referred to by the appellant; but unless
 I misread what that author says (l. iii. t. 3, sec. 3), he entirely confirms the view
 I have stated.

No doubt it is contended that the father has sufficiently indicated his intention that this should be a præcipuum, and that the intention of the father to this effect may be gathered from any clear indications of intention, although it be not directly expressed. Now, first, as regards the express words—the words “as a free gift,” although certainly material, are at the best ambiguous. They might be satisfied by being referred to a gift as distinguished from a debt, although they may also bear the interpretation that the advance was not only a gift, but was also free of any other legal result or liability. Between these constructions I think the balance must be cast by the circumstances. If the sum had been inconsiderable compared to the father's means these words would have given great weight to the appellant's contention. But when I see that they amounted to two-thirds of the father's estate I think we must look for some more direct and unambiguous evidence of intention before we can assume that the father meant to effect so great an inequality between his sons.

There is a passage in Voet's Commentaries on the Pandects which seems apposite. The author leans to the opinion that pure gifts are not subject to collation except in two specified cases. But he says (37, 6, 14)—“Diversum est si quid non simpliciter ad donationem, sed ad instructionem tabernæ, vel officii, vel generalius ad mercaturam exercendam, aliasque similes causas, liberè a parente datum esset; id enim collationi subesse placuit.”

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMDALE.—I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the Sheriff has decided rightly in this case.

The advances which form the subject of dispute were not, and could not be said to be in any correct sense such as a father is always understood to make for or for his children, irrespective altogether of any question of legitim. They were certainly not made for the purposes of education or aliment; and were of a small or inconsiderable amount. On the contrary, they were advances large in amount, and made to a younger son, who was forisfamiated and engaged in business on his own account, for the purpose of assisting him in his business. In ordinary circumstances such allowances would clearly fall to be taken into computation in adjusting the division of legitim, or, to put it differently, would require to be collated as in a question with the other children. It is true, however, that the father might, if he pleased, have made the advances on the footing, either express or implied, that they were not to be so dealt with, but to be held as a præcipuum. There is certainly nothing expressed to that effect in this case, and, in my opinion, there is nothing in the circumstances sufficient to imply it. The expression “free gifts” must, I think, be held as intended merely to denote that the advances were not debts, payment of which could be enforced by the father from his son.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

Process—Suspension—Competency—Expenses—Remit to Sheriff—Court of Justiciary.—In disposing of an appeal under the Small Debt Act to the Circuit Court of Justiciary the presiding Judge remitted to the Sheriff to proceed “as may be just,” found the appellant entitled to expenses, remitted the account of expenses to the Sheriff Court Auditor, and granted power to the Sheriff to decern for the expenses, which he accordingly did. The appellant lodged a note of suspension in the Court of Session of a threatened charge for the taxed expenses, on the ground that the remit to the Sheriff to decern for expenses was ultra vires of the Circuit Judge. Held that the remit to the Sheriff was competent, and the suspension refused.

Glass v. Laughlin.

Question, whether the suspension was competent.

In January 1875 James Glass raised an action in the Small Debt Bill-Chamber. Court of Lanarkshire against Joseph Laughlin for the sum of £15, restricted to £12. On 10th February the Sheriff-substitute (Galbraith) gave decree for the sum sued for, with expenses. Laughlin appealed to the next Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow, under the provisions of the Small Debt Act 1 Vict. cap. 41, sec. 31. On 23d April 1875 Lord Deas, as presiding Judge at the Spring Circuit at Glasgow, heard the cause, and remitted to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire to inquire into the facts and to report. Parties were again heard on 16th September 1875 before Lord Neaves, as Circuit Judge, when a fresh remit to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire was made. The appeal was next heard, of consent, by Lord Young on 23d December 1875, during the Christmas Circuit at Glasgow, when his Lordship pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having of consent heard parties' procurators on the report of the Sheriff under the remit made to him by interlocutor of the Circuit Court of Justiciary of 16th September last, sustains the appeal; recalls the decree complained of; remits the cause to the Sheriff to proceed therein as may be just: Finds the appellant entitled to expenses, remits the account thereof when lodged to the Auditor of the Sheriff Court at Glasgow to tax and report to the said Sheriff, and grants power to the said Sheriff to decern for the same."

2D DIVISION.

The Sheriff of Lanarkshire, in virtue of the above remit, resumed consideration of the cause, and on 29th February 1876 pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing Laughlin, and decerning against Glass for £54, 5s. 4d. of expenses.

Glass then presented a note of suspension of a threatened charge under this last interlocutor. In his statement of facts he set forth the above proceedings, and added—"The Court of Justiciary possesses no power either by statute or at common law to delegate any part of its functions, and that part of Lord Young's judgment which granted power to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire to decern for the expenses incurred under the appeal is ultra vires and inept. In like manner the decree of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire following upon said judgment is ultra vires and inept. Diligence having, however, been threatened on the said decree, the present suspension has been rendered necessary."

The pleas in law were to the same effect.

The respondent pleaded (1) that the suspension was incompetent, and (2) that the whole procedure was regular and legal.

On 16th June 1876 the Lord Ordinary repelled the reasons of suspension, with expenses.*

* "NOTE.—The complainer asks suspension of a decree of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, pronounced under a remit to him by the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow, in an appeal to that Court under the Small Debt Act. The ground of suspension is that the Circuit Court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the remit, and that therefore the decree of the Sheriff acting under it is inept.

"The respondent maintains (1st) that the suspension is incompetent; and (2) that it is groundless, the Circuit Court not having exceeded its jurisdiction.

"With respect to the question of competency, the complainer, while conceding that this Court cannot directly review a judgment of the Circuit Court, con-

Argued for Glass;—The Circuit Court of Justiciary had no power to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to the extent of entitling him to decern for expenses incurred in the Circuit Court. The civil jurisdiction of that Court was the creature of statute,¹ and did not arise from common law like that of the Court of Session. All statutory jurisdiction must be tended that a decree pronounced by a Sheriff under a remit from that Court was reviewable on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and that if a remit from the Circuit Court appeared to be the only foundation of his jurisdiction, this Court might consider and determine whether that was sufficient. I do not know that it was exactly so put in argument, but as this seems to me the strongest way in which it can be put I so state it.

"I am of opinion that this Court must assume that the Circuit Court, being a superior if not Supreme Court, acted within its jurisdiction, and according to the law and practice of that Court, in any judgment which it pronounced; and that as this Court cannot under any form of review directly set aside or stay the execution of any such judgment, it cannot or ought not to do so indirectly by reviewing a Sheriff's decree, pronounced under and according to the terms and directions of such judgment, on the ground that the Circuit Court had exceeded its jurisdiction in pronouncing it. But although I state this as a general proposition, I desire to explain that I do so with the qualification which necessarily accompany most general propositions, viz., that it is not meant to exclude the possibility of an exception from it under circumstances sufficiently exceptional to warrant it. Whether or not such circumstances may conceivably ~~very~~ need not be determined. It is enough to have a general rule, and no good reason for departing from it in the particular case. That there is no such reason here is, I think, very clear. The expenses of the appeal which the Circuit Court awarded to the appellant were exceptionally heavy, from the circumstance of two remits having been made to the Sheriff to investigate and report on matters of fact, and were chiefly incurred before the Sheriff in the execution of these remits. As I was myself the Circuit Judge who saw fit to award the expenses I am able to state (what I could otherwise only have taken as a reasonable supposition) that I remitted to the Sheriff to ascertain and decern for the amount, if not with the express consent of both parties, certainly without the slightest objection by either, as the most expedient course in the circumstances, and preferable to the alternative of a taxation and report to the next Circuit for decern. It was the third Circuit at which the appeal had come up, and, being the Christmas Circuit, I only consented to hear and decide it then at the urgent request and of consent of both parties, who greatly desired then to have an end of the matter. Therefore, whether or not it may be possible to conceive circumstances in which this Court might competently review directly, or indirectly, the judgment of a Circuit Court of Justiciary, I am of opinion that here are no such circumstances, and that the general, if not universal, rule against the competency of such review must prevail.

"If the suspension were assumed to be competent I should have to express my own opinion that it is unfounded, for I think the Circuit Court of Justiciary has jurisdiction to remit to an inferior Judge to tax and decern for the expenses of an appeal awarded by that Court. I have in my own practice known of remits to the inferior Judge of the whole cause, with certain instructions (the competency of which is, I suppose, not doubtful), but with power to dispose of the expenses of the appeal on the termination of the cause.

"I cannot avoid remarking, in conclusion, that the present suspension seems one regarding mere form of procedure, by which the complainer cannot possibly take any substantial benefit. Pay the expenses awarded against him by the Circuit Court he must, and if the Sheriff cannot competently decern therefor, a remit the only result is that the Circuit Court must on application at his expense pronounce such decree. There is here no question of a peremptory decree which has fallen."

regard to the expenses in that Court.

Nov. 10, 1876.
Glass v.
Laughlin.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It may be doubted whether we have jurisdiction to entertain this suspension. That might be a point of difficulty were it necessary to decide it; but I do not put the judgment on that ground.

This is a suspension of an interlocutor of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire in the Small Debt Court decerning for a sum of expenses in an action before that Court. The judgment on the merits had been appealed to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, and the decree complained of was pronounced in terms of a remit from the Circuit Court. The ground of suspension is that the Sheriff had no jurisdiction to pronounce the interlocutor, his authority for doing so being an interlocutor of Lord Young, sitting in the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow Winter Circuit. It is maintained that Lord Young had no power to make the remit.

It is not disputed that Lord Young rightly entertained the case in which the remit was made, and that he did so at the request of both parties, but it is said that he went beyond his powers in remitting to the Sheriff to decern for expenses.

It is perfectly clear on the merits, if merits there be, that there is no ground for this suspension. The parties came before Lord Young at the Winter Circuit at Glasgow, and there being some doubts felt as to whether the Circuit Court held at Glasgow during the Christmas recess had power, under the special statute, to entertain appeals, they thought fit to consent to waive all objection on that ground. Lord Young accordingly decided the case, and remitted it simpliciter back to the Sheriff, finding the appellant entitled to expenses, which expenses he granted power to the Sheriff to decern for. This is the step upon the part of the Circuit Judge which is now objected to as ultra vires. But I have no doubt that if he had power to decide the case he had undoubted power to authorise the Sheriff, from whom the appeal was taken, to decern for the expenses as found due. The contention is that whenever a party has been found entitled to expenses in the Circuit Court these expenses must either be modified at the time, or else no decree for them can be obtained till the next Circuit, in consequence of the delay entailed by the taxation of the account. That is a proposition which I should be very sorry to affirm.

Upon these grounds, then, I think that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and refuse the note.

LORD NEAVES and LORD ORMDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I have great doubts of the competency of this suspension, but still I am prepared to put my judgment upon the merits. On referring to the "Heritable Jurisdiction Act" it will be seen that there is there given to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, in all cases in which appeal is made competent to that Court, power to cognosce and determine such appeals in civil cases in the same way as the Court of Session may

Nov. 10, 1876.
Glass v.
Laughlin.

The review which is conferred on the Circuit Court is a limited one, but still within its limits it falls under the rule of common law procedure, and I am clear of opinion that at common law every Court of review has power to remit to the inferior Court to carry out its decrees, and to dispose of all questions of expenses. The expenses incurred in a Court of review must very often unavoidably fall to be sent back to the inferior Court to ascertain the true amount thereof and to be decreed for and payment thereof enforced, especially when, as in the case of the Circuit Courts, they only sit for a day or two at a time, and at considerable intervals. This mode of procedure is not excluded by the words of the statute conferring the jurisdiction, and the mere absence of the words expressly giving the right will not deprive the Court of ordinary and necessary powers. Every Court of review should have this power, and I think the Circuit Courts are no exception. On this simple ground, and setting aside altogether the question of our jurisdiction to interfere, directly or indirectly, with what is truly a Circuit Court judgment, I am for adhering.

THE COURT adhered.

Title to Sue—Bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), 99.—At a meeting of the creditors of a bankrupt called for the purpose of charging the trustee a resolution was passed and intimated by the trustee to the bankrupt abandoning a claim to certain property. In an action by the bankrupt prosecuting the claim the preliminary plea, that as he had not been reinvested in his estates he had no title to sue, was stated for the defenders, and repelled.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

THIS was an action of reduction and count and reckoning by John Fleming against the trustees of Alexander Walker, the Commercial Bank and other persons. The purpose of the action was to assert the pursuer's right to certain leasehold property in Larkhall formerly held by him and which he alleged had been fraudulently assigned by one Maclean, trustee, to Walker, after whose death it was conveyed by Walker's trustees to onerous purchasers.

The Commercial Bank stated this preliminary plea:—The pursuer having been sequestrated, and not having been reinvested in his estates has no title to sue.

The facts on which this plea was founded were as follows:—The pursuer's estates were sequestrated in July 1863. In 1866 he was discharged without composition, and on 21st March 1876 the trustee in the sequestration was discharged. It appeared from the sederunt-book that the trustee brought the claim under the creditors' notice in September 1864 and a valuation of the property was made. In a state of the funds dated 17th March 1864 it was stated,—"The (heritable) property, some months before the sequestration, was assigned to certain trustees for behoof of the bankrupt's creditors. The assignation was ex facie absolute, but actually in trust for payment of the bankrupt's debts. A back-letter should have en granted to the bankrupt, but this was not done. The only acting trustee under this deed has been repeatedly called upon to denude in favour the trustee under the sequestration, but this he refuses to do. Law proceedings were instructed to be raised against the assignee; but there being no funds on hand belonging to the estate to meet the expenses, and the creditors declining to become security for them, the trustee does not place himself in a position to proceed with the action.*

No. 19.

Fleming v.
Walker's
Trustees.

Nothing was done in the sequestration after the bankrupt's discharge till 1875. On 9th December 1875 a meeting of creditors was held, which had been called for the purpose of authorising the trustee to apply for his discharge, no notice being given of any other business. The following minute was passed:—"The meeting expressed itself satisfied with the conduct of the trustee and the statement of accounts submitted, and empowered the trustee to apply for his discharge. The meeting also approved of the trustee giving a letter to the bankrupt, John Fleming, abandoning his right, on behalf of the estate, to the property in Larkhall, consisting of shops and dwelling-houses."

Accordingly, on 3d February 1876, the trustee wrote to the pursuer abandoning the claim on behalf of the sequestrated estate, and intimating that so far as the creditors were concerned he was at liberty to prosecute the right in any action.

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—It was settled by the cases quoted to the Lord Ordinary that an undischarged bankrupt might pursue a claim if it was abandoned by his creditors. That had been done; and no notice was necessary in calling the meeting of 9th December 1875, as the claim had been long ago formally and repeatedly under the notice of the creditors, and yet had never been proceeded with, and it was impossible that the trustee could be discharged without all outstanding claims being disposed of.

The defenders argued;—Notice of the purpose of the meeting was indispensable under the 99th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

At advising;—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am unable to concur with the Lord Ordinary's judgment. It is settled that though a bankrupt is not retrocessed in a claim if it has been abandoned his radical right revives to the effect of entitling him to prosecute the claim. The sole question is, whether there is sufficient evidence that this claim has been abandoned. The evidence seems to me very complete. The sequestration substantially came to an end in 1866, when the bankrupt was discharged. Looking into the sederunt-book I find that nothing took place between that time and 1875. That of itself goes far to shew that the creditors did not think the claim was likely to produce a fund for division. But, besides, it had been several times brought under their notice by the trustee. The first mention of it occurs in September 1863, when the trustee expressly called attention to the claim. In consequence of that report a valuation was made, and

* "NOTE.—The pursuer maintained that he was in effect retrocessed in the date to which this action relates, by virtue of the resolution of creditors at the meeting on 9th December 1875, and the letter written by the trustee by their authority. But in calling the meeting no notice was given that any such business was to be taken up, and the Lord Ordinary thinks that the resolution is beyond the power of the creditors. The cases cited were Marshall, 22 D. 25; Galbraith, 1 Macph. 644; Graham, 9 Macph. 798; and Gavin, 5 D. 191."

Fleming v.
Walker's

then again it appears from the minute of 17th March 1864 that "the (heritable) property, some months before the sequestration, was assigned to certain trustees for behoof of the bankrupt's creditors. The assignation was ex facie absolute, but actually in trust for payment of the bankrupt's debts. A back-letter should have been granted to the bankrupt, but this was not done. The only acting trustee under this deed has been repeatedly called upon to denude in favour of the trustee under the sequestration, but this he refuses to do. Law proceedings were instructed to be raised against the assignee; but there being no funds at hand belonging to the estate to meet the expenses, and the creditors declining to become security for them, the trustee does not feel himself in a position to proceed with the action."

That minute is good evidence that in 1864 the creditors had this alternative presented to them by the trustee: "Here is a claim against Walker. Do you wish me to prosecute it? If you do, you must put me in funds, or find security. The creditors declined to do either. That looks as like abandonment as anything that can well be imagined."

But when that is followed up by the discharge of the trustee himself, even if no notice of this claim had been taken in the proceedings for discharge, is it not evidence of the strongest kind that the creditors do not intend to persist in the claim when they extinguish the title of the trustee, who would be the proper person to prosecute it? For nine years they had acquiesced in the view that the claim was not to be prosecuted, because there were no funds for the purpose, and then they discharged the trustee. I shall say that without any further notice being taken of the claim that would have been perfectly good evidence of abandonment. But the evidence does not stop there. When creditors are summoned for the discharge of a trustee the first question necessarily is, whether there is anything more for him to do. If there is a substantial claim still to be realised his work is not finished. Therefore the creditors must have been satisfied that he had recovered everything which was to be recovered or which they wished him to recover.

The circumstances are quite conclusive against any claim being now made by any creditor or by the trustee. If a creditor had come forward and said he had suffered a wrong, because the thing had been done behind his back, that would have been a different case. But there is no one here in the least degree in that position. I have no hesitation in accepting the trustee's letter of 3d February 1876 as a valid abandonment of all claims by the creditors, and an authority to the bankrupt to prosecute this action.

LORD DEAS.—We must keep in view what was necessary to give the pursuer a good title. He did not require to be retrocessed. It was sufficient if there was a refusal by his creditors to take up the claim. The question, is what evidence of that refusal is to be accepted. Now, if a long period of time elapsed and nothing is done in the way of taking up a claim, and then the creditors discharge both the bankrupt and the trustee, it is difficult to say that this of itself does not amount to a refusal to take up the claim. But here we have in addition an express resolution to that effect. The only objection stated to it is that there was no express notice given of the intention to propose that resolution. But even if the claim was not previously abandoned by the creditors that resolution must at least stand till it is reduced. And who can reduce it? Must it not be by the creditors, or some one in their right? No one here is in that position. And rides, does it follow that because creditors in whose absence the resolution was passed might be entitled to reduce it these defenders can take up the same plea? know of no authority for that proposition.

LORD MURE concurred.

Reparation—Damages—Reasonable Precautions for Safety of Public—Contributory Negligence.—In an action of damages against a railway company at the instance of the widow of a passenger killed at one of the company's stations two issues were sent to the jury—(1) fault on the part of the company, and (2) counter issue of contributory negligence. It was proved that the up platform at the station could only be reached by passengers by means of a level crossing. In a winter evening the pursuer's husband, who intended to travel by an up train which was overdue, was waiting with others on the down platform in the sitting-room, in which there was a fire—there being no fire in the waiting-room on the up platform. A train was standing on the down line of rails, which obstructed the up line. The whistle of a train approaching on the up line was heard, and a railway porter in uniform, who was not on duty, but intended to travel by the slow train, then twenty minutes overdue, sprang off the down platform and crossed to the up one by the level crossing. The deceased followed him closely; but as the train turned out to be an express—more than an hour late—and not a stopping train, he was caught by the engine, and received injuries of which he died the same night. The stationmaster admitted that it was part of his duty to warn passengers not to cross the line in front of approaching trains, but said that he had fulfilled that duty by "bawling out" to the two men to "stand back" when he saw them starting to cross. This evidence was not corroborated to the full extent that he had called out in time. It was the custom of ringing a bell when a stopping train was coming up, and no bell was rung on the occasion. The jury, by a majority, found for the pursuer on both issues, and assessed the damages at £600. On a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence, the Court refused to disturb the verdict.

Reparation—Railway—Level Crossing—Foot Bridge—Reasonable Precautions—Observed, that although a railway company is not bound to erect a foot bridge over their line to give passengers access from one platform to the other, and the want of such a bridge will not per se make them liable for injuries received by the public on that account, still the absence of such a precaution throws a greater onus on the company to provide for the safety of the public.

MRS THOMSON raised this action against the North British Railway 2^D DIVISION. company for damages and solatium for the death of her husband, Thomas Thomson, wine-merchant's traveller, who, she alleged, had died in consequence of being knocked down by the engine of a passing express train at Castlereary Station, on the defenders' line between Glasgow and Edinburgh, on the evening of 6th December 1875.

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded contributory negligence.

The issues sent to the jury were as follows:—"Whether, at or near Damages laid at £3000 sterling. Or, Whether the said injuries were caused or materially contributed to by the fault of the late Thomas Thomson?"

Thomson v.
North British
Railway Co.

On 21st and 22d July 1876 the cause was tried before Lord Ormrod and a jury, and eventually the jury, by a majority, found for the pursuer on both issues, and assessed the damages at £600.

The following are the facts of the case as they appeared from the notes of evidence:—

Castlecary is a station on the North British line, between Glasgow and Edinburgh, through which 71 trains pass in the course of every 24 hours. There are two platforms, a north and a south one; but the only access to the station is from the south, and any one desiring to reach the north platform, which is the one for persons travelling towards Edinburgh, has to cross the line by a level crossing consisting of old sleepers laid on the four-foot, or spaces between the rails, and the six-foot, or space between the up and down lines. This level crossing is reached on the south side by two steps, the depth from the platform to the rails being 1 foot 10 inches, and on the north by two steps also; but the distance between the rails and the platform on that side is 2 feet 8 inches. The station is situated on a curve, the end of which nearest Glasgow runs into a cutting, and a person on the platform could see a train approaching at the distance of between 300 and 400 yards. There is a waiting-room upon each platform, but on the occasion in question there was no fire in the waiting-room on the north platform, the only fire being in that on the south one. Mr Thomson on 6th December had been employed all day in his usual avocations, and came to Castlecary to return to Edinburgh by a parliamentary train leaving Glasgow at 5.30 p.m., and due at Castlecary at 6.1 p.m. Owing to some delay caused by an accident to a train earlier in the afternoon, this 5.30 slow train was late; and not only that, but the 5 o'clock express train from Glasgow to Edinburgh, which was not time to stop at Castlecary, was upwards of an hour behind its time. Thomson remained on the south platform until some time after the train he intended to travel by was due, and in the meantime a slow train from Edinburgh to Glasgow came up at 6.32, and after depositing and picking up passengers began to move off. At this time the whistle of a train approaching from Glasgow was heard, and a railway porter (Rutherford) in his uniform coat and cap, but with a greatcoat over his uniform coat, who was not on duty, but intended to travel by the 5.30 parliamentary train from Glasgow, which was by that time 20 minutes late, and thinking the approaching train was his train, proceeded to cross to the north platform by the level crossing. He was closely followed by Thomson. The train, however, proved not to be the slow train, but the 5 o'clock express now upwards of an hour overdue; and instead of stopping it ran through the station at the rate of about 40 miles an hour. Rutherford, the porter who was in front of Thomson, narrowly escaped being caught by the engine, and Thomson himself was caught by it and knocked down, and severely injured that he died the same night when being conveyed home to Edinburgh. From the evidence of the porter Rutherford it appears that, in consequence of the train from Edinburgh being at the north platform, it was impossible to see the approaching train until the end of the Edinburgh train had been passed and "the six-foot" was reached, so that even then he did not think it was an express train which would pp, and had accordingly gone on. The stationmaster, in his evidence, No. 20. deposed that he had been, along with the porter and guard of the train, engaged in getting the Edinburgh train despatched, but that when, immediately after the whistle of the express was heard, he saw two men—Thomson and Rutherford—stepping out from among the other persons on the platform, he “bawled out to them to ‘stand back there.’ I did not see there was a train coming. There was no time for me to do more than did. I was about the length of one carriage and the van from them when they made as if to cross. They did not stand back when I bawled, it went across. The whole thing was the work of a moment—the twinkling of an eye.” This statement was corroborated by Cruickshanks, the signal-porter at Castlecary, to this extent—“I saw only one man spring I heard the stationmaster calling out something just as the man sprang off the platform. I cannot be certain what it was he called out.” The clerk at the station, whose back, however, was turned, also deposed to hearing the stationmaster calling out, but could not say what he said. Rutherford—the porter who had crossed the line in safety—on the other hand, gave the following account:—“Nobody warned me not to cross the line. I did not hear the stationmaster or porter warning anybody when I stepped down off the platform. I was at the back end of the train that was moving away. When I was on the four-foot of the up line” (Glasgow to Edinburgh) “I heard somebody calling out. I could not have turned then. My safest course was to jump up.” This statement was corroborated in the following manner by a Mr Kirkwood, who happened to be present on the south platform on the evening in question:—“Immediately after he (Thomson) was struck I heard a cry from somebody—I do not know from whom—in the direction where I had seen the stationmaster standing. I heard no cry before that. I am certain it was far too late to save Thomson.” The only other evidence on this point was that of a man Neilson, who also was on the south platform:—“I did not hear anybody crying out, either before or at the time of the accident. I did not hear the stationmaster or porter tell anybody not to cross.”

It was proved to be the practice at Castlecary to ring a bell before the arrival of a stopping train, and no bell was rung on this occasion. The stationmaster admitted in cross-examination that he considered it part of his duty to warn people not to go over the level crossing when an express train was due or overdue.

The defenders obtained a rule on 4th November 1876.

The pursuer shewed cause. In dealing with questions such as this, the Court was not entitled to consider what result they themselves would come to upon the evidence, but whether the jury were justified on the evidence before them in coming to the conclusion at which they had arrived. There was here sufficient evidence to shew that the railway company had not taken sufficient precautions for the safety of the public.¹ The only access to the north platform was across the rails. It would have been a reasonable precaution to have provided a foot bridge, such as was customary at many stations. Thomson, moreover, would not have been entitled to cross the line at any other part except at the level crossing.² He thought his train was coming up, he knew it was late, and he

Moreover, he followed the company's servants in uniform, and was entitled to assume that they were in safety in so doing.

Thomson v.

The defenders supported the rule. After a railway company had provided every reasonable protection to the public the public must do the best to protect themselves. Every one using a railway crossing is bound to use it cautiously and circumspectly, because it may be attended with danger.¹ Here there had been no caution or care at all. Thomson rushed recklessly on to the line, whereas he should have waited and gone over after the train had come to a stand-still. With regard to what had been said as to its being the duty of the railway company to supply a foot bridge, the Board of Trade had not considered it necessary to stop late for this as one of the necessary protections to the public.

At advising,—

LORD ORMDALE.—In this case we granted a rule to the defenders on the pursuer to shew cause why a new trial should not take place, and we are now to determine whether the rule should be discharged or made absolute.

The action is at the instance of Mrs Thomson, the widow of the deceased Thomas Thomson, who was a commercial traveller, and who received injury at the level crossing at Castlecary Station on the defenders' railway in December 1875, so severe as to cause his death within a few hours thereafter; and the action was laid upon the ground that his death was caused through the fault of the defenders. Accordingly an issue was sent to a jury to say whether or not the injuries he had received, and in consequence of which he died, were received by him by and through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer; and a counter issue was also sent to the jury, taken on the part of the defenders, putting the question, whether the said injuries were caused or materially contributed to by the fault of the late Thomas Thomson. If the injuries were caused by the fault of the railway company they would be answerable under the first issue; but then if, on the other hand—it might be their fault to some extent—the deceased himself contributed to a material extent to the accident, that might be a sufficient answer, and the pursuer could not now recover. The jury returned a verdict by a majority finding for the pursuer on both issues, and assessing the damages at £600. No complaint was made that the damages are excessive; the only ground of application for a new trial was that the verdict was contrary to evidence—against the weight of the evidence that was laid before the jury.

Now, there can be no doubt that there could scarcely be conceived a more eminently fitted for the decision of a jury. Whether they might be right or wrong, according to our view of the matter, in the conclusion at which they arrived, is not the question for us now. The question which we have to determine, and the only view we can take of it, is this, had the jury such evidence laid before them as, on consideration of the case, warranted them in returning the verdict which they did return?

Without going into any very minute detail, two points were made on behalf of the pursuer at the trial, and also adverted to in the argument before the

the rule, as shewing fault on the part of the defenders. It was said, in the first place, that there was no bridge for passengers to cross the line at Castlecary Station, and that in order to cross from the south to the north side, which he required to do in order to go by the train he intended to go by—the train from Glasgow to Edinburgh—on the occasion in question, the late Mr Thomson had no other method than by using the level crossing across the rails. There was a bridge there, and it was said that that was one of the precautions which were wanting, and which were incumbent upon the railway company, who were bound to use, in a reasonable sense, all necessary precautions for the safety of their passengers at that station. Secondly, it is said that, independent of the want of a bridge, there ought to have been warning given to the passengers, including Mr Thomson, on the occasion in question, not to cross till they got notice that the rails were clear and that it was safe for them to do so; and that at the time when the unfortunate man was killed an express train was long overdue and might come up every minute.

Thomson v.
North British
Railway Co.

Now, in regard to the first of these matters—the necessity for a bridge across the line—we cannot tell how far the jury may have proceeded upon that, or whether they may have proceeded upon it at all. For myself, and with a view to the conclusion at which I have arrived, I do not think it is necessary for us to hold that it was incumbent upon the railway company to have a bridge across at that station. I would rather for myself be disposed to think there was not sufficient in the evidence or otherwise to entitle us to say any such obligation lay upon the railway company. There has been no such bridge at that place since the railway was established, and so far as was seen from the evidence no complaint was ever made in consequence of the want of a bridge there. I am rather inclined, therefore, to adopt the view which I took in charging the jury, and which, I observe is stated in the report of the case of Stubley v. The London and North-Western Railway Company—a case which was cited by the Lord Advocate in the argument before us, and which related to an action for damages at the instance of the representatives of a man who was killed on a level crossing on a railway in England. There an application was made for a new trial, and Baron Pollock, alluding to this matter about a bridge, said—“It is true that the public footway crosses the line on the level, but the Legislature saw no mischief in allowing the railway to be conducted thus without requiring the erection of a bridge, and it cannot be said that the defendants were bound to make one of their own accord.” Now, that statement tends itself to me in reference to the bridge in the present case. I do not think that any other of the learned Judges in that case—and the whole of the opinions of the Court of Exchequer gave their opinions—dissented from that view of the matter of a bridge which was stated by Baron Pollock.

But there is a great deal in this case independent of that question of a bridge, and upon another branch of the case a different view may legitimately enough be taken. With regard to the allegation of the pursuer, that no warning was given on behalf of the railway company to the late Mr Thomson not to cross when he did cross, or about the time that he did cross from the south to the north side of the railway, we have a good deal of evidence; and I find the stationmaster Robertson saying this, which is very important—“When an express train is expected, if it is due or overdue, I consider it my duty to warn people not to go over the level crossing. At 6.30 on the evening in question a 5.0 express (from Glasgow) was overdue. It was my duty to warn people on the platform not to cross. I fulfilled that duty by giving warning in the way I have mentioned." And the way he mentions is—"I bawled out to them to 'stand back there.' I did not say there was a train coming." Now, that is the evidence of the stationmaster. Is there evidence to the effect that he did give that warning, or is there evidence to the effect that he did not? The next witness I require to notice who speaks to this matter is Cruickshanks, who was standing on the south side just about the time of the accident, attending to a train on that side of the line. "I remember the arrival of the train from the east," he says, "at 6.32 that evening." There was a train from the east standing on the south side of the station at the very time; and that is the train to which he there alludes. Then he says—"I heard the stationmaster calling out something just as the man sprang off the platform"—that man being either Thomson, or Rutherford, who had succeeded in crossing immediately before him, and the platform being the platform on the south side from which they required to cross to the north side. That is what Cruickshanks says; but we have a good deal more evidence besides as to whether there was a warning in any shape given to the passengers who were waiting to cross. We have it stated by Kirkwood—"Immediately after he (Thomson) was struck I heard a cry from somebody—I do not know from whom—in the direction where I had seen the stationmaster standing. I heard no cry before that. I am certain it was far too late to save Thomson." That was the evidence of Kirkwood, who was at Leith-cary Station that evening with Thomas Neilson. Well, Neilson says when examined—"I did not hear anybody crying out either before or at the time of the accident. I did not hear the stationmaster or porter tell anybody not to cross." And we have still some more evidence on this important matter. We have the evidence of Rutherford, the man who did manage to get across. He says—"Nobody warned me not to cross the line. I did not hear the stationmaster or porter warning anybody when I stepped down off the platform. I was at the back end of the train that was moving away. When I was on the four-foot of the up line I heard somebody calling out. I could not have turned then." Now, that is the evidence on this important matter; and I think it is impossible to doubt or to question that there was evidence here of a conflicting description as to whether or not warning had been given by the stationmaster, or by anybody on behalf of the defenders, either to Thomson or to any of the other passengers, not to cross the line, as an express train was expected. Surely there was evidence for the jury upon that question, and I think a very important matter of evidence was here raised for their consideration. They had it all before them, and it is to be presumed that having considered it, and given to it all the attention they possibly could give, they came to the conclusion—looking to the verdict they gave—that that warning was not given, or if given at all by the stationmaster (as he says himself) bawling out to the people to stand back, that it was given when it was too late and of no use. Rutherford, who most narrowly escaped, crossing immediately before Thomson, says that he heard the cry when he was on the four-foot on the north side. Then there were some other persons who were in a position to hear the warning, and none of them say (except the stationmaster himself) that warning was given in time for Thomson to desist attempting to cross. Well, if I am right in the views I have now suggested, this was undoubtedly a fair enough question of evidence for the jury to consider, and to come to a conclusion on the evidence, which is of a very conflicting nature. I rather think the preponderance of evidence would lean the conclusion that the warning which the stationmaster says it was his duty give was not given, or at least not given in time. If that be so, we cannot hesitate to say that the jury were warranted in coming to the conclusion in regard to this matter that there was fault on the part of the defenders.

No. 20.

Nov. 16, 1876.
Thomson v.
North British
Railway Co.

That, however, may not be enough to dispose of the case. There is the other sue, which we cannot overlook,—the counter issue taken on the part of the defenders,—to the effect that if there was fault on their part the accident was materially contributed to by Thomson himself,—that it was in a great degree rash and imprudent in him to have attempted to cross by the level crossing, or rather behind the train from the east, which was standing on the level crossing at the time, in the face necessarily of a train coming in the opposite direction. If it had been the train by which he intended to travel—the slow train—he might have managed to cross in perfect safety, because that slow train would have stopped for a minute on the north side before it proceeded on its way, in place of (as the express did) rushing past and catching him and causing the injuries which resulted in his death. Again, that question whether or not there was imprudence, thoughtlessness, and rashness on the part of the pursuer sufficient to entitle the jury to return a verdict that there was contributory negligence and fault on the pursuer's part, and to bring in a verdict for the defenders on that issue,—that question, I say, was just a question eminently for the consideration of the jury. It is an exceedingly difficult question. I felt at the time of the trial that that was the most difficult point in the whole case, and I may say that I feel the greatest difficulty yet in regard to that question; for I would be sorry that any observations made, in so far as I am concerned at all events, should lead the public to suppose that they are not to take care of themselves and protect themselves by vigilance and circumspection. It would be most dangerous to relax that rule in the least degree. It is impossible for railway companies, with all the duties they have to attend to, to ensure, or anything like ensure, the safety of their passengers. If passengers will not be careful in looking out for their own safety it is impossible, considering the exigencies of railway travelling and the various duties incumbent upon railway companies, to hold that there would be any safety at all. But if there was a duty here,—and the stationmaster at Castlecary says there was,—to give warning to passengers not to cross at this particular juncture of time, when an express was expected, and was past-due a considerable time, and might necessarily have been expected every minute and every second,—and if it is true he neglected to give that warning, or to give it in time,—then it can hardly be said that, having received no warning, there was any such rashness on the part of the deceased as to make it incumbent on the jury to say there was contributory fault on his part. I think they were fairly enough entitled, looking to the evidence, to reject the counter issue taken for the defenders, and to return a verdict in favour of the pursuer upon that as upon the first issue.

Upon these grounds, and without entering into further detail as to what might or might not be my opinion now or at the time of the trial in regard to that second issue, I have come to the conclusion that there are not sufficient grounds to entitle the Court to say that the jury were wrong or were not entitled to return the verdict they did return, and therefore I think the rule ought to be discharged.

LORD NEAVES.—I think this is a case in which we are peculiarly called upon

No. 20.

Thomson v.
North British

to inquire, not what we would have done as a jury—a duty for which perhaps the bench is not the best adapted,—but what the jury were in the circumstances entitled to do—not what conclusion I or anybody else should have arrived at, but whether the jury, having arrived at a certain conclusion by a majority, were entitled, upon the evidence led, to arrive at that conclusion. If they were entitled to do so, it is perfectly clear that we have no ground upon which to order a new trial.

Now, it appears to me that this class of cases is always very peculiarly for the consideration of a jury. There may be cases where juries go perfectly wrong, and therefore we may set their verdicts aside and order a new trial; but in general they are the judges, and the best judges, of such questions, if they approach the subject with deliberation and with a desire to arrive at a just conclusion. Now, I cannot doubt that that was the case here; at least I see no ground for doubting it.

The case is a very peculiar one. The whole circumstances taken together raise considerations that are of very great importance to the public, and also to railway companies. There was no bridge at this station, and I quite concur with Lord Ormisdale that we are not entitled to say it was the specific duty of the railway company to make a bridge at such a station. They were not called upon to do so by their statute, and we cannot say it was their specific duty, the non-observance of which would have of itself rendered them liable for the consequences, or what might be the possible consequences of such a neglect. But we have very few cases in which an absolute rule exists by which a particular specific thing must be done, the general rule being that the railway must be so constructed and so managed as to provide reasonable security for the safety of the public. If you have not that which may be said to be absolute security, you must observe the next best means of security and provide for that. The want of a bridge is not a ground of liability, but it is a ground of responsibility for taking other means of securing the lives and limbs of the passengers. Well, that was the first duty of the railway company. Another circumstance—slight as it may be of its own nature—was an element in the case. There was on the north side of this railway a waiting-room, there being another waiting-room on the south side along with the booking-offices. Now, in the waiting-room on the north side there was no fire that evening of the accident. I do not say it was the bounden duty of the company to have a fire there any more than it was their bounden duty to have a bridge; but it is impossible not to see that the want of a fire on the north side, and the existence of a fire on the south side, was, if not an invitation, at least a temptation to go to the warm side instead of the cold one. There are many persons to whom cold is an extreme evil—a very great cause of suffering—and often a cause of very great danger to health; and with the detention of an hour or two by reason of the unpunctuality of the trains, it may be a very serious matter to have to wait in a room as cold as ice in the middle of winter. Therefore I think it is very unfortunate if the railway company make it the duty or interest of people to go to the wrong side, and they ought to be all the more careful that every precaution is used for the safety of passengers. I do not know what amount of money is saved by not having a fire in that room during the winter. Some railway companies are exceedingly economical in such matters; but possibly when the damages and costs in this case are summed up it may be found not to be a very great saving to induce the passengers, by the temptation of keeping themselves warm, to go to the wrong

ida. Well, if these be things that are not in themselves grounds of liability, at circumstances which affect the position of parties on that occasion, then comes the question whether there was neglect on the one side or fault on the other? Now, I cannot help thinking that here a great deal is to be left to the jury. The considerations which affect a case of this kind are not always considerations that may be made matter of evidence. A great deal depends on human feelings, human tendencies—what a reasonable man may expect in such circumstances, and what he can complain of if he does not get. Now, without going the length of saying that the ordinary judicial tribunals are less likely to enquire whether people are protected against these dangers by special care, I think that the common feeling of humanity for those who are travelling by railway—what they are entitled to ask, and what they will naturally expect in point of safety—is better known and more appreciated by a jury than by anybody else. Upon the whole, you are entitled to look to that quarter for a due appreciation of the duties the public are entitled to expect, and of the want of which they are entitled to complain. Well, if we look to the circumstances of the case we find that this was a dark winter evening; the utmost confusion prevailed with respect to the trains; everything was out of joint and order. Two trains were too late, but at the last the time comes when this unfortunate man thought that his train was coming up, and that it was time he should bestir himself. The stationmaster said it was not his business to go about telling people as to the trains. Perhaps not; I do not say it was. But he admits it was his duty to call out in some way—and it is a part of the jury question here whether he called out timeously or not, and distinctly or not—to warn those who intended crossing that they should not go across in that manner. They could not tell—at least not every one of them could tell—and it was no great crime not to know—all the distinctions between the bells and the arrivals of one train and another; and when the stationmaster says that he called out, it does not clearly appear on the evidence that he called out timeously. Upon that point I think Rutherford's evidence was very material, for surely if he had heard the call of the stationmaster not to cross he would not have crossed; but he did cross. Considering the confusion and the darkness of the night, even though this man was not on duty, it is inconceivable that it could have been so palpably a wrong thing to cross when he did it; and it occurs to me that, being there, he might have been quite easily utilised to warn those on the platform that they were not to attempt to cross, and that the approaching train was not the train they were to go by. Now, all these are jury questions to consider—what the company might have been expected to do? what was proved? what was not proved? and upon the whole I think they were entitled to arrive at the conclusion at which they did arrive, viz., that there was fault on the part of the railway company—which they did with the concurrence apparently of the Judge himself.

But then there was the other question of contributory negligence. Now, that is a very different question, and I confess I think the jury were as much entitled to judge upon it as they were upon the other. I do not take Rutherford's evidence as conclusive upon that question; but I say this, that it is not clear that Thomson was warned. The stationmaster admits there was a duty of warning, because he says he did it, and he did it in consequence of his sense of duty; but it is a question whether it was timeously and efficiently done? When he saw an official there who might be misled, or might mislead others, he ought to have been particularly careful about giving warning; but, again, that is a

No. 20. question for the jury—Was it done in such a manner as amounted to a clear and distinct and sufficient warning to the people who were on the south side not to go across to the north side at that time because the approaching train was not a stopping train? The jury, I think, were better judges as to that than I am, and therefore I am not disposed to set aside their verdict. I think it all the more important that there was a division amongst the jury, and also that it appears that the Judge who tried the case thought there was a doubt on that question. That gave the greater security that the difficulties would be considered, and therefore there is every reason to believe that the case was fairly tried, and to hold that the decision should not be overturned.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am entirely of the same opinion. No more difficult or delicate duty is ever laid upon the Court than to decide whether the verdict returned by a jury is or is not to be overturned; and if that duty is difficult and delicate in all cases, it is peculiarly so in a case like this, for the two questions which the jury had to decide can hardly be stated without shewing how very difficult they are, and how easily the balance may be turned one way or the other in reference to both those questions.

The first question was, Whether the railway company had provided at the station and at this time reasonable means of enabling the public to cross the line in safety? The very word "reasonable," which we can hardly escape using, shews how the jury had a vast variety of circumstances to look at in order to see whether reasonable means were taken, and reasonable precautions employed by the railway company to secure the safety of the public whom they invited to cross the line at that place. Now, I agree with both your Lordships that it is impossible to lay down that the railway company were bound to erect a bridge here. The Board of Trade have not prescribed that; the statute has not prescribed it; and it is a question of circumstances. But then it is equally questionable that if a footbridge for passengers who had occasion to cross the line were not provided, a great deal more burden and onus lay upon the company, through their officials, to take care that accidents did not happen to persons necessarily crossing the line of railway upon the level crossing. Now, the circumstances have been so fully considered by both your Lordships that I do not think it necessary to enlarge. The slow train past-due, an express train an hour late, of which the passengers could know nothing, and which might come sweeping past at any moment at the rate of fifty miles an hour, make a very serious danger, and a danger which laid the railway company under obligation to take great precautions, through their servants, that it should not lead to fatal accidents. Surely that was a question for the jury—and a question so entirely special, and depending so entirely upon common sense considerations, that I would not interfere to upset the jury's verdict upon it unless it were made perfectly plain to me that no reasonable man could upon the evidence have reached the result which was reached by the jury. Now, we cannot say that I myself would feel extremely nervous if I knew that an express train was past due and I had to cross in front of it, my own train being past due also, and I had no means of knowing which would come first, or what would happen. It is true that in point of law the railway company are not bound to provide a bridge, and that the want of it will not per se make them liable; but it is surely a matter for the serious consideration of railway companies whether they should not even do things they are not bound to do in order to secure abundance dety to the public ; and seeing that all that was wanted here was a light foot-ridge for passengers to cross when an express train was about to pass without opping, it is surely matter for consideration whether it was not a mistake that ch a bridge had not been provided.

The same considerations apply to the second question, Whether there was ch rashness on the part of the late Mr Thomson in crossing at the time he id that the jury could say he had fairly and materially himself contributed to ne fatal accident. Here we must use an indefinite and flexible expression—material contribution,"—and here again it is just such an expression as the ry must deal with on a view of the whole circumstances of the case. The fact of the crossing of the line by a railway servant, who, though not on duty at the time, was dressed in uniform and had on a uniform cap—that and the other circumstances which have been already adverted to are so much for the jury to consider that I could not reach the conclusion I would need to reach in order to set aside the verdict, viz., that the jury, acting as sensible and intelligent men, had no evidence to go upon, and went right against the evidence in holding that Thomson did not materially contribute to the accident. Therefore I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

Lord JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in that result. Your Lordships are very clearly expressed the grounds upon which it has been reached, and I shall only make a very few observations. The question is one full of interest and importance both for railway companies and for the public. In the first place, I should be very slow to have disturbed this verdict, even if my own opinion had been otherwise, seeing that the Judge who tried the case is of opinion that the verdict is not contrary to the evidence he heard. Where a motion is made for a new trial on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence, I think that such a circumstance would of itself be an insuperable objection. But I entirely concur in the views which have been expressed, and indeed, I think I may say that, on the whole, the balance of my opinion is in favour of the verdict. It seems to me that the evidence justified the verdict, and that the verdict is not only not contrary to the evidence, but, on the whole, is in accordance with the evidence.

There are two questions here—first, Whether the railway company were guilty of negligence in not providing a safe mode for the passengers to cross this line from the south to the north side? and, secondly, Whether the deceased was guilty of negligence which materially contributed to the result—the result, I mean, that he was run over by this express train and killed on the spot.

Now, in regard to the first point, Whether the railway company took reasonable precautions to secure the safety of their passengers in crossing their line from the one side to the other—that they are bound to provide reasonable means is perfectly certain ; the question is whether they did so? and that, I think, was a question entirely for the jury. The jury are the judges of what are reasonable means, and I think it would be very difficult for us, on a body of evidence of this kind, to assume to ourselves the right to take that question out of the hands of the jury.

I may mention there was a case a few days ago in the Court of Appeal—Robson v. The North-Eastern Railway Company, 10th November 1876¹—where

No. 20.

 Thomson v.
 North British

that very question arose. It seems that in the Common Law Courts in England there had been a practice of considering this question of negligence or sufficient precaution as one for the Court; and in that case—which was the case of a train overrunning a station, and a woman getting out of one of the carriages and being materially injured—the presiding Judge took the case from the jury, and held that there was no evidence of negligence to go to them. The whole question came up before the Court of Appeal, and was very fully argued, and the result was that they held that the case of Bridges v. The North London Railway Company,¹ has settled that the question of sufficient precaution is entirely a question for the jury, and accordingly they upset the ruling of Justice Archibald in the case of Robson.

In regard to the question, What are reasonable means of crossing? it is said that the company are not bound to provide a bridge, and the case of Stubley referred to as having settled that point. But it is manifest that that case is entirely different from the present one. We are dealing here with a station upon a line with a great deal of continuous traffic, and I must say I do not entirely sympathise with all the observations which were made by Baron Pollock in that case. My impression is that there is a very great obligation laid upon a company where there is a line with a large through traffic, and many express trains not stopping at the station but going on; it is their duty to provide sufficient means of crossing; and it is no answer to say that that is encouraged by individuals not to look out for their own safety, because a very large proportion of those who travel by passenger lines consist of aged and infirm persons, women, and children—persons of whom you would not expect that in the darkness of a winter evening they shall have all the presence of mind that a man of health and strength ought to have. You must provide for them, and accordingly the question for the jury was whether sufficient means of crossing had been provided? What “sufficient” means I have been quite unable to ascertain from the evidence in this case. I find that when the unfortunate man arrived at the station there were at least two trains from the west over the line. Whether he knew anything about them or not I do not know. But this I know, that until the accident occurred there was never one moment in which he could have set his foot upon the permanent way with any assurance of safety. It is said he should have waited until his own train came up, and then crossed the line behind it. Now, I doubt greatly that that was incumbent upon him. The company were bound to afford him means of crossing in safety at the time his train was due. But supposing he had done that, and his own train had come up and stopped there, and an express from the east (for we have no express now) had come up at the rate of fifty miles an hour before he crossed—is that a safe mode to enable passengers to cross? The result is that there was no mode of enabling him to cross in safety that night, because the trains were entirely out of order, and no one could calculate upon when they would come up.

It is said that notice was given—and that is a very important element—if notice had been given this case would have been entirely different. On the very worst features against the company is that no notice whatever was given. The stationmaster says he was bound to give notice, and there is nothing easier than to have given that notice to the passengers assembled.

did not open his mouth until the unfortunate man was in the very act of ringing from the platform. Nothing can be more clear on the evidence than that; and therefore on the first of the questions I have referred to I have no doubt at all.

As regards the question of contributory negligence I have only to say that in the traffic in such a condition as it was, and with such an utter want of closure to the passengers of that which should have been disclosed to them, a state of matters that evening was really a trap for contributory negligence; and that the jury have not found that this man was guilty of contributory negligence when he attempted to cross the line under the belief that the approaching train was the train by which he was to travel. I do not think he was, and the jury did not think he was.

I shall only say, in conclusion, that I agree with what your Lordships have remarked about the bridge. A bridge is a safe mode of crossing at such a station, and if the company were wise they would adopt the precaution and take that mode, which is certainly a safe mode. That they are under a legal obligation to do so I am far from saying, but so long as they do not they will be exposed to actions of this kind. We discharge the rule.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Discharge the rule formerly granted to shew cause why the verdict in this case should not be set aside and a new trial granted: Refuse to grant a new trial: Further, apply the verdict, and decern in terms thereof in favour of the pursuer for £600: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses."

First—Charity—Scheme of Administration.—Circumstances in which the Court approved an alteration on the scheme of administration of an educational charity for the purpose of adapting it to the altered requirements of the time, and, inter alia, authorised the substitution of bursaries for the payment of apprentice fees.

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—1ST DIVISION.
This is a petition to the Court praying that the Court will make or sanction a new scheme for the management, regulation, and continuance of a certain charity established by the will of Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, who died in the year 1714. By that will Bishop Burnet left a sum of 40,000 merks, of which one-half was destined to the University of Aberdeen, and the other for the benefit of the parish of Salton in Lothian. It is with the latter half that we have to deal in the present case.

The Bishop assumes that the one-half destined to Salton parish will produce 1000 merks annually, and directs these 1000 merks to be thus disposed of—"Thirty children of the poorer sort shall be put to school to learn reading, writing, and casting accounts; to every one of these ten merks Scottish shall be given to cloath them, in plain grey cloaths, all of the sort—this is three hundred merks; after they have been four years at school, and are fit to be bound out to trades, or to follow husbandry, they shall receive forty merks a-piece—which is four hundred merks more; but this four hundred merks, during these four years that they are at school, shall be applied to the building a good schoolhouse near the churchyard, and for purchasing half an acre of ground for a garden and outlet to the schoolhouse. I appoint one hundred merks a-year in addition to the schoolmaster's allowance, and fifty merks a-year to the increase of the library began for the minister's house and use, of which he shall give an account to the Lairds of Salton and Hermistoun, and to any neighbouring ministers, which they shall be obliged to sign for his charge, unless they can shew reason to the contrary.' He then provided for the way in which the children are to be selected, giving the patron to a great extent to the land of Salton. And then he directs 'the remaining one hundred and fifty merks to be distributed yearly to the poor of the parish by the minister, with the approbation of the Lairds of Salton and Hermistoun, and such others as join with him in taking care of the poor of the parish.'

"That is the substance of the Bishop's bequest as it stands in his will, and the destinations of the fund may summarily be stated thus:—

300	merks	to clothe the children.
400	"	to put them out to trades.
100	"	to the schoolmaster.
50	"	to the library.
150	"	to the poor of the parish.

1000 merks in all.

"Some difficulty occurred at first in consequence of the testator having provided no means for carrying the charity into practical operation. A private Act, 22 Geo. II. No. 62, was, however, obtained in 1749, which provided for the appointment of trustees and the investment of the money in their names, and for its application to the purposes of the charity, subject to the control and direction of this Court.

"Under this statute a petition was presented to the Court in 1750, and an investigation having been made and report given in to the Court, the money was directed to be paid over to the then Lairds of Salton and Herdmanston and the minister of the parish of Salton as trustees, and to be invested by them, and the proceeds applied in terms of the Bishop's will. This was accordingly done, and the fund has been administered by the successive Lairds of Salton and Herdmanston and the ministers of Salton as trustees ever since without any material departure from the directions of the Bishop's will and the Act of 1749."

The income of the trust-funds from the first considerably exceeded the sum contemplated by Bishop Burnet, and consequently his scheme was inadequate to exhaust it. But the trustees, in the exercise of their discretion, applied such parts of the surplus as seemed to them to be necessary to supply the educational wants of the parish. By accumulative and judicious investments, and otherwise, the funds under their management were considerably increased, and the free income at the date of the petition was stated as averaging £85 per annum.

No change in the administration of the fund occurred until the passing of the Education Act of 1872. On the election of a school board for the parish of Salton an action was raised to determine to what, if to any extent, the funds administered by the trustees fell to be paid over to the school board under the 46th section of the Education Act. In this action it was determined that only the 100 merks a-year appointed by Bishop Burnet's will to be paid as an addition to the salary of the schoolmaster of the parish fell to be accounted for to the school board, and that the rustees were entitled to retain and administer the remainder as here- No. 21.

fore.

In view of the altered circumstances, however, the trustees judged it expedient to apply to the Court under their Act 22 Geo. II. No. 62, to settle a new scheme for the administration of the charity. Nov. 17, 1876.
Burnet's
Trustees.

This petition was accordingly presented to the First Division by Mr Fletcher of Salton and Lord Sinclair of Herdmanston, two of the trustees, the other trustee, the Rev. Mr Drummond, being called as a respondent, on the ground that he had only a few days before been presented to the parish, and had no knowledge of the affairs of the trust.

The trustees proposed a new scheme which, as amended and subsequently approved of by the Court, was as follows :—

"The whole funds and estate bequeathed by the late Bishop Burnet for the purpose of carrying into effect the provision for settling an endowment for behoof of the parish of Salton, contained in his will, and codicil thereto, both dated 24th October 1711, shall continue to be held by the Lairds of Salton and Herdmanston, and the minister of the parish for the time being (hereinafter called 'the trustees') as trustees for the administration of said fund, and shall be applied by them for the uses, ends, and purposes hereinafter specified, viz. :—

"I. The whole interests and annual profits derived from the said funds and estate shall be expended by the trustees as nearly as may be in manner set forth in the following state :—

Annual income—say	£85	0	0
Deduct—
Annual payment to school board or to teacher of public school of Salton, £5, 11s. 1 ¹ / ₂ d.—say	£5	12	0
For expenses of management, &c.—say	5	8	0
		11	0 0
		£74	0 0

Divisible as follows :—

1. For purchase of books and maintenance of Burnet Library—	£5	0	0
2. For distribution among poor persons in said parish in manner after-mentioned :—	10	0	0
3. For education of thirty children, school fees, school books, &c.,	30	0	0
4. For bursaries for four more advanced scholars, of £7, 5s. per annum each,	29	0	0
		£74	0 0

"VI. The share of annual income above provided for the education of thirty children shall be administered as follows :—Thirty children of the poorer sort shall be nominated from the children residing in the said parish as follows, viz.—twenty by the Laird of Salton and ten by the minister; or otherwise, if the Laird of Salton and the minister approve thereof, by the trustees or their quorum in ordinary meeting assembled. Each child so nominated shall be entitled to the benefits of the fund for four years, unless the trustees shall see cause to remove any child from the fund on account of misconduct, of which the trustees shall be sole judges, or because such child has ceased, in the opinion of the trustees, to belong to the class of children whom the truster designed to benefit.

 Trustees.

"VII. The trustees shall expend a sum not exceeding £1 sterling per annum for behoof of each of said thirty children, said sum to be applied in the first instance, to payment of school fees, and the remainder shall be expended for school books, or in such other way as the trustees shall think best.

"VIII. The children to be chosen shall not be below five or above ten years of age at the date of their nomination, and it shall be in the power of the trustees to direct to which school in the parish said children shall attend, and to take measures for securing the regular attendance of the children at such school. The education to be afforded to the said thirty children shall comprehend English reading and grammar, geography, arithmetic, writing, and religious instruction, according to use and wont.

"IX. The share of annual income above provided for bursaries, which shall be called the Burnet Bursaries, shall be administered as follows:—The trustees shall each year choose from among the children on the fund one child to receive and hold for four years one of said bursaries, to be paid to or applied by the trustees for behoof of said child while continuing his or her education in one or other of the schools in said parish, or at any other school that the trustees may select, or while learning sea trade or business as may be approved of by the trustees.

"X. The bursars may be selected by the trustees either by means of oral or written competitive examination, or without such examination; and the trustees shall have power, at the end of any year, to remove such bursar from the benefits of the fund if such bursar shall have been guilty of misconduct, of which the trustees shall be sole judges, or has ceased in the opinion of the trustees, to belong to the class of children properly entitled to the benefit of the fund."

Appearance was made and answers lodged for the minister, and also for certain of the parishioners.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After the introductory narrative quoted supra)—The trustees now suggest that some alteration should be made on the scheme of administration of the charity to adapt it better to the requirements of the times, and to render it more useful. They represent that the application of four hundred merks to the payment of apprentice fees is no longer a desirable or practicable arrangement; that Salton is a purely agricultural district, and that the practice of apprenticing children to agriculture has long ceased to be known in this country; and that not only is the expenditure of the money in apprentice fees as directed by the Bishop practically impossible, but it may be more judiciously and expediently employed in furthering otherwise the objects of the charity. There is no design to divert any of the funds from the use specified by the testator. On the contrary, under the proposed scheme, the thirty children will still receive the whole proceeds of the funds, except what was directed to be distributed among the poor, &c.

The scheme which the petitioners propose is thus stated in a tabular form. The income of the fund which has very considerably increased in their hands now amounts to an average of £85 per annum. Deducting £5, 12s., which they are bound to pay to the school board or to the teacher of the public school of Salton, and say £5, 8s. for expenses of management, in all £11, there remains £74. This they propose to distribute as follows:—

1. For purchase of books and maintenance of Burnet Library,	£5	0	0	No. 21.
2. For distribution among the poor of the parish,	10	0	0
3. For education of thirty children, school fees, school books, &c.,	30	0	0	Nov. 17, 1876. Burnet's Trustees.
4. For bursaries for four more advanced scholars of £7, 5s. per annum each,	29	0	0

Now, it is the last proposal to institute bursaries that raises the main question for consideration. The money sought to be so disposed of is obtained by taking the apprentice fees and applying them to this purpose. The trustees being of opinion that it is neither expedient nor practicable any longer to devote this portion of their income to payment of apprentice fees, suggest that these bursaries come very near to the main design of the testator, and, in the altered circumstances of the case, afford the most expedient method of applying the fund.

This appears to me to be very reasonable, and I am of opinion that it is quite within the power of the Court to sanction such a deviation from the original scheme. I think we must accept the fact that it is no longer expedient to apply any part of the funds towards paying apprentice fees, and that being so, there is no more expedient way that presents itself to my mind of employing the funds so to be liberated, in accordance with the purpose of the testator—namely, the advancement of the children in life after their elementary education is finished—than by instituting the proposed bursaries.

I am therefore inclined so far to approve of the trustees' scheme.

The other change proposed is one certainly in accordance with modern ideas. Three hundred marks were to be expended in clothing the children in a uniform of plain grey clothes, to distinguish those on the Bishop's charity from the rest of the children at the school. It is proposed to abolish this uniform as creating an unnecessary and invidious distinction, and instead, to apply the money, in the first instance, to the payment of school fees, and the remainder to the purchase of school books, and in such other way as the trustees shall think best—by which it was explained that the trustees intended, when the surplus is sufficient, to apply it to the purchase of some necessary articles of clothing for the children, such as boots, &c. This appears to me to be a slight and expedient change in the administration of the fund to which we ought to give effect.

These are the two main points of difference between the proposed new scheme and that which has hitherto been followed.

There are one or two minor points in which we shall require the scheme to be altered before approving it. I have noted them on a copy of the scheme, and think it is unnecessary to mention them farther.

The only other point to be noticed is the objection which was made to the eighth head of the proposed scheme, in that it gives the trustees power "to direct to which school in the parish said children shall attend." It is objected that there should be no choice of schools, that the children should be obliged to attend the school board school, and no other. I do not think the matter was ever in the contemplation of the founder, and that we should therefore regulate it simply by present expediency. There are two schools in the parish,—the one under the school board, and the other under private management, but admittedly placed where an additional school is much required. Now, it

No. 21. appears to me to be most desirable that if any of the thirty children are resident in the neighbourhood of this second school, and at a distance from the first school, the trustees should have the option of sending them to the second school. I think, therefore, that this objection is not well-founded.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I concur. I had at first some doubt as to the proposal about the bursaries and superseding the provision as to clothing. But I am satisfied, from the explanations made in the petition and at the bar, that neither the clothing directions nor those applicable to apprentice fees are suited to the existing state of things in the district, and that some alterations now require to be made in the rules and regulations of the charity. And as the money under the proposed new scheme is to be applied for the benefit of the precise same class of beneficiaries as those contemplated by the founder, although in a somewhat different manner, I think that the scheme as now proposed may be approved of, with the alterations which have been suggested by your Lordship.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Approve of the 'amended scheme' appended to the petition, No. 1 of process, as the 'scheme for the management, regulation, and continuance of the fund mortified by the late Dr Gilbert Burnet, Lord Bishop of Salisbury, for behoof of the parish of Salton:' Interpone authority thereto, and decern: Appoint the expenses of the petitioners and of the respondent, the Reverend Thomas Ninian Drummond, to be taxed by the Auditor, to be paid out of the funds in the hands of the petitioners," &c.

MRS COCKBURN ROSS died in 1872 vested in the lands of Shandwick as heir under the entail of William Ross of Shandwick.

Competing petitions for service as heir to Mrs Cockburn Ross were presented by several parties to the Sheriff of Chancery, and were appealed to the Court, and the case was tried on several issues before the Lord President and a jury, and a verdict returned on 27th July 1876 in favour of J. Ross Duncan and the trustees of A. G. Reid, two of the competing petitioners.

In the course of the trial the deposition of Alexander Mackenzie, carpenter, Balintore, Ross-shire, aged 85, taken on adjusted interrogatories was tendered on behalf of Mrs Macpherson and A. R. Robertson, who claimed as heirs-portioners of the entail. Their case was that the great-grandfather of Mrs Macpherson and of Robertson's mother was an uncle of the entail.

Counsel for Duncan and for Reid's trustees objected to the evidence, and the Lord President rejected the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 18th answers, except the passages within brackets in the 13th and 18th.*

Macpherson et al. v. Reid's Trustees et al.

On a bill of exceptions for Mrs Macpherson and Robertson they argued;—The rule of the law of Scotland was that the evidence of a deceased person was admissible, if he had had an opportunity or might be supposed to have had an opportunity of knowledge. The English rule was understood to start from the point that hearsay evidence was not admissible at all, but the rule was relaxed in cases of pedigree to the extent of admitting the statements of deceased members of the family. The ruling of the judge was in effect to apply the English rule. But that was not the law of Scotland, and other people might have better opportunities of knowledge than members of the family. The two important facts were the burial of George Ross' wife in the Shandwick burying-ground, and the fact that a man who knew George Ross said that he went to Sweden. The test was whether the evidence of those persons would have been admissible if they were alive, and it would have been admissible¹

Argued for Duncan and Reid's trustees;—(1) This was hearsay of a kind which the law did not recognise; and (2) it was not evidence at all. The early rule was to exclude hearsay.² The rule was very slowly relaxed. Hume on Crimes, 2, 406, seemed to confine the exceptions to cases of deathbed. The present rule was not older than the present century, that every pertinent statement made by a dead man might be moved by a person who heard it if it was made in unsuspicious circumstances. But how far was that rule to be carried? The evidence of a dead man would only be admitted if it could be shewn that he had special means of knowledge. But this was an attempt to prove mere rumour. It would not have been evidence from a living witness, and could not be made so because the persons were dead.³

* 12. Who was the paternal grandfather of the said George Ross of Lochee; what was his occupation; where did he live; did he go abroad; if so, where did he go? Deposes—The paternal grandfather of the said George Ross of Lochee was George Ross, who was the uncle of William Ross of Shandwick. He stayed sometime at Tarrel, working there, and was married there, and got a son, and then took into his head to go to Sweden, where he stopped the rest of his days.

13. Was the said grandfather of George Ross of Lochee married before he went abroad; if so, what was his wife's name; had he any child or children by his said wife, and what was or were the name or names of such child or children; when and where did his wife die? State the grounds of your knowledge. Deposes—Yes. The grandfather of George Ross of Lochee was married before he went abroad, and had one son, whom he called Andrew, after his own father, Andrew Ross of Shandwick, and this last Andrew, who was Andrew Geodh, had his son George Ross, Lochee, George, after his father, George Ross, of Shandwick. The wife of the grandfather of George Ross of Lochee was Merran or Margaret Manson. George, who went abroad, had no child but Andrew by his wife Merran. He did not wait long with her. Merran was stopping with her son Andrew on the Loans of Tullich, where Andrew had a bit farm. She died sometime before Andrew, and was buried in the Shandwick burial-ground, where Andrew himself was buried the year before William Ross of Shandwick—that is, Andrew was buried the year before William Ross of Shandwick. Merna died at Tullich in her son's house. I knew this by all the neighbours. There was no word about it till William Ross of Shandwick was killed, and there was a great talk about who was the heir of Shandwick. I heard this from many, particularly from John Polson, the elder, Hill of Fearn. He died about eleven years ago, and was then, I believe, about eighty-nine years of age. [Also from John Vass, Ballintore, who was at William Ross of Shandwick's funeral. John Vass is now dead. He died some time ago, and was about eighty years of age when he died. John Vass has told me that at the funeral of William Ross, the entailer of Shandwick, he got on a gravestone to get a good view, and saw the coffin taken out of the hearse, and heard Simon Graham, the grave-digger of Fearn, call aloud,—‘Where is George Ross, the heir, till he put his friend's head in the grave?'] That was George Ross, Lochee. I have also heard these things from William Ross, farmer, Hill of Fearn, who himself was well acquainted with George Ross, Tarrel. He is also dead a long time ago. Also from Donald Munro, Loans of Tullich, who is also dead a long time ago. And Alexander Hendry, Tullich, who died a long time since,—I am sure fifty years since. All these died old men. It was the common talk of the country. These men I have named above I remember myself to have heard speak of these matters. They would often come to my father's house on a winter evening when I was a boy from ten to thirteen, and they would always have some story to speak about, and I, as young boys are, was very ready to take it up.

“14. Where was the father of the said George Ross of Lochee buried; what was his wife buried; and where was his mother buried? State the grounds of your knowledge. Depones—The father of the said George Ross of Lochee was buried in the Shandwick chapel at Fearn, and his wife and his mother were buried there also. I stated the grounds of my knowledge of this in my answers to the last interrogatory.

“15. Was there any relationship between the father of the said George Ross of Lochee and William Ross, the entailer of Shandwick? If so, state what was the relationship. State the grounds of your knowledge. Depones—Andrew Ross, the father of George Ross of Lochee, was the first cousin of William Ross, the entailer of Shandwick. The father of the said Andrew was George, who was brother to David, called Dhai Mhore, the father of William Ross, the entailer. I know this as I know the matter stated in my answer to the thirteenth interrogatory.

“18. Had Andrew Ross of Shandwick, the grandfather of William Ross, the entailer, any other sons besides the entailer's father David; if so, what were their names? State what you know of their history; state the grounds of your knowledge. Depones—He had. His first son was Andrew Ross, who was merchant in Tain. The next was Alexander, who had no family; and the next was David, the father of William, the entailer; and the next was George, the youngest of all. He had none but the four sons that I heard of. I never heard of a son called Walter, nor of one called Charles, nor of one called Farquhar. I never heard of a son of his called William, a writer in Edinburgh. I never heard of a son called Hugh, nor of a son called Robert. I heard that Andrew Ross, merchant in Tain, and son to Andrew Ross of Shandwick, had a daughter called Mary, who married Bailie Reid of Tain, from whom is descended the claimant Reid, and another daughter called Catherine, who was married to David Ross, commissary-clerk, Tain, from whom is descended the claimant Duncan. I remember John Polson, the elder, at Fearn, telling me that shortly after William Ross, the entailer, came to Shandwick he, Polson, was present while a conversation took place between his father George Polson and Andrew Ross Geodh. George Polson said in this conversation to Andrew Geodh, ‘You'll be a ;’

[age, who was examined on commission ; and as I read that evidence there were mainly two things in his testimony which, if admitted, were considered of importance to the cause of the party taking the exception. Mackenzie says that George Ross, the paternal grandfather of George Ross of Lochee, and who is said to have gone to Sweden, was a member of the Shandwick family ; and he says that the wife of George of Lochee was Merran or Margaret Manson, who died after she had gone to Sweden, and that she was buried in the Shandwick burying-place. It was contended at the trial that there were two George Rosses, and a great deal came to turn upon whether the claimants were descended from the one or the other. If they were descended from George Ross the member of the Shandwick family, that was a material point for them ; but if they were descended from a George Ross who was not a member of the Shandwick family, then, of course, this step in their descent was of no value to them. Now, the date when George Ross, the paternal grandfather of George Ross of Lochee, is said to have gone to Sweden does not, I think, very distinctly appear, but it is plainly a very old story, and it is not pretended that the witness Mackenzie could know anything about it except from what he had heard from or through parties long dead. So, likewise with regard to the question whether Merran or Margaret Manson was buried in the Shandwick burying-ground,—that also was a very old story. I cannot discover exactly the date which is attributed to it, but it is obviously an old story, of which the witness Mackenzie could know nothing except from what came down to him through people long dead. Now, there can be no question that according to the law of Scotland the testimony of a living witness as to what he heard from a dead witness is, in certain circumstances, admissible. So far as we know, the law of England upon that subject it is not the same as ours ; and it is not safe, therefore, to reason from the one to the other ; which of the two is the best law it is unnecessary to inquire, because there can be no doubt at all that the law of Scotland is as I have stated it to be. One thing, however, is essential, particularly in a question of pedigree such as we have here, that the dead witness from whom the information is said to have been derived should appear to have had some special means of knowledge of the thing or things to which he is said to have spoken. I do not say that this special means of knowledge must consist in being a member of the particular family whose genealogy is in question. If he was a member of that family that would be very important in the question of the admissibility of his evidence. But it is quite conceivable that he might have very special means of knowledge although not a member of that particular family. But, as regards the traditional things spoken to by this witness Mackenzie, it does not appear that the dead people from whom they are said to have been derived had any special means of knowledge at all. Coupling this with the great antiquity of the things which are said to have so come down,—the vagueness as to the time when this witness is said to have come to their knowledge,—and particularly with the manner in which he says he came to hear of them, it appears to me that your Lordship was quite right in holding his evidence, so far as rejected, not to be admissible. So far as he says he heard man now since this rich friend of yours came here,' and that Andrew answered, 'Well, supposing he died without a family my children would have a right to all he would leave.' Mr Hood told me how many sons there were of Andrew Ross of Shandwick, besides other people. I don't see any occasion to give you any more of the history of the sons of Andrew Ross of Shandwick."

No. 22. these things from particular individuals, there certainly is neither allegation nor reason to believe that these individuals had any special means of knowledge, and so far as regards the very important part of the case as to Merran or Margareta Manson being buried in the Shandwick burying-ground, it will be remarked that that does not appear ever to have been taken notice of at all by anybody until William Ross of Shandwick was killed in a duel, as I understand it, in the year 1790, which was before the witness was born. Then it appears, from his own evidence, that he heard nothing of it until he was from ten to thirteen years of age, so that all that time, at least, after the period at which he says there had first come to be any word about it, must have elapsed before he himself could have heard of it; and although he mentions the names of persons from whom he says he heard what he speaks to, he sums up the whole by saying "it was the common talk of the country. These men I have named above I remember myself to have heard speak of these matters. They would often come to my father's house on a winter evening when I was a boy from ten to thirteen, and they would always have some story to speak about; and I, as young boys are, was very ready to take it up." This he makes applicable to the whole matters of which he had previously spoken, which seem to resolve them into neither more nor less than rumours among persons who, according to his evidence, had no special means of knowledge of and nothing to do with the matters spoken of at all, but who were talking among themselves for their mutual entertainment, and exchanging stories which might or might not be true, but of which they knew no more than the rest of the public. Now, while undoubtedly we admit the statements of dead witnesses to be proved under certain circumstances, it must appear that the circumstances are such as to shew that some reliance can be placed upon the evidence. They must amount to something of value in the way of evidence, and if they are of no value in the way of evidence I do not think the Judge at the trial is either bound or entitled to let them go to the jury when it would be his duty to tell the jury that they ought not to consider them at all. It is not, properly speaking, a question of competency. It is not incompetent to put questions as to what dead persons may have said. But if these dead persons had themselves no means of knowledge,—if it is plain upon the face of the thing that the testimony in regard to their statements ought not to be listened to by the jury, then the evidence becomes inadmissible, because it is really no evidence at all. The testimony rejected here might have misled the jury, but could not have been matter for their consideration, and therefore, without at all trenching upon any general rule of the law of Scotland, I think it was quite rightly rejected.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. The witness Mackenzie who was born in 1790, is brought to speak to the relationship of a George Ross of Tarrel, who is said to have been one of the Shandwick family, and to have left this country somewhere about the year 1738, to the two claimants, Mr Macpherson and Mr Ross Robertson. It is proposed to prove this by what Mackenzie heard from other people. Now, the rule which has been followed in practice, and which has been most authoritatively laid down by Lord Chalmers in the case of Alexander in the House of Lords, is that such evidence is competent only where the parties, whose statements it is proposed to prove, were either actually related to, or had some peculiar means of knowing the parties whose relationship they are speaking to. In this case, the first part of the evidence

lence that was rejected was the answer to this question, "Who was the paternal grandfather of the said George Ross of Lochee; what was his occupation; where did he live; did he go abroad; if so, where did he go? Depones—The paternal grandfather of the said George Ross of Lochee was George Ross, who was the uncle of William Ross of Shandwick. He stayed some time at Tarrel working here, and was married there, and got one son, and then took into his head to go to Sweden, where he stopped the rest of his days." Now, it is admitted that the George Ross who went to Sweden died in 1783; that is, seven years before the witness Mackenzie was born. Consequently, it is plain that the statements which he thus makes cannot have been within his own knowledge, and that he must have heard of them from somebody else. He is not asked to give any reason or ground for his knowledge of the facts he is called on to speak to; and having regard to the fact that he is speaking to events which took place relative to a man who died seven years before he himself was born, I think that his evidence was inadmissible, because there is nothing to shew what were his grounds of knowledge as to matters about which he himself could not have known anything. In the next answer he gives the grounds of his knowledge in regard to the facts which he is there questioned about; and what we have now to dispose of is whether they are such as would have warranted the Judge at the trial in admitting the evidence. I am of opinion that they are not. The statement in the answer as to how he heard about these things appears to me to be nothing more than the ordinary gossip of the country which the witness seems to have heard, according to his own account, somewhere about the beginning of this century, from men who were friends of his father, and who used to come about his father's house when he was a boy. He gives the names of the persons to whom he refers, and whose statements it is proposed should be admitted as evidence. But they are in no sense of the word relations of the family of Ross of Shandwick, and there is nothing to shew that they had any peculiar means of knowledge of what they were speaking about; and when one comes to examine the account the witness gives of the matter, it does not appear that the persons he names could have had any knowledge themselves of the more important facts which he says he heard them state. Because, taking, in the first place, the statements of John Polson, whom he particularly refers to, what he says about him is—"I heard this from many, particularly from John Polson, the elder, Hill of Fearn. He died about eleven years ago, and was then, I believe, about eighty-nine years of age." Now, if he died eleven years ago at eighty-nine years of age, he must have been born in 1775; so that what the witness says he heard from Polson took place before Polson was born, because one of the things he says Polson spoke to was that George Ross, Tarrel, went to Sweden, and it is admitted he went there about the year 1738, thirty-seven years before Polson was born. He could not therefore have had any knowledge himself of what George Ross.

The only other person, whose evidence was strongly pressed upon us as that of a person with peculiar means of knowledge was William Ross, as to whom Mackenzie says—"I have also heard these things from William Ross, farmer, Hill of Fearn, who himself was well acquaint with George Ross, Tarrel." Of course, Mackenzie could not know that William Ross was well acquainted with George Ross, Tarrel, because Mackenzie was not born till after the death of George Ross. But reading his evidence to the effect that William Ross told him he was well acquainted with George Ross, I think this evidence was not evidence to go to the jury, because William Ross is not shewn to have had any peculiar means of knowing about the Shandwick family, and we have, moreover, not got the period of his death. Mackenzie says he died a long time ago. And assuming that he died thirty or even forty years ago, that would make him die about 1836, and in that view William Ross could not have been well acquainted with George at the time he left this country in 1738 unless he was upwards of a hundred years old, which it is not proved he was when he died. So that when the evidence is looked at in detail in this way it appears to me to be open to even more serious objection than the general one I have alluded to, and to be nothing more than the common gossip of the country side, which cannot be received.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that in questions of pedigree, family tradition, if it have a relevant bearing on the question at issue, is admissible in evidence. But on the other hand, it is equally clear that the gossip of the locality in which the family is planted is quite inadmissible; and it appears to me that every question like that now before us must be tested by the consideration whether the information which is sought to be given in evidence belongs to the one class or the other. Family tradition is not only admissible in evidence, but if it be a well established and constant family tradition, it may be very important and valuable evidence. But, then, to make a family tradition, you must have the fact intended to be proved—as, for example, the relation of father and son between two persons—shewn to have been matter of belief within the family, and handed down from one generation to another. The difference in this respect between the law of Scotland and the law of England I take to be, that such family tradition can be proved in the law of England only by the direct testimony of members of the family. By direct testimony I do not mean the testimony of the witness in the box, but the statement of deceased members of the family, made seriously and deliberately to the person who is put in the box; whereas, according to the law of Scotland, we admit such statements repeated at second hand, if they have been made by persons who, though not members of the family, have special means of knowledge. I think our rule in this respect is a rational and intelligible rule. It is quite possible that though in the general case members of the family will have the best means of knowledge, there may be members of the family who, from accidental circumstances, know very little about the family pedigree and lineage; whereas, on the other hand, there may be confidential servants who have been a long time in the family, or very intimate friends, who have much more peculiar means of knowledge and of hearing the family traditions than members of the family who may be absent and out of the country or otherwise estranged. I think it is the means of knowledge, therefore, that ought to be the test of the value of any statement made by a deceased person and repeated in the witness-box. Both laws equally exclude, I apprehend, anything like common gossip; that is to say, talk between persons who have no special means of knowledge whatever. Now, the evidence which I excluded in the present case was evidence brought, no doubt, to establish a very important fact—the fact that the paternal grandfather of Mrs Macpherson's father was a member of the Shandwick family, the youngest uncle of the entail. His name was George, and there is no doubt that such a man existed. Mrs Macpherson's object was to trace her pedigree from that George. The case against her was that although she was apparently descended from a George Ross, that George Ross was a different man from the George Ross of the Shandwick family.

rick family. Now, under the 12th interrogatory the witness Mackenzie is No. 22.
 asked, "Who was the paternal grandfather of the said George Ross of Lochee; ^{Nov. 17, 1876.}
 what was his occupation; where did he live; did he go abroad; if so, where ^{Macpherson} did he go?" (George Ross of Lochee was the father of Mrs Macpherson.) His ^{et al. v. Reid's} answer is, "The paternal grandfather of the said George Ross of Lochee was ^{Trustees et al.} George Ross, who was the uncle of William Ross of Shandwick. He stayed some time at Tarrel, working there, and was married there, and got one son, and then took into his head to go to Sweden, where he stopped the rest of his days."
 Now, taking that answer by itself, I agree with Lord Mure that it is plainly inadmissible upon the face of it, because the witness is speaking to events which it is proved must have occurred before he was born, and therefore he could not speak to them of his own knowledge. If that interrogatory and answer, therefore, had stood alone, they would have been plainly inadmissible upon that simple ground. But I was rather inclined at the trial, and I am still inclined, to take a more lenient view of this question and answer, and to connect them with the 13th interrogatory and the answer thereto. There are some farther particulars given there, not so important as what I have read, respecting that George Ross, and then the witness proceeds to say from whom he derived his information; and I think the statement as to the persons from whom he derived his information was intended to be applicable to the information contained in the answers both to the 12th and 13th interrogatories. So I read the deposition, which is undoubtedly the most favourable way for the party taking the exception to read it. Now, this is his means of knowledge—"I knew this by all the neighbours.
 There was no word about it till William Ross of Shandwick was killed, and there was a great talk about who was the heir to Shandwick. I heard this from many, particularly from John Polson, the elder, Hill of Fearn. He died about eleven years ago; and was then, I believe, about eighty-nine years of age. Also from John Vass, Balintore, who was at William Ross of Shandwick's funeral."
 Then there is interposed a passage regarding what happened at the funeral; and as John Vass, from whom the information was derived, was at the funeral himself and communicated what took place there to the deponent, I admitted that part of the evidence. But after that he goes on further—"I have also heard these things from William Ross, farmer, Hill of Fearn, who himself was well acquaint with George Ross, Tarrel. He is also dead a long time ago. Also from Donald Munro, Loans of Tullich, who is also dead a long time ago; and Alexander Hendry, Tullich, who died a long time since—I am sure fifty years since. All these died old men. It was the common talk of the country. These men I have named above I remember myself to have heard speak of these matters. They would often come to my father's on a winter evening when I was a boy from ten to thirteen, and they would always have some story to speak about, and I, as young boys are, was very ready to take it up." Now, I can hardly conceive a more graphic description of mere gossip than is contained in that part of the deposition, and it was upon that ground, and because it was not shewn, or even alleged, that any one of the persons from whom the witness' information was derived had any peculiar means of knowledge, that it appeared to me that the evidence was inadmissible. There was one person from whom the witness received information—William Ross, farmer, Hill of Fearn—who was represented to have special means of knowledge, for he was well acquainted with George Ross of Tarrel. Now, in the first place, it appears to me that the statement that William Ross was well acquainted with George Ross of Tarrel de-

No. 22. pende entirely upon the testimony of the deponent Alexander Mackenzie himself, who could not know the fact. But even if the meaning of this statement is that Nov. 17, 1876. William Ross, Hill of Fearn, told the deponent that he was well acquainted with Macpherson George Ross of Tarrel, I should not think that that improved the matter in the et al. v. Reid's Trustees et al. least, because I think it requires to be established in some other way than by a mere loose statement of the party from whom the witness' information is derived that he had some means of knowledge; it requires something more than that to shew that the informant of the witness was a person possessed of special knowledge. And after all, what special knowledge arose from the fact that he was acquainted—well acquainted, as it is expressed—with George Ross? What the nature of that acquaintance was we are not told. It was apparently a mere acquaintance—no relationship—no special bond of friendship between them—nothing at all indicating that this George Ross had any reason to place confidence in this William Ross of Hill of Fearn, so that this part of the deposition, when it comes to be examined and analysed, really drops into the general pool of scandal and gossip, which is the only thing reproduced in the testimony of Mackenzie.

THE COURT disallowed the exceptions.

Lord-Adv. Watson—R. Johnstone.

Railway—Minerals—Statutory Purchase—Sale—Servitude.—A proprietor sold to a railway company "the perpetual servitude and right to use and occupy so much of" certain ground "as is at present used and occupied by the pillars or pillars of their viaduct."

The private Act of Parliament of the company contained provisions similar to those afterwards enacted by the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to the effect that minerals were excepted from the conveyance of lands purchased by the company, but that the company might acquire the minerals within forty yards of their works on payment of compensation.

In a question between the railway company and the proprietor and lessee of the minerals the company maintained that they were entitled to prevent the minerals from being worked under and near the viaduct, so as to endanger the viaduct, without any compensation, because they had purchased a servitude of support, which implied that their works would not be endangered. Held that the right acquired by the company was subject to the same conditions in regard to payment of compensation for minerals as a statutory conveyance of the land in ordinary form.

1ST DIVISION. BY disposition, dated 7th November 1845, John Wilson of Dundyvar.
Lord Young. sold, alienated, and disposed to the Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge
B. Railway Company a stripe of ground extending to one acre, two rods, five poles, "bounded on the north . . . , on the east by the piece of ground belonging to me, the minerals whereof are in the second place scribed, at all times when necessary, for inspecting or repairing the said iaduct or works connected therewith, which perpetual right so granted ll be, as it is hereby declared to be, and remain in all time coming, a urden and servitude in favour of the said railway company and their oresaids affecting the piece of ground in the second place above described, and my remaining lands of Muirend and Dundyvan after described."

The disposition bore to be in implement of the award of certain arbiters (to whom, by submissions dated in November 1844 and May 1845, the parties had referred Wilson's claims against the company for the value of land and minerals taken by them), and in consideration of the sums paid under the award of the arbiters.

In 1873 Wilson's trustees let the minerals of the Dundyvan property for nineteen years to the Drumpeller Coal Company, of which Robert Henderson was a partner, and in 1874 Henderson bought the property.

In 1875 the workings of the coal company approached within forty ards of the viaduct. They gave a statutory notice under the Lands auses Act, 1845, section 71, to the Caledonian Railway Company, now n right of the previous company. The railway company desired the coal company not to work the minerals near the viaduct, and ultimately the compensation to be paid by the railway company for coal under and near the viaduct was fixed by a jury on 12th April 1876 at £733.

Two days previously, however, the railway company raised an action against the proprietor and lessees, concluding for declarator that Wilson by his disposition had imposed on himself and the lands the burden and servitude of giving support to the viaduct, and that the defenders were not entitled to work the minerals so as to withdraw the support. They at the same time brought a relative suspension and interdict.

The defence was that Wilson's disposition was granted subject to the provisions of the Act of Parliament of the Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coat-edge Railway Company,* and therefore that if the railway company demanded that the coal should not be worked they must pay for it.

* vii. and viii. Vict. cap. 87, dated July 19, 1844, section 56. — "And with respect to any mines of coal, ironstone, lime, slate, or other minerals under any land owned by the company, be it enacted that the company shall not be entitled to any such mines or minerals, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away, or used in the construction of the railway and works by this Act authorised, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly thereby conveyed, but providing that the owners thereof shall not have power to make openings in the surface of the lands so to be acquired by the company."

Section 84. — "And for the purpose of protecting the railway and works from danger to be apprehended from the working of any mines either under or closely djoining the railway, be it enacted that if the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway or any of the works connected therewith, or within forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention

Shortly afterwards Henderson and Dimmack, the partners of the Drummeller Coal Company, raised an action against the railway company for payment of the £733, on the ground that the proceedings constituted a concluded purchase at that price, but this contention was not pressed in the sequel.

The three processes were conjoined, and the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the declarator assolvies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses. In the suspension and interdict repels the reasons of suspension, refuses the interdict, recalls the interdict formerly granted, and decerns: Finds the complainers liable in expenses. And in the ordinary action at the instance of Henderson and Dimmack against the Caledonian Railway Company decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders, the railway company, liable in expenses," &c.*

so to do thirty days before the commencement of working; and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the company to cause such mines to be inspected by any person appointed by them for the purpose; and if it appears to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be willing to make compensation for such mines to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work the same; and if the company and such owner do not agree as to the amount of such compensation the same shall be settled as in other cases of disputed compensation."

Section 85.—"And be it enacted that if before the expiration of such thirty days the company do not state their willingness to treat with such owner, lessee, or occupier for the payment of such compensation, it shall be lawful for him to work the said mines so that the same be done in manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof; and if any damage or obstruction be occasioned to the railway or works by improper working of such mines the same shall be forthwith repaired or removed, as the case may require, by the owner, lessee, or occupier of such mines or minerals, and at his own expense; and if such repair or removal be not forthwith done it shall be lawful for the company to execute the same and recover from such owner, lessee, or occupier the expense occasioned thereby, by action in any competent Court."

* "OPINION.—There is here no question about imperilling the stability of the railway viaduct by mineral workings. The minerals which the railway company have signified their desire to have left unworked for the safety of the viaduct are to be left alone in any view of the rights of parties. The railway company on the usual notice from the mineral owners, and no doubt after due consideration of the matter by skilled advisers, intimated the extent under and around the viaduct to which they desired that the minerals should be left unworked, and their willingness to make compensation; and the amount of the compensation has in fact been ascertained by jury trial under the statute. I only notice the question whether the valuation proceedings ought not to have been under the special Act instead of (as they were) the general Act, in order to observe with satisfaction that the pursuers, in defence to the action for the sum awarded, make no point of this, but express their willingness 'to hold the sum awarded by the jury as the price of the minerals in question, should they ultimately be found liable.' The defenders (the mineral owners) do not threaten to invade the prohibited bounds, and the question, whether or not the railway company are liable for the compensation awarded, is to be considered without any apprehensions for the safety of the viaduct, which may be held secured to the company's satisfaction.

"It was apparently an afterthought on the part of the railway company to dispute their liability to make compensation for the minerals which they requested to be left unworked for the safety of their viaduct, but they are none the less entitled to succeed if the law be with them, although in that case it must be easily regretted that the cost of a seven days' jury trial should have been needily incurred. But, indeed, it is in any view very unfortunate that a trial of ch dimensions should be possible about the exact worth of the coal situated nder a railway viaduct; and a litigation on the back of it, forming the subject of no less than three actions in this Court, to determine whether the trial was ot after all an idle proceeding, which might have been avoided by an earlier attention to the legal rights of the company, is more unfortunate still.

"The question which I have to consider is, whether or not the railway comany are liable for the amount (£733, 19s. 9d.) ascertained and awarded against hem in these proceedings of their own institution?"

"The respondents are the lessees and occupiers, and one of them is the owner, of the minerals in question: that is not disputed. Had the railway company purchased the land under which they lie, it is, I think, clear that the company must have paid for these minerals which they desired the owner (I confine myself to one title for convenience) not to work. The complainers dispute this on the authority of the case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprott, June 16, 1856, 2 M'Queen, 449. But this case is, in my opinion, inapplicable as an authority.
 The question here turns on the applicability and construction (if applicable) of the statute referred to in the defenders' statement. In Sprott's case, the rights of the proprietor and of the railway company were governed by a conveyance before the Act, and it was held by the House of Lords that if the Act applied at all (which was not decided) it was applicable only with reference to the rights of parties as landing on the prior title by which, although the company did not choose to exercise their option of prohibition with compensation, the proprietor was still restrained from any working whereby the necessary support of the surface, whether vertical or lateral, would be withdrawn. There is here no case of prior title, and I cannot countenance the notion that the company—giving notice to the mineral owner under their Act—may resist payment of the compensation awarded in pursuance of the Act, and substitute an interdict for the protection of their works which the statute gives, subject to the obligation of paying that compensation. I must therefore hold that had the company purchased the land, they must have paid the compensation awarded to the mineral owner for the minerals which they required him to leave unworked.

"But as the company did not purchase the land but 'the perpetual servitude and right to use and occupy so much of the ground specified as is at present and occupied by the piers and pillars of their viaduct,' the conclusion regarding what would have been their obligation had they purchased the land itself is not conclusive, but available only as an argument. On the one hand, the company say,—here is a servitude of support for the viaduct, which necessarily restrains the proprietor of the servient tenement from doing anything inconsistent with it. On the other hand, the defenders contend that there is no servitude of support, but only such a right to use and occupy the ground as would have been implied and included in a right of property in the ground by purchase, and that to exempt the company from paying compensation for the minerals which they required to be left unworked would involve the absurdity of constraining the lesser right as really greater and more valuable than the larger, which would have implied and included it. Both parties refer to the sale of the ironstone, and each maintains that it supports his view. My opinion is with the defenders. I think the company have no greater or better secured right to use and occupy the ground with their viaduct than they would have had as purchasers of the ground; and that, having required the mineral owners to leave the minerals unworked, they must pay the compensation that has been awarded under the statutory proceedings. As regards their purchase of the ironstone, I think the effect of that is only, that with respect to it they are themselves the mineral owners, and so under no necessity to give notice or make compensation."

could not be compelled to grant. The minerals were dealt with on a special footing, and not left to the operation of statute. The railway company bought the ironstone, the better to secure their support. The proprietor might work the coal, but not so near as to endanger the viaduct. There was a right not merely of vertical but of lateral support.

The argument that the contract was not governed by the Act, because the submissions upon which the disposition proceeded were anterior to the Act, was not pressed.

The proprietor and lessees argued ;—The whole disposition was subject to the provisions of the Act. The railway company's right over this piece of ground was made one of servitude, because, as the viaduct was already made, it was unnecessary for them to acquire the whole ground. But that could not give them a higher right, with regard to the minerals, than a statutory disposition. Indeed, a statutory disposition to a railway company really gives precisely a right of this kind, a right to use the ground for certain purposes and no others, and subject to certain conditions as regards the minerals. A precisely analogous case had been decided in England.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—At the commencement of the argument in this case considerable difficulty was raised in consequence of the contention of the railway company that the land which they acquired from Mr Wilson of Dundee for the purpose of constructing the Coatbridge branch of their railway was acquired by them previous to the Act of 1844, and that the transaction between the parties was therefore not to be regulated, or, indeed, in any way affected by the provisions of that Act of 1844 respecting minerals. If that had been so we should have had a very different question to dispose of from that which really arises upon this record, and a question which might have been attended with very considerable difficulty. But it was conceded on the conclusion of the argument, and is, indeed, quite apparent from an attentive examination of the deed of conveyance by Mr Wilson to the railway company, dated in November 1845, that the transaction between these parties was in reality a transaction under the Act of 1844 ; in short, it was a purchase by the company, not made not in the exercise of compulsory powers, but by voluntary agreement under the provisions of that statute. It is therefore, I think, quite obvious that the clauses of that Act regulating the matter of minerals as between the landowner and the company apply to this case. The effect of the 56th clause of the Act is to insert by statutory implication in every conveyance of land a reservation of the disposer of the minerals under the land. But then it is further provided as a necessary arrangement for the safety of the railway that the owner is not to work the minerals if the railway company are apprehensive that that would injure their property and are willing to purchase the minerals. And further, it is provided by section 85 that if the company will not purchase them the owner is entitled to go on and work, subject to certain conditions. Now, these clauses, which are substantially repeated in the general Railways Clauses Act of 1845, were introduced upon considerations which are very obvious and of great importance. The minerals lying under land purchased by the railway company may be of various descriptions, and they may be likely to be wrought within very short time, or they may be very unlikely to be wrought for a considerable time after the purchase. There are minerals too, under ground purchased for always purposes, which are very imperfectly explored, the value of which is very little known, and can hardly be ascertained until they are actually wrought, and therefore to settle at the time of the purchase of the land for railway purposes what shall be paid as compensation for the mineral estate to be conveyed along with the surface would obviously be a most inexpedient proceeding, and a great injustice might result either to the company on the one hand or to the landowners on the other by that kind of speculative and conjectural valuation which would alone be possible at that time, and, therefore, the Legislature, on the device, a very expedient one obviously, of postponing the valuation of the minerals until they should come to be wrought. And if, when they come to be wrought, the railway company found it necessary to acquire the minerals under the railway, or within forty yards of it, they should have an opportunity of acquiring them at the value which could then be ascertained and fixed. Now, keeping in view that this is the object of the clauses of the statute with which we are dealing, let us see what it is that the parties have done in this connection for the purchase of the land by the railway company from Mr Wilson. Mr Wilson, in consideration of the various sums of compensation which have been awarded to him by arbiters chosen between the parties, appears in the first place, but under the reservation aftermentioned, to and in favour of the said Glasgow, Garnkirk, and Coatbridge Railway Company, to be conveyed, both in terms of their Act of incorporation,—“All and whole piece or piece of ground, being part of the lands aftermentioned, extending to 3 roods and 5 poles imperial standard measure, and bounded,” &c. The boundaries are unimportant, except in so far as to shew that this piece of ground is bounded on the east by another piece of ground afterwards conveyed; and that the two pieces of ground are adjacent to one another. Then there is this reservation:—“But reserving always to me and my forebears the mines and minerals under the piece of ground in the first place above described, with full power and liberty to work, win, and carry away the same, subject to the conditions and restrictions contained in the said railway company's Act of incorporation.” Now, it is needless to say that this reservation is an unnecessary reservation, because the statute had already made that provision for the disponent. At the same time it did no harm; it was merely a confirmation and referring to the Act of Parliament itself. Then he proceeds, in the second place, to dispose,—“All and whole the ironstone situated under the piece of ground following,”—(then follows a description of a piece of ground immediately to the east of the ground conveyed in the first place). This is the second subject conveyed,—the ironstone under that secondly described piece of ground. And, in the third place, he conveys “the perpetual servitude right to use and occupy so much of the ground in the second place above described as is at present used and occupied by the piers or pillars of their viaduct, and which viaduct is delineated on the foresaid plan and marked No. 1, the ground whereon the said viaduct rests measures 1 rood 7 poles imperial standard measure, together with free egress and entry to the ground in the second place above described, at all times when necessary, for inspecting or repairing the said viaduct, or works connected therewith, which perpetual right and servitude shall be, as it is hereby declared to be and remain in all time coming, in and to the said railway company and their forebears and assigns.”

affecting the piece of ground in the second place above described and by remaining lands of Muirend and Dundivan after described." Now, there is here a very obvious distinction between the conveyance of the piece of ground upon which the viaduct rests and the conveyance of the piece of ground to the west of it, which I understand is covered by an embankment of the railway. In the case of the ground covered by the embankment, the property of the ground is conveyed in the usual form; but in regard to that portion of the ground over which the viaduct extends, what is conveyed is not the property of the ground but the perpetual servitude and right to use and occupy so much of the ground as is occupied by the piers of the viaduct. Undoubtedly in the ordinary case where a viaduct is to be constructed the company take the ground which is to be covered by the viaduct in the ordinary form, either by voluntary conveyance or by notice under the 17th section of the Lands Clauses Act, and in that case they have acquired the property of the surface under the viaduct throughout its whole length. When such land is taken the viaduct has not been constructed and it becomes necessary to take the whole stripe of ground to a certain line of deviation on either side, because, until the viaduct comes to be actually built nobody can foresee what are the precise spots of ground that are to be occupied by the piers of the viaduct. But it appears upon the face of this conveyance that the piers of the viaduct were already built when the transaction took place, and that being so it was quite easy to limit the right of the railway company to the ground actually occupied by the foundations of their piers, and so, instead of taking the whole stripe of ground they take the servitude or right to use and occupy the ground on which the piers of the viaduct actually stand. That, I take it, is the explanation of the peculiarity of this deed.

Now, it is maintained that the effect of this in law is to take the case out of the operation of the mineral clauses of the Act of 1844 altogether, because it is said for example, that the 56th section applies only to mines under land purchased by the company, and so, in like manner, the other clauses are constructed with reference to the 56th regulating the working of mines under the land which has been acquired by the railway company for the purposes of their works. But here the company contend that this land has not been purchased, but only a servitude, and that servitude is a servitude of support, and the ground being granted expressly for the purposes of a servitude of support, and not being a statutory conveyance at all, the servitude of support necessarily requires that the mine under the thing to be supported shall not be wrought, and therefore they say "at common law, for this is a common law transaction and not a statutory conveyance, at common law you who have given me this servitude of support cannot derogate from your own grant and insist upon working out the mine below so as to destroy the support altogether." That is a very ingenious argument, but I confess it has not made very much impression upon my mind. I am humbly of opinion that what has been done here is really and in all practical effect a taking of land under the statute for the purposes of the railway and its works. And, indeed, it differs very little, if at all, from the effect of taking land in the ordinary form. What is it that a company does under the 17th section of the statute when it serves a notice upon a landowner? It gives him notice that a certain piece of land is required for the purposes of the railway and will be taken and used. That is the general style of the notice, and it is quite in conformity with the 17th section of the statute. The form of the conveyance, no doubt, is an ordinary disposition of the piece of land; but that and not look at the mere words of it; and the effect of the conveyance is to enable the railway company to use the land for the purpose of constructing their railway or works thereon, and for no other purposes whatsoever. The railway company having acquired the land cannot use it for any purpose except that; and if they do not require it for that purpose they are bound to sell it back to the owner. So that the land is acquired in the ordinary case for a limited use only, and if it be land acquired for the purpose of being occupied by a portion of the line of railway, and not for any special purposes of station room or the like, but merely for the purpose of sustaining the rails in one part of the line, then all that the company do acquire in practical effect is the right to lay down and maintain their rails upon the surface of that ground, or to make a cutting through the ground for the purpose of laying down their rails and maintaining them there, or to lay down an embankment upon the ground for the purpose of sustaining their rails or to build a viaduct for that purpose. That is the only right the company ever can acquire under their statutory powers of taking land, whether they get it by voluntary agreement or by the exercise of compulsory powers. Now, what have they got here under the conveyance of a perpetual servitude and right to use the land? They have got the exclusive possession of the particular pieces of ground occupied by the piers, just as exclusive possession as they would have got under a conveyance in the ordinary form, because the piers standing upon the ground, the ground can never be occupied for any other purpose. But, on the other hand, they have got it for the one special and limited purpose of their railway, or that portion of it which consists of the piers of the viaduct standing upon and being supported by this ground. So that really the right which they obtain under this part of the conveyance is in all practical effect the same right which they get under the other portions of the conveyance, which conveys to them in appearance and formally and technically the property of the land itself. Now, I think it would be a most unreasonable construction of such an Act of Parliament as this to say that because the conveyancer chooses to put the thing in this particular shape in making out his conveyance of the subject, therefore this shall not be taken to be a purchase of land within the meaning of the 56th and other clauses of the statute. I think it is a purchase of land just as much as the purchase of the other piece of land. It is a purchase of land for a special and limited purpose. So is the other. And the special and limited purpose in the one case is just as special and limited as it is in the other—neither more nor less. It is for the same purpose in both. I am therefore of opinion that the mineral clauses, as they may be called, of the statute, 7 and 8 Vict. c. 87, are clearly applicable to this part of the conveyance as well as to the other, and therefore I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAR.—The question in this case is whether the mineral clauses, sections 56, 84, and 85 of the Act of 1844, are applicable? The Caledonian Railway Company originally maintained their inapplicability on two grounds, 1st, because the transaction on which the conveyance proceeded was prior to the year 1844; and 2d, because this was not a purchase of land but the constitution of a servitude. Latterly, the second became the sole ground contended for by the company.

They say this was not a purchase of land in the sense of the statute, because the transaction and conveyance were not of a sort which the railway company could have compelled the granters to enter into and execute, but a mere voluntary transaction and conveyance to which the statute has no application. I am of opinion that this contention is not well founded, and I rest my opinion upon the simple ground, that the reason why a conveyance of land brings in those clauses of the statute is because the conveyance of the land implies the constitution of this servitude of support. That is the sole ground of it. Now here we have this servitude of support, constituted not by implication, but by an express deed. My humble opinion is that that makes no difference in the result.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion, and very much on the same grounds. The substance of the transaction is the acquisition of ground under the Act of Parliament for the use of the railway. That is distinctly shewn throughout the whole of the conveyance. And although there is a peculiarity in the wording of the conveyance of the servitude right, which I was at first struck with, I am satisfied that this arose from the fact that the viaduct was actually built and in use at the time the land was acquired by the railway company for the purposes of their extension line. Having regard, therefore, to the terms of the disposition, and to the clauses in it by which the provisions of the Act of Parliament are, as it appears to me, imported into the conveyance, I think that the rights of parties relative to the working of the minerals must be regulated by the rules which, in respect of the Act of Parliament, are applicable in all such cases. In the deed, after the words of conveyance, it is provided that the ground taken by the railway company is to be held by them and their successors "according to the true intent and meaning of their Act of incorporation;" and that provision is applicable not merely to the land acquired, but to the whole premises expressly above mentioned."

On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

THE COURT adhered.

THIS was an action for payment of the balance of an account by G. and J. Fenning, lessees of certain granite quarries at Dalbeattie, against J. Meldrum, who had acted for several years as their manager. The constitution and resting owing of items prior to 1871, to which prescription applied, was the defender's oath.

defender deponed as follows:—"From the evidence endorsed by me, I see that I must have at the sum of £50, with which I am debited under date 2d December 870. I do not recollect what said sum was sent to me for. I think it must have been to make payments of some sort for the pursuers, and not on my own use. I cannot say whether or not I borrowed that sum from them. I admit the correctness of the credit side of the account in question. The account brings out an apparent balance against me of £57, 9s. 4d. I have not paid that sum in cash, but I consider that nothing was really due by me at the end of said account, as I had done much work for them in preparing estimates for which they did not and would not pay me. I rendered no account at the time. One of the estimates was for lighthouses in the Isle of Man, a very large job, worth about £24,000. That was in the early part of 1869. The other was for a pedestal for a royal statue, I think in Manchester. There was no stipulation about my remuneration in connection therewith, and I never have claimed any. I regarded it as a set-off against the balance of £7, 19s. 4d., which is all I admit as due by me on said account. I cannot say whether or not the £50 contained in the cheque was ever paid."

The Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff held that the oath was affirmative of the reference.

The defender appealed.

In the course of the advising,—

LORD DEAS said—I am of opinion that this deposition is affirmative of the reference. The Sheriff-substitute says that it contains certain things so improbable that he does not believe them. I do not go on these grounds. It is not necessary that we should believe what the deponent says, or that it should be probable. The question is, what he has sworn. Now, the deponent admits having received the £50, and he does not say anything which can discharge him of it. That is the legitimate ground for holding the oath to be affirmative.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the appeal, record, and proof, Find that the pursuers (respondents) have proved that the balance of . . . is resting owing to them by the defender (appellant): Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

Trade-Mark—Descriptive Name—Distinguishing Variation.—Held that the proprietor of a hotel near a railway station, known as the "Station Hotel," was entitled to object to the proprietor of a neighbouring hotel adopting the designation "The Royal Station Hotel," in respect that the term "Station Hotel" is a descriptive designation applicable to both, and the word "Royal" a sufficiently distinctive variation.

James Campbell in 1873 became proprietor of another hotel in Forres, which at the time he purchased it was known as "The County and Family Hotel." He at first altered its name to that of "The Royal Hotel"; and in June 1875 he commenced to advertise it in railway time tables, &c., as "The Royal Station Hotel, Forres." From that date also his servants

Nov. 17, 1876.
Charleson v.
Campbell.

Charleson applied for interdict to the Sheriff of Elgin on the averment that these proceedings of Campbell and his servants were misleading to parties intending to put up at his hotel, and "were illegally, fraudulently, and wrongfully done. The foresaid illegal and fraudulent advertisements and representations by the respondent have injured and are still injuring the petitioner's business, and he has suffered loss thereby."

It was admitted that the hotels of the respondent and the petitioner were both on the outskirts of Forres, and on opposite sides of a straight road leading from the passenger station to the town. Both hotels were visible from the station, that of the respondent being distant 100 yards, and that of the petitioner 360 yards therefrom.

The petitioner pleaded;—(1) The hotel occupied by the petitioner having been the first to adopt the name or title of "The Station Hotel," and having been for many years known to the public as "The Station Hotel," the petitioner is entitled to the exclusive use of this name or title.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The petitioner, in respect he does not occupy a hotel which is entitled from its situation and locality to be called the Station Hotel, it being at the very extremity of the street or road in which it is situated, while the railway station, which is at the other extremity, is upwards of 360 yards apart, he has no ground of action against the respondent for calling his hotel "The Royal Station Hotel," seeing that it adjoins the railway platform, and is truly from its situation the Station Hotel of Forres. (3) The petitioner having no exclusive right or monopoly to use the words "Station Hotel" in reference to his hotel he has no legal ground of action or complaint against the respondent.

The Sheriff-substitute (D. Macleod Smith) sustained the defences, and dismissed the petition.

The Sheriff (Bell) adhered.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am very far from saying that a hotel proprietor whose house has been known by a specific designation, may not have a right of property in that designation as in a trade-mark. But the designation of the appellant's hotel in the present case is not a specific but a descriptive title. There is no doubt that the hotel has been known under that descriptive title for a considerable time. But neither is there any doubt that another hotel proprietor may put up a hotel to which the designation is equally applicable. To make the appellant's application relevant it would be necessary to add the averment that the designation was assumed for the purpose of deceiving the public and drawing away the custom of the established hotel. Whether that would be sufficient to make the complaint relevant or not I do not mean to decide. It is at any rate it is essential, and is totally wanting here.

But the case falls under another principle. It is not even averred that the respondent has assumed the descriptive name of the appellant's hotel with variation. It is not said that he has called his hotel "The Station Hotel."

"The Royal Station Hotel." Now, when a man gives his house a merely descriptive title, and another, to whose house the description equally well applies, assumes the same descriptive title with a distinguishing addition, the latter is within his rights, and the former is not entitled to complain. Now, I am of opinion that with regard to such a descriptive title as this even the addition of the word "Royal" is a sufficient distinction. No. 25.
Nov. 17, 1876.
Charleson v. Campbell.

I by no means say that a descriptive title may not be acquired by a hotel which could not be assumed by another without a sufficient distinguishing mark, but I am of opinion that we have not a case of that sort here.

Neither am I moved by the contention of the respondent that he has built a hotel nearer the station, and therefore is better entitled to the use of the descriptive title "Station Hotel" than the appellant. Provided the descriptive term was fairly applicable to the appellant's hotel I do not think the respondent was entitled to appropriate it without variation, even though more fully applicable to his own than to the appellant's house.

In the present case I am quite satisfied to dismiss the appeal—(1) Because there is no sufficient allegation of the assumption for the purpose of injury; and (2) because the proceeding of the respondent is not shewn to have been a piracy or usurpation of the appellant's title, nor even a colourable imitation, but the adoption of the title with a sufficient distinction.

MR. NEAVE, LORD ORMDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the judgments appealed against, and dismissed the appeal.

Lawson v. Gunn.

Locatic—Settlement.—Held that a woman, imbecile from infancy, had at the time of her father's death, which happened after her majority, a de facto settlement from her father in the parish of his birth, and that the parish of her own birth was not liable for her support.

ALEXANDER FERRIE was born in the parish of Cramond. For many years he led a wandering life as a hawker, and never acquired any residential settlement. Towards the end of his life he settled in Annan, and there on 19th December 1872. Shortly after coming to reside in Annan he became an object of parochial relief, and was receiving an allowance of 2s. 6d. a-week at the time of his death. The parish of Cramond acknowledged liability for his support, and repaid to the parish of Annan its disbursements.

Alexander Ferrie was survived by a widow, who after his death continued to reside at Annan. The allowance made to her husband of 2s. 6d. a-week was continued to her at the expense of the parish of Cramond.

Alexander Ferrie was also survived by a daughter, Maria Ferrie, who was born in 1851 in the parish of Yair. She lived constantly in family with her father till his death, after which she continued to live with her

The parish of Annan thereupon called on the parish of Cramond to relieve it of the expense of her maintenance in the asylum, she being a proper subject of parochial relief.

Maria Ferrie had been subject to epileptic fits from infancy, which had produced extreme imbecility from her earliest years, but she was not a congenital idiot.

The parish of Annan pleaded;—(1) The parish of Cramond, as the parish of her father's birth, is liable for the pauper's support.

The parish of Cramond pleaded;—(1) The pauper having first become chargeable as a pauper at the age of twenty-three, and more than a year after her father's death, her parochial settlement is in the parish of her own birth, and not in that of her father's birth.

The Lord Ordinary, on 1st July 1876, decerned against the defender on terms of the conclusions of the libel.*

The defender reclaimed.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I see no reason to differ from the Lord Ordinary. The

* "NOTE.—The pauper, when she became chargeable, was twenty-three years of age. She was then in a state of extreme imbecility, and incapable of doing anything for her support. This has been her condition during all her life, though it has not been proved that she is a congenital idiot, it is plain enough that her infirmity has existed from her earliest infancy.

"Her father died in December 1872. At his death he had no residential settlement, and hence his settlement was in the parish of Cramond, where he was born.

"The pursuer maintains that the pauper's settlement is in Cramond, inasmuch as that was the settlement of her father at the time of his death. The defender admits that he would have been bound to support the pauper if, at her father's death, she had been in pupillarity. But he contends that, inasmuch as she was in majority at the time when she became chargeable, her settlement is in the parish of her own birth. His argument is, that in the absence of any residential settlement, original or derivative, every adult must have recourse to his own birth settlement; that the rule by which children retain their father's birth settlement was introduced in order to keep the family together, and can have no place as regards adult lunatics; and that though a lunatic may be looked upon as no more than a child when anything depends on choice, the law, by assigning every adult pauper to his own settlement, excludes all exercise of will, and therefore all analogy between a pupil and an adult lunatic.

"The Lord Ordinary has not been able to adopt the argument of the defender. He thinks that the reasoning on which the Court proceeded in the case of Craig v. Macph. 1172, applies equally to a pupil and a person in the position of the pauper. She has always remained in statu pupillari. She has never been pro jure, or in a condition to exercise any civil rights. On the contrary, she has been under a constant legal incapacity. The Lord Ordinary therefore is of opinion that the judgment of the Court in the case above mentioned rules the present. This appears to be in accordance with the view of the law taken by Lord Neaves, as well as by the Court, in Walker, 8 Macph. 893."

important consideration in such cases is to lay down and follow intelligible rules of the regulation of the liability of parishes. Now, it has been conceded that it has been conclusively settled that a pupil follows the settlement of his father, even although the father be dead. It has been held in the cases of Hopkins and Walker, to which we have been referred, that while the father is alive an imbecile child, although past the years of pupillarity, is still to be considered a pupil. I think it follows that the same rule is to be applied after the father's death on the same analogy. Here the pauper is wholly incapable of earning her own subsistence, and has always been so. I am satisfied with the views the Lord Ordinary has expressed.

Lawson v. Gunn.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMDALE.—I am of the same opinion. It is very desirable that in such cases as the present decisions already pronounced should not be departed from, and I think that the authorities referred to have already substantially decided the point here in question.

There can be no doubt that the pauper, being insane from childhood onwards, never had a settlement apart from her father during his life. Her father's birth settlement, therefore—he having never acquired a residential one—was her settlement up to the date of his death. The question then is, did his death after she had attained majority, but while she was still insane, make any change in her settlement, so as to throw her back from her father's settlement to her own birth settlement. As the disabilities of pupillarity endure in the case of the insane beyond the years of pupillarity during the father's life I see no reason why they should cease on his death. I therefore agree with your Lordship in holding that the principle of decision in Hopkins v. Ironside covers the present case.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur. It appears to me that the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has based his judgment is entirely satisfactory. But I am prepared to come to the same conclusion on another and independent ground. I think the pauper must be held to have been actually chargeable as against the parish of the father's settlement during her father's life. The father became a pauper before his death, and died in receipt of parochial relief. Now, when a father who has an imbecile and helpless daughter entirely dependent upon him is unable to support either himself or his daughter, and becomes chargeable on the parish, although technically he is the pauper, his daughter, who has only a derivative settlement through him, is really chargeable, and is really supported by the parish as well as her father. The father and the daughter are both paupers, and are both actually being relieved by the parish of his settlement, and that parish cannot rid itself of liability for the support of the imbecile child simply because of the father's death. The daughter remains chargeable, and retains her derivative settlement. Indeed she can acquire no other settlement.

THE COURT adhered.

Sale—Bankruptcy—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 1.—Sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act enacts,—“When goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser, or others in his right, from enforcing delivery of the same.” Held that the section did not apply to a contract by which a shipbuilder sold the scrap iron lying in his yard and the scrap iron which should be produced during a certain period.

Observed that the section only applied to cases where the purchaser acquired a jus ad rem specificam, of which the seller retained possession.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
B.

ON 17th March the estates of Messrs Scott, shipbuilders, Inverkeithing, were sequestrated, and Mr John Ross was appointed trustee.

John M'Meehin, iron-merchant, Coatbridge, brought the present action against the trustee, concluding for declarator “that at and prior to the sequestration of the estates of the defenders, John Scott and Sons, and of John Scott senior, Thomas Scott, and John Scott junior, the individual partners of that firm, the pursuer was, and that he still is, entitled to demand and receive delivery of the whole scrap iron which the said defenders, John Scott and Sons, had in stock in or about their works or other premises at Inverkeithing at 11th January 1876, and also of the whole scrap iron thereafter made or produced by them, and which was in their possession at their said works or premises or elsewhere, or under their control, at the date of the sequestration of their estates as aforesaid; and that the defender, the said John Ross, as trustee foresaid, and the other defenders, for any interest they may have in the premises, are bound to give to the pursuer, or to permit the pursuer to take immediately upon demand, delivery of the whole of the said scrap iron; and the defender, the said John Ross, as trustee foresaid, ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree foresaid, immediately or upon demand, to deliver to the pursuer, or to permit the pursuer to take delivery, of the whole of the said scrap iron.”

The pursuer alleged—(Cond. 1) “The pursuer has dealt with the defenders, John Scott and Sons, for the last eight years. On 22d September 1875 the said John Scott and Sons wrote* to the pursuer, offering to

Messrs Scott and Sons to Mr John M'Meehin, 22d September 1875.—“Dear Sir,—We have something like 30 tons of scrap iron at present, and making more daily. The present is to state that we are willing to let you have these, and what will be made for the next six or eight weeks, at the same price as last, with permission to us to draw upon you now for £250, at 4 m/d. You would have delivery of what is now ready at once if wished, or the whole could lay and be taken at one trip. Your reply by return will oblige.”

Mr M'Meehin to Messrs Scott, 24th September 1875.—“Gentlemen,—I received your note, and accept your offer of all your scrap iron for eight weeks from date, at the same price as I paid for last. I have enclosed a stamp signed, which you can fill up for four months, and date it to the 25th September, as I have entered it in my books so. Also please make it payable at the Clydesdale Bank, Coatbridge. I think it will be better to let them lie till I get the whole, ‘as one trip would do it,’ unless I see a possibility of the market coming down.”

Messrs Scott to Mr John M'Meehin, 11th January 1876.—“Dear Sir,— deliver to him 30 tons of scrap iron then in their hands, along with what-ver would be made for the succeeding six or eight weeks, at the same price as their immediately preceding transaction, which was at the rate of 33, 15s. per ton. In this letter they stipulated that the pursuer should allow them to draw upon him for £250 at four months' date." (Cond. 2)

 The offer was accepted by the pursuer in a letter dated 24th September 1875, and a bill was drawn upon him by the said John Scott and Sons for £298, 12s. 6d. Towards implement of this contract two cargoes of scrap iron were delivered by the said John Scott and Sons to the pursuer, conform to invoices dated respectively 8th and 25th December 1875, the former amounting to £92, 16s. 3d., the second to £98, 1s. 3d. There was thus a balance of £107, 15s. remaining, for which no value had been given." (Cond. 3) "When the said bill for £298, 12s. 6d. matured the pursuer, in a letter dated 15th January 1876, proposed that as the whole quantity of scrap iron had not been delivered to him a renewal of the bill should be granted. It was ultimately arranged that this renewal should be for £140, which was granted, and this bill falls due on 27th April 1876." (Cond. 4) "On 11th January 1876 the said John Scott and Sons wrote and sent a letter to the pursuer, whereby they offered to sell to him all the scrap iron which they then had in stock, as also the scraps which would be made by the said John Scott and Sons up till 1st April 1876, at the market prices for the ensuing two months, if he would allow them to draw upon him for £200. A bill stamp sufficient to cover that amount was enclosed in the letter, in order that the pursuer should sign across it, and so complete the arrangement." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer accepted the said offer by letter written and sent to the said John Scott and Sons on 15th January 1876, and this acceptance was duly acknowledged by John Scott and Sons by letter dated 18th January 1876.
 Further, the pursuer signed the said acceptance for £200, and forwarded the same to the said John Scott and Sons. The contract was thus completed."

The defender answered—"It is not admitted that the letters constitute any real and complete contract of sale. Admitted that the pursuer, for still current. The transaction intended by the said letters only pur-

Nov. 22, 1876.
M'Meekin v.
Ross.

The pursuer alleged—(Cond. 8) "At the date of the sequestration of the estates of the said John Scott and Sons a considerable quantity of scrap iron was lying in their premises ready for delivery to the pursuer, and at present there is scrap iron deposited in the premises of the said John Scott and Sons for that purpose. There was no other scrap iron in the premises, custody, or possession of the said John Scott and Sons except that which had been sold to the pursuer as aforesaid, and the said scrap iron was separated and set apart, or was and is at all events easily distinguishable from the other articles in the said premises."

The defender answered—"Admitted that at the date of sequestration there was a quantity of scrap iron lying about the premises of the bankrupts, the value whereof at present rates is probably from £70 to £80. Only some part of this whole quantity can be the subject of the alleged sale to the pursuer. The plating of the ship referred to in the bankrupt's letter of 11th January 1876 was unfinished at the date of sequestration. It is impossible to distinguish how much of the scrap iron about the premises was in stock on 11th January 1876, and how much came from the plating of the said ship, and from other work unconnected with the said ship. At the sequestration the subject of the alleged sale to the pursuer could not be identified, and the quantities and prices were not ascertained."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having purchased and paid for the said scrap iron as aforesaid, and the same having been allowed to remain in the custody of John Scott and Sons as aforesaid, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator, as concluded for.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient. (2) The alleged contract of sale being incomplete as to subject, quantities, and prices, the pursuer has no ground of action. (3) There having been no sale of specific and existing goods at a certain price, the Mercantile Law Amendment Act has no application.* (4) The bills founded on by the pursuer not being payments of the prices of the goods sued for, and in any event the said bills not having been yet retired by the pursuer, the defender is entitled to refuse delivery.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—"Assoilzie the defender Ross from the conclusions of the action, and decerns : Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.†

* The Act 19 and 20 Victoria, cap. 60, section 1st, provides :—"From and after the passing of this Act, where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser, or others in his right, from enforcing delivery of the same, and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall, from and after the date of such sale, be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser."

† "NOTE.— The action is laid on the contract, and on the 1st section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act.

"The defender maintains—1st, That the pursuer did not buy the whole scrap iron to be made after the date of the contract, but only a portion of the make ; and 2dly, That even though he did, the pursuer cannot avail himself of the provisions of the Act, because there was no completed sale of any definite quantity of goods.

"The Lord Ordinary is disposed to hold that the contract does not complete

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The defender was bound to give delivery of the iron which was in the bankrupts' possession, both at the date of the letter of 11th January and at the date of sequestration. There might be a completed sale, although the risk did not pass. As soon as the scrap iron was produced the sale was complete. The price was actually paid by the bills which the pursuer signed. There was here a specific article sold for a price which was ascertainable by measuring the quantity of iron. It was quite possible to sell a thing which was not in existence, but was to be produced. The moment the scrap iron came into existence the purchaser had a jus ad rem. As nothing required to be done to it except to weigh it, the property passed to the purchaser. The case of Hanson did not apply, because it dealt with the question whether the risk passed, which was a different question from one of a personal contract of sale.¹

No. 27.

Nov. 22, 1876.
M'Meehin v.
Ross.

Argued for the defender ;—There was no complete contract of sale. The scrap iron was not in existence at the date of the alleged sale, and there was no obligation to bring it into existence. Four things had to be ascertained before the contract of sale was complete, viz., quid, quantum, quid, and pretium, and none of these were here ascertained. The question depended on sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which related to the case of goods lying ready for delivery, and where nothing was required to be done, whereas here the iron required to be weighed in order to ascertain the price.

The object of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act was to assimilate the law of England and Scotland, and therefore the English cases were of assistance.²

It was scrap iron made by the bankrupts, but only so much of it as was produced in plating the particular ship referred to in the letter of 11th of January. It may not be sufficient to dispose of the case without inquiry, inasmuch as it is not out that no scrap iron was actually made, except what fell under the contract. He is, however, of opinion that the pursuer has not brought himself within the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act.

There was not at the date of the contract any definite subject, nor at that or any other date was there a definite price. The contract related to a scrap to be produced, and the sum due under it was to be determined by the amount of the production. Before the bankruptcy no step was taken to ascertain the amount of the scrap iron that was made ; and indeed this could not have been the case, because the contract included the make up to 1st April, and the contents of the bill were intended to cover the whole price, subject to adjustment either way according to the amount of production.

In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that the sale was complete, so as to admit of the application of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. He refers to and adopts the opinion of the Lord President in the case of Hanson v. Craig, Feb. 4, 1859, 21 D. 432, 31 Scot. Jur. 236 ; see also Benjamin v. Sale, p. 235."

No. 27. At advising.—

Nov. 22, 1876.
M'Meehin v.
Ross.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question here is whether the transaction between Scott and Son, whose trustee is the defender in this action, and the pursuer was a contract of sale within the meaning of the 1st section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The Lord Ordinary has decided the case on relevancy, and it is necessary, if we are to adhere to his judgment, to take the statement of the pursuer upon record as representing the transaction. Now, he begins by mentioning that "the pursuer has dealt with the defenders, John Scott and Sons, for the last eight years,"—that is, I understand, in the same kind of transaction as the present. Then he goes on—"On 22d September 1875 the said John Scott and Sons wrote to the pursuer offering to deliver to him thirty tons of scrap iron then in their hands, along with whatever would be made for the succeeding six or eight weeks, at the same price as their immediately preceding transaction, which was at the rate of £3, 15s. per ton. In this letter they stipulated that the pursuer should allow them to draw upon him for £250 at four months' date." Now, we are entitled also to take the letters referred to into consideration, along with the pursuer's averments, and to correct the statements of the one by the other. Now, the statement in the letter as to the scrap iron is not quite the same as in the condescendence. It is—"We have something like thirty tons of scrap iron at present, and making more daily. The present is to state that we are willing to let you have these, and what will be made for the next six or eight weeks, at the same price as last, with permission to us to draw upon you now for £250 at 4 m/d. You would have delivery of what is now ready at once if wished, or the whole could lay and be taken at one trip." That statement means, Scott and Sons are willing to go on supplying the pursuer with scrap iron at the same rates as before. The letter mentions that there were over thirty tons of scrap iron, and the time of the proposed contract is six or eight weeks. The acceptance fixes the contract for eight weeks, and otherwise is in terms of the offer. The 2d article of the condescendence goes on—"The offer was accepted by the pursuer in a letter dated 24th September 1875, and a bill was drawn upon him by the said John Scott and Sons for £298, 12s. 6d. Towards implement of this contract two cargoes of scrap iron were delivered by the said John Scott and Sons to the pursuer, conform to invoices dated respectively 8th and 25th December 1875, the former amounting to £92, 16s. 3d., the second to £98, 1s. 3d. There was thus a balance of £107, 15s. remaining, for which no value had been given." The result of that is, that while the pursuer had advanced the sum of £298, 12s. 6d. in a bill, he had only obtained delivery to the amount of £190, 17s. 6d., and so matters stood when the next letter, of 11th January, was written. In the meantime the original bill had been advancing to maturity, and a renewal had been proposed and was agreed to to the amount of £140. Then comes the letter of 11th January 1876, and in reference to it the pursuer says—"On 11th January 1876 the said John Scott and Sons wrote and sent a letter to the pursuer, whereby they offered to sell him all the scrap iron which they then had in stock, as also the scrap which would be made by the said John Scott and Sons up till 1st April 1876, at the market prices for the ensuing two months, if he would allow them to draw upon him for £200. A bill stamp sufficient to cover that amount was enclosed in the letter, in order that the pursuer should sign across it, and so complete the arrangement." Then the 5th article goes on to say—"The pursuer accepted the aid offer by letter written and sent to the said John Scott and Sons on 15th January 1876, and this acceptance was duly acknowledged by John Scott and Sons by letter dated 18th January 1876. Further, the pursuer signed the said acceptance for £200, and forwarded the same to the said John Scott and Sons. The contract was thus completed. The counter statement in answer is denied." No. 27.

Nov. 22, 1876.
M'Meekin v.
Ross.

Now, with regard to the second transaction, the eight weeks during which the arrangement of the 22d September was to endure had expired some time before; and when Scott and Son proposed to sell to the pursuer all the scrap iron they had in stock at that date, viz., on 11th January 1876, it does not follow that any part of that iron fell under the original contract. It does not appear, and it is not even averred, that any more iron was produced in these eight weeks than was delivered at the two deliveries of 8th and 25th December. If there was, it certainly became indistinguishable from the iron to be delivered under the arrangement of 11th January. We have it, then, that the pursuer was to take all the scrap iron in the work at 11th January, and all that might be produced till April.

Then the condescendence (7th and 8th) goes on to say—"On 17th March 1876 the estates of the defenders, the said John Scott and Sons and the individual partners of that firm, were sequestrated by the Sheriff of Fife, and on 29th March 1876 the defender, the said John Ross, was appointed trustee on the sequestrated estates." "At the date of the sequestration of the estates of the said John Scott and Sons a considerable quantity of scrap iron was lying in their premises ready for delivery to the pursuer, and at present there is scrap iron deposited in the premises of the said John Scott and Sons for that purpose. There was no other scrap iron in the premises, custody, or possession of the said John Scott and Sons, except that which had been sold to the pursuer as afore-said, and the said scrap iron was separated and set apart, or was and is at all events easily distinguishable from the other articles in the said premises. The amount of the said bill, which the pursuer will retire in due course, is greatly in excess of the market price of the said scrap iron. The counter statement is denied." Now, this last article is not very intelligible or consistent with itself. It represents, in the first place, that all the scrap iron in the premises was sold to the pursuer; then it says that it was "set apart" or "at least was easily distinguishable." If all the scrap iron was sold, that is unmeaning. I take it, however, to mean that all the scrap iron in Scott and Sons' premises fell under this running contract with the pursuer. Now, then, what is the meaning of this arrangement? It seems to be a continuing arrangement under which Scott and Sons agreed to furnish the pursuer with scrap iron; and there was an advance made by bills of exchange in anticipation of future deliveries. As far as delivery was concerned, deliveries were to be made from time to time as the scrap iron grew. And money was, on the other hand, to be advanced from time to time to pay for the iron. The question is, is that a sale in the sense of the 1st section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act? I am of opinion it is not. In the first place, the subject is not a specific corpus, and therefore in purchasing the pursuer acquired no jus ad rem specificam. In the second place, it is plain that the delay in delivery arose from the nature of the contract itself, and did not accidentally arise from any carelessness or want of precaution. The provision of the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act is—"Where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods, as belonging to the seller, by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser, or others in his right, from enforcing delivery of the same." That is the only case where this Act applies, and what is contemplated there is a present sale in the ordinary sense, whereby the seller is under an immediate and present obligation to deliver a specific corpus. The buyer, on the other hand, is under an obligation to pay an ascertained price, while the goods are allowed to remain or happen to remain in the custody of the seller contrary to the spirit of the contract, which contemplates immediate delivery. Any other construction of the clause would lead to strange consequences.

It was a peculiarity of Scotch law before this Act was passed that where the price had been paid but the goods not delivered, the seller remained undivested owner of them, and was entitled to retain them in security for the unpaid balance of a current account, or, in the event of his bankruptcy, his creditors could attach them. In that respect Scotch law differed from the English law, for then where there was a well-ascertained obligation to deliver the goods the property was with the purchaser, and the hardship that might arise under our law could not occur. It was to avert that hard case that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act was passed; but if we hold that the pursuer is to prevail here we shall introduce into our law a principle not known in the law of England. This contract, which is very like a contract for furnishings with advances, would be assimilated to a contract of sale, and therefore, as I think that there can be no doubt that the section of the Act of Parliament refers to the case of a present sale where there is a right ad rem specificam, and where a certain price has been paid and immediate delivery may be required, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAS.—The first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which has been quoted by your Lordship, bears—"Where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for the creditors of any such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller, by any diligence or process of law." Now, in the present case the contract related to a subject which was to be produced, and there was no obligation on the seller to produce it. The amount to be delivered was to be determined by the amount produced. That being the nature of the contract, I am of opinion with your Lordship that it does not fall within the category mentioned in the statute of goods sold but not delivered to the purchaser remaining in the custody of the seller. There was no present right of delivery conferred on the purchaser at the date of the contract, and I do not see that there was any right to demand delivery at the date of the sequestration. It is not necessary to determine which of these dates is the proper one to look to, because whichever you take the result is the same.

The only difficulty I have had arose from the suggestion that there were two contracts, one made by the letter of 22d September 1875 and the other by the letter of 11th January 1876, and the question which occurred to my mind was whether a different rule might not be applied to the first contract, so far as the scrap iron under it remained undelivered. But supposing that it had been averred that there was undelivered scrap iron under the first contract at the date of the second, the construction which the pursuer puts on that second contract makes it impossible for him to contend for any distinction between the contracts, because he says in the 4th article of the condescendence—(His Lordship here read the 4th article). If that is a correct description of the contract there can be no distinction between the scrap iron sold under the first and second contract. I think the construction of the letter of 11th January is by no means clear, and I would have had considerable difficulty in construing it in the way the pursuer has done. But he adheres to his statement, and does not propose any amendment. But supposing that the pursuer had not got delivery of all the scrap iron to which he was entitled under the contract of 22d September, he would require not only to aver that he had not got delivery, but also that the scrap iron which he was entitled to under the contract of 22d September was distinguishable from the scrap iron comprehended under the contract of 11th January. No such averments are made, and we must therefore take the case on the assumption that the whole subject of the sale is comprehended under the contract of 11th January 1876.

M'Meekin v.

Ross.

In taking the contract, it is just a case in which the subject of the contract was first to be produced, and in which there was no obligation to produce it. The price to be paid was also to be ascertained by the amount produced and the price at the time. I am therefore of opinion that the case does not fall under the provisions of the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment

MURK—I have come to the conclusion that the contract now in question does not fall under the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. I had some difficulty with regard to that part of the iron which I understood was claimed as undelivered under the first contract, because that iron was sold at a fixed price per ton, and as I read the summons it concludes for delivery of a portion of that iron. If, therefore, the pursuer had been able to show that a part of the iron sold under that contract was undelivered at the date of the second contract I should have had difficulty in holding that he had no demand delivery of it. But, as I understand the matter from the explanations which have been made during the discussion, the pursuer so construes the second contract as to make it cover all the scrap iron in the premises of Messrs. James and Sons at its date, and all that was to be produced up to the 1st of January. And when the communications between the parties are examined I see why the second contract is so worded. What the pursuer bought under the first was thirty tons, and the produce of the months of October and November. But the correspondence shews that he delayed taking delivery till January, and did not get the whole; and he accordingly got delivery on the 8th and 25th of January of what appears to have been made under that contract; and there is no averment that any of the scrap iron produced during October and November was undelivered. We have now, therefore, nothing to do with the first contract, and the terms of the second are peculiar. With the exception of the scrap iron that may have been collected in December, the subject sold was not in existence in January 1876, and there was no definite price fixed, as it was to be paid for at the current market price. So that at the end of the year the iron would not only require to be weighed in order to ascertain the quantity, but the market price would also require to be ascertained in order to fix the price of the iron, and as to that there might be disputes, as the market price might fluctuate considerably during the period. The transaction was there-

- No. 27. fore not a sale in the ordinary sense of that word, but it was, as your Lordship has described it, a continuing arrangement to supply iron until a bill was run off, and such an arrangement cannot, I think, be held to fall under the clause of the statute.

Nov. 22, 1876. The Rev. WILLIAM CÆSAR AND OTHERS (Stiell's Trustees), Defenders.
Allan v. Stiell's Trustees. —Lee—J. P. B. Robertson.

Trust—Powers of Trustees—Charity School.—A testator directed his trustees to employ the residue of his estate in founding and endowing a hospital (to bear the testator's name) "for the aliment, clothing, and education of poor children for ever." He gave directions for the building of a hospital to accommodate thirty inmates, a master, &c., with a school-room for the education of the inmates, and of sixty day scholars, or of a greater or lesser number should be deemed expedient. He empowered the trustees "from time to time as they shall see cause, to make such alterations, amendments, improvements & additions to the rules and regulations laid down by me for the management of the said hospital and public school, they always keeping in view the original intention of said charitable institution." The benefits of the charity were limited to a certain district, and some inhabitants of the district raised an action against the trustees to have them compelled to carry out the intentions of the founder. The pursuers alleged that the trustees were acting contrary to the will of the founder by (1) the discontinuance of inmates of the hospital; (2) the institution of a preliminary examination before entrance to the school; (3) the division of the school into a higher and a lower school, and the institution of an examination for pupils passing from the lower to the higher school; (4) the provision of higher education in languages and physical sciences; (5) the increase of the teachers' salaries; (6) the institution of bursaries; and (7) the introduction of paying pupils along with the free scholars.

Held that all these changes were within the power of the trustees if the bursaries were confined to the free scholars, and the paying pupils paid the whole expense which their education cost the charity.

- 1st DIVISION. GEORGE STIELL, smith, North Bridge Street, Edinburgh, died in 1812.
Ld. Mackenzie. leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed his property, which consisted of houses and superiorities in Edinburgh, and his personal estate, amounting to £2300, to trustees. The free income at the time was about £700, and (after paying for the building) at the time the present action was brought was about £800. The purposes of the trust after paying expenses and some small legacies, were as follows:—

"Fifthly. The whole residue shall be accumulated as into one capital at my death, and the yearly interest or profits arising thereon shall be applied in founding and endowing a hospital or charitable institution within the village of Tranent, or in its immediate vicinity, in the county of East Lothian, and for the aliment, clothing, and education of poor children for ever, and which hospital shall always be called, denominated and described 'George Stiell's Hospital.' And for this purpose my said trustees shall, as soon as convenient after my death, purchase or lease a piece of ground in the said village of Tranent, or vicinity thereof, of not under half an acre in extent, as a site for the said hospital, the price of which to be taken from the moveable or personal property to be left by me at the period of my death, and the annual rents arising from the heritable property above disposed, and the value of which purchase or lease shall form part of the consolidated fund as above. And I recommend:

the said trustees to procure, as soon after my death as possible, a space in the church of Tranent fit to accommodate the boys and girls to be admitted into the hospital, and the master, assistant, mistress, and servants belonging to it.

"Sixthly. The yearly rents, interest, or profits of my said heritable and moveable property, accumulated as aforesaid, shall also be accumulated till the same amount to a sum sufficient for the building, erecting, and finishing, upon the said piece of ground to be purchased or feued as above mentioned, a house having accommodation for thirty children, or a larger or lesser number, according to circumstances, a master, assistant, and servants, and a schoolroom for the education of these children, and of sixty children, or a larger or lesser number, as shall be deemed expedient, to be admitted as day-scholars. Then I appoint such house or hospital to be built and finished under the direction of my said trustees, upon a plan to be framed on by them, and to be called 'George Stiell's Hospital;' and I recommend to my trustees that the building be neat and commodious.

"Seventhly. After the said hospital is built and completely finished, in manner before-mentioned, I appoint my said trustees herein named, and they are to be assumed, to select with care a master and assistant for the said hospital, of good and respectable characters, qualified to explain the doctrines and duties of the Christian religion, and capable of teaching the English language grammatically, writing, and arithmetic; and be allowed salary, to the master or rector, the sum of forty pounds sterling per annum, and to his assistant, the sum of thirty pounds sterling per annum.

"Eighthly. As soon as the said hospital is fit to be possessed, I appoint my said trustees to select from the parish of Tranent sixty boys and girls, of a larger or lesser number, according to circumstances (those of the name Stiell to be preferred), and to admit them into the day-school within the hospital, where it shall be the duty of the said master or rector and assistant to teach them the English language, writing, and arithmetic, between the hours of nine in the morning and one in the afternoon, and between three and six o'clock in the afternoon, during the summer months; and between the hours of nine aforesaid and twelve o'clock noon, and one o'clock afternoon, during the winter months. And it shall also be the duty of the said master or rector and his assistant to meet the children in the schoolroom on Sunday evening after their return from the worship, to instruct them in the principles of the Christian religion, specially the doctrines and duties of our holy religion according to the approved standards of the Church of Scotland; and the said master and his assistant shall be bound to subscribe the formula prescribed by law to all the teachers within the realm of Scotland; and the conduct and behaviour of the said master and his assistant, as well with regard to their mode of teaching as in other respects, shall be subject to the inspection, direction, and control of the said trustees; and it shall be in the power of the said trustees, if they see cause, to remove either the master or his assistant, or both, upon three months' previous notice being given. And I appoint the elections for all children to be admitted into the said hospital, either to reside therein, as hereinafter provided, or as day-scholars, as afore, to take place within the hospital twice in the year, upon the first Monday of April and first Monday of October respectively; and no boys or girls shall be admitted who are affected by any contagious distemper, unless they are elected upon either of the said days, except the first election for day-scholars, which is to take place as soon as the hospital is fit to be possessed, as above directed.

"Ninthly. When the yearly rents, interests, or profits of the subjects hereby disposed shall be more than sufficient to defray the salaries to the rector and his assistant, servants' wages, and all other contingent and necessary expenses of managing and maintaining the said establishment and hospital as a day-school, I appoint the said trustees herein named, or to be assumed in manner after-mentioned from time to time, to choose from residenters for at least three years in the said parish of Tranent, and to admit into the said hospital as many boys or girls as the surplus of the said yearly revenues will afford to maintain, clothe, and educate; and the said boys and girls shall attend the said public school at the hours before-mentioned, or at such other hours as the said trustees shall think proper, and be taught to read English grammatically, writing, and arithmetic. The said boys or girls shall not, at the time of their admission, be under seven, nor above ten years of age; nor shall they be allowed to remain in the said hospital after they attain the age of fourteen years complete.

"Tenthly. I appoint the preferences of admission into the said hospital, either to reside therein, or as day-scholars, to be as follows:—(1) Boys or girls of the name of Stiell, and failing of them, boys or girls of any other name or names belonging to the parish of Tranent; (2) boys or girls belonging to the parishes of Prestonpans, Gladsmuir, and Pencaitland, lying in the said county, respectively and successively after others.

"Twelfthly. I recommend to the said trustees to appoint a mistress or governess for the said hospital, whose business shall be to take charge of the girls in the hospital when not attending their education in the public school, and at least two hours in the day to teach the girls wash-seam and other necessary and useful branches of sewing, to take charge of the linens and whole furniture in the hospital, officiate as steward in purchasing victuals and drink, and to render an account thereof to the rector, so as he may account to the factor, oversee the dressing of the victuals, and superintend and direct the maid-servants of the hospital; and the mistress or governess' salary shall be such as the trustees shall think proper and reasonable.

"Seventeenthly. I hereby direct and appoint the said trustees or governors to pay to each boy or girl after they leave the said hospital, provided they have conducted themselves properly and correctly when in the hospital, such sum of money, not exceeding ^{sterling,} as the said trustees or governors shall think proper, in order to defray their outfit for any service or profession which they may choose; but the money so to be allowed shall not be paid until the boy or girl receiving the same shall have been at least three months in the service or profession which they have chosen, and upon a certificate from the master or mistress they are with that they have behaved properly during that period.

"And, lastly, I do hereby authorise and empower the said trustees or governors, from time to time, as they shall see cause, to make such alterations, amendments, improvements, or additions, to the rules and regulations laid down by me for the management of the said hospital and public school, they always keeping in view the original intention of said charitable institution. And I hereby direct and appoint the prices of the lands and others hereby disposed, which may hereafter be feued or sold by the said trustees or governors, and any other part of the accumulated capital of my estate as aforesaid which may come into the hands of the said trustees or governors, to be laid out in the purchase of other lands, or vested in heritable securities, as the said trustees or governors shall think proper, for the purposes aforesaid, and as they from time to time shall direct and appoint."

In 1818 the trustees feued eight acres of ground in the neighbourhood of Tranent, and upon this ground a hospital was completed in the year 1822 at a cost of £3500.

No. 28.

In February 1874 Archibald Allan and others, all parishioners and residents in Tranent, brought an action against the trustees for declarator that all the funds in their hands should be applied "in founding and endowing a hospital or charitable institution within the village of Tranent, or in its immediate neighbourhood, in the county of East Lothian, and for the relief, clothing, and education of poor children for ever, belonging to the parish of Tranent, or, failing them, belonging to the parishes of Prestonpans, Gladsmuir, and Pencaitland, in the order of preference directed by the said trust-disposition and settlement, including the children of all residents, parishioners, or others who may be unable to defray the expense of affording proper education to their children, and which hospital ought always to be called, denominated, and described 'George Stiell's Hospital'; and that the application of the whole or any part of the said estate, heritable or moveable, or of the yearly interest and profits arising therefrom, to the providing the means of education to other than the poor children of the parish of Tranent, or, failing them, poor children of the parishes of Prestonpans, Gladsmuir, and Pencaitland, in the county of Haddington, respectively and successively after others, including under that denomination as aforesaid, was and is illegal, incompetent, and unauthorized; and that the defenders have been and are administering the funds and affairs of the said institution in a manner contrary to the will, intention, and purposes of the said George Stiell." There were conclusions for the preparation of a scheme for the management of the hospital and for an accounting by the trustees.

Nov. 22, 1876.
Allan v.
Stiell's
Trustees.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The object and wish and intention of the said George Stiell, according to the just and true construction of his said trust-disposition and settlement, having been to afford gratuitous education to poor children of the parish of Tranent, and, failing such children, of the adjoining parishes above-named, for ever, the trust-funds ought to have been and to be applied to that purpose, and the pursuers should have decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. (2) The various changes and alterations made by the defenders on the constitution, management, and administration of the hospital and school being at variance with the wish and intention of the said George Stiell, were and are illegal and ultra vires of the defenders. (4) In respect the said institution is not being administered and managed in accordance with the will and intention of the said George Stiell, the Court ought to adjust and approve of a scheme or constitution for the future administration and management of the said institution, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title or interest to sue. (2) All parties not called. (5) The defenders having acted, in regard to the recent alleged changes, in accordance with the powers conferred upon them by the will of the founder, and trust-disposition and conveyance following thereupon, they should be absolved from the declaratory conclusions of the action.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first and second pleas in law of the defenders: Reserves all questions of expenses, and before answer allows the parties a proof of their respective averments, in terms of the 'Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866': Grants diligence to both parties for citing witnesses, and appoints the proof to be led before the Lord Ordinary on a day to be afterwards fixed."

The defenders reclaimed, and the Court pronounced this interlocutor 15th February 1875:—"Recall the same in so far as the Lord Ordinary, before answer, allows the parties a proof of their respective averments in terms of the 'Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866,' and grants diligence: Quoad ultra refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of: Further, remit to Mr Alexander S. Kinnear, advocate, to examine the

'George Stiell's Hospital,' and to receive the explanations and suggestions of both parties, and to report to this Division of the Court, with special reference to the articles of the condensation 13 to 21 inclusive, whether the administration of the defenders has been in conformity with the provisions of the founder's trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th January 1808, or in what respects, if any, the defenders have departed from or acted contrary to the provisions of the said deed; and appoint the defenders to exhibit to the reporter the whole books and other writings above specified, reserving in the meantime all questions of expense."

Allan v.
 Stiell's

Mr Kinnear presented a report which stated, inter alia,—"On the 1st January 1822 a rector was appointed for the hospital at a salary of £4 a-year, with board, &c., in the hospital, to which an addition of £10 a-year was afterwards made as a gratuity for his trouble in keeping the books of the hospital. On the 6th March 1823 an assistant-master was appointed 'upon the terms and conditions of the trust-deed,' and on the 10th April 1822 a mistress and governess was appointed at a salary of twenty guineas per annum.

"On the 6th of July 1822, sixty-one children, forty-one boys and twenty girls, were selected by the trustees as the first to be admitted to the hospital as day-scholars. The selection appears to have been made with the assistance of the Reverend Mr Henderson, minister of Tranent. This gentleman was not at that time a trustee; for the hospital had not yet been conveyed by the original trustees to the ex officio governors, but a minute of the meeting held at the hospital on the 3d June 1822, in which it is recorded that Mr Henderson was present, and 'mentioned to the meeting that he had made intimation both in writing and verbally to the residents in the parish, that all those who wished to send children to be educated at the hospital should make application to him, and that a great many had accordingly applied to him, of which he had taken and was keeping a correct list. And as it was proposed to open the hospital in the course of ten days or a fortnight, he would continue to take in the names of all applicants, and would, at the first meeting of the trustees lay the list before them, and which would specify the names of the children's parents, and their place of residence, and also their character and station in life, as personally known to him.'

"The complete list prepared by Mr Henderson is not engrossed in the minutes, and the number of the applicants is not recorded. But at the next meeting, July 18, 1822, the trustees are recorded to have selected from the list of applicants reported to them by Mr Henderson the number of scholars above-mentioned. A list of these, specifying their names and ages, and the names of their parents, is engrossed in the minute-book. The children are generally from eight to ten, but one is six and one twelve years of age. The occupation of the parents is also specified. The great number are said to be 'fishermen,' others are 'labourers,' 'hinds,' 'colliers,' 'weavers,' 'tailors,' and 'shoemakers.' Two are 'pensioners,' several are described as 'widows,' and one of the children is 'an orphan.' None of the parents in this list are described as paupers. This designation, however, occurs occasionally, though rarely, in the lists of the children admitted in subsequent years. The reporter has examined the whole of these lists; and, if they are accurate, which may probably be assumed, they indicate that the children selected for the benefits of the hospital during the whole period which has elapsed since 1822 have always belonged to the same class. A great number are the children of fishermen."

and the others are the children of hinds and artisans such as those above-mentioned. No. 28,

"The children admitted in 1822 were day-scholars only. No boarders were as yet admitted as inmates of the hospital. But in the following year, at a meeting of the trustees held on the 13th May 1823, twenty children, fifteen boys, and five girls were selected from a list of sixty-five, to be 'inmates, boarders, or residents within the hospital, in terms of the trust-deed of George Stiell, and to be received into the hospital as soon as it is found convenient to take them in.' The designation of the parents of those children, as stated in the list of applicants engrossed in the minute-book, are similar to those in the list above-mentioned. Nov. 22, 1876.
Allan v.
Stiell's
Trustees.

"At the same meeting the directors adopted a code of rules and regulations for the administration of the hospital. The following rules, however, seemed to be important as shewing the character of the hospital at its first establishment; and the kind of education which the children were to receive:—

' RULES.

'1. The establishment is to consist of a rector, an assistant teacher, a mistress or housekeeper, and maid-servants.

'2. The number of inmates to be at present limited to twenty, viz., fifteen boys and five girls.

'3. The number of children to be admitted as free scholars to be at present limited to eighty.

'4, 5, 6 are rules for the conduct of the children.

'7. Books, paper, pens, and ink, furnished to free scholars, must be paid for to the rector when delivered, and if parents or relatives fail to make these payments when such furnishings are required, the governors are compelled to state that their children must lose the benefit which their use would give, and must be left behind in the less advanced stages of education, from which they would otherwise have been removed.'

"The number of day-scholars appears to have increased from time to time. The number of inmates of the hospital appears for some time to have been maintained.

"The minutes appear to shew that for a number of years the hospital was administered in exact conformity with the truster's directions. The staff of office-bearers was precisely that which he had appointed; the children included day-scholars and inmates of the hospital; and the instruction appointed to be given to them was, with one immaterial exception, limited to the subjects expressly mentioned in the trust-deed. The exception is that the children are to be taught church music, which appears to have included nothing more than psalm singing.

"It may be proper to notice that the truster's direction in regard to the payment of sums of money to the children leaving the hospital was also carried out after the 29th November 1828. The minute of meeting of that date directs the factor to pay to each boy or girl who have left the hospital, or who may leave it, the sum of £5 upon such boy or girl obtaining and producing the required certificates in terms of the trust-deed.

"The first important change in the administration of the charity appears to have been made on the 16th February 1830, when it was resolved to reduce the number of inmates. It is recorded in the minute of a meeting of trustees on the 6th February 1830 that the factor stated to the meeting that it 'appeared to him a matter of great importance whether, from the fall of shop and house rents belonging to the trust, it would be expedient at present to admit no new inmates into the hospital; (2) the propriety of admitting, at any time, girls into the hospital;' and the trustees resolved only to admit one boy in addition to those already in the hospital. They further resolved to fit up an additional room as a schoolroom, in which the assistant-master should teach the junior class, and resolved to admit as many scholars as would make up the number to seventy in each schoolroom.

"From this date until the recent change in the system of management of the hospital the number of inmates living at one time in the hospital appears to have been generally about six or eight. At one time there were only four, and the numbers never seem to have exceeded nine. The school appears to have been divided, in terms of the minute just quoted, into an upper and lower school, the former under the management of the rector, and the latter under that of the assistant-master.

"It appears to have been in the beginning of 1870 that it first occurred to the trustees that a material change in the system of management of the hospital might be made with advantage.

"At this time the actual condition of the hospital appears to have been as follows:—There were eight inmates, four girls and four boys, and 12 day-scholars on the foundation. The former were maintained in the hospital, and the latter received every day a roll of bread for luncheon. School-books were not supplied gratuitously to the day-scholars, but sold at prime cost. The day-scholars had also to pay a small sum per month for pens and ink. It appears from the minutes that the applications for admission were much more numerous than it was possible for the directors to grant. The children in the lower department were taught reading, the simple rules of arithmetic, and the elements of grammar and geography. The rector's classes were taught reading and grammar, with parsing, analysis, and etymology. There were also taught history, writing to dictation, composition and geography. In arithmetic they were taught the ordinary rules, vulgar and decimal fractions, and those who showed a capacity for learning were taught Latin and the elements of geometry. It should seem, however, that the instruction in these latter branches was very elementary. All the children were taught singing. All the children received religious instruction.

"It appears from the minutes that the directors were satisfied with the general condition of the school, and the minute of the meeting of 24 April 1870 bears that Mr Cæsar had that day examined the school and found it in good working order.

"The amended regulations, and a prospectus issued by the directors in September 1871, with a view to carrying out the new system, shew the most important changes introduced:—

"1. The discontinuance of the old system of boarding and maintaining children as inmates of the hospital.

"2. The restriction to sixty of the number of free scholars to be admitted on the foundation.

"3. The institution of a preliminary examination.

"4. The institution of an entrance examination at passing from the lower to the higher school.

"5. The provision in rule xii. for instruction in advanced arithmetic, Euclid, algebra, Latin, Greek, French, and the elements of physical science.

"6. The increase of the salaries of the teachers.

"7. The introduction of paying pupils to be taught along with the foundationers.

"8. The institution of bursaries provided for in rules vi. and xix.

"The prospectus published by the directors in September 1871 is generally in accordance with the regulations. It expresses the desire of the directors to extend the benefit of the funds which they administer, and to improve the quality of the education given in the hospital; and it declares that to give effect to these views 'they have converted the upper division of the school into a high school,' to which 'those only will be admitted who pass an entrance examination.' Besides the subjects mentioned in the regulations, the prospectus contains a statement that 'it is proposed to introduce piano music, for which there will be a separate fee.'

"To carry their resolutions into effect the directors, in October 1871, made an arrangement with the parents of the children who were then resident in the hospital, by which, in lieu of board, clothing, and £5 on leaving the school, the sum of £10 per annum was to be paid them up to the time when under the previous regulations they would cease to be inmates; masters were appointed at the higher salaries; and in addition to the masters a female teacher was appointed, first at a salary of £25 per annum with board, and afterwards, on 14th October 1873, at a salary of £60, but without board.

"The staff of masters now in the hospital is as follows:—

Head master, not including board and half of fees in upper school,	£85	0	0
Assistant, including allowance for board, and not including half of fees in lower school,	85	0	0
Assistant (female), without board,	60	0	0
Matron, with board,	28	0	0

"The rate of fees at present is—

Upper school, 5s. per quarter for English.

Do. 7s. for English, Latin, French, Mathematics, &c.

Lower school, 2s. 6d. per quarter.

"The head master estimates his share of the fees at about £20 per annum. The assistant master estimates his share at less than £10 per annum.

"In addition to teachers already mentioned, a teacher of the piano has been appointed, who is paid a separate fee by such pupils as she instructs. She receives no regular salary from the trust-estate. But the directors have agreed to pay her £10 a-year if the fees do not amount to £50. If they do amount to that sum no payment is to be made by the directors.

"The resolution of the directors to reduce the free scholars to sixty does not appear to have been carried out during any whole year. The numbers were reduced at the end of the session 1872-3. But they were increased at the beginning of session 1873-4.

"At a meeting of directors, held 5th April 1875, it was reported by the rector that there were present 181 children on the roll, of whom ninety-six were free and eighty-five paying pupils. Having considered this report and the state of the funds, the directors resolved to increase the number of free scholars from 100 to 120, and that, of this additional twenty, there should be at once admitted ten, and that the remaining ten should be admitted at the commencement of the next session. It was further agreed that Mr Caesar should give notice to this effect from the pulpit.

"The free scholars now on the foundation appear to be of the same class as before, and the reporter does not understand it to be maintained that they are not proper objects for the charity. It would appear from the designations of the parents that many of the paying pupils also belong to the same class. There are among these the children of 'hinds,' fishermen,' 'labourers,' and 'miners.' But others of the parents are described as 'farmers,' and many of them are tradesmen, whose position, however, cannot be exactly ascertained from the mere description of their trade. The directors certainly contemplated that the persons who might take advantage of this part of their scheme should be such as were perfectly able to pay for the education of their children, and Mr Caesar, at the meeting above-mentioned, stated to the reporter that one of the reasons which suggested the introduction of a new system was the desire of many persons throughout the parish of respectable position and comfortable circumstances to have their children admitted into the hospital for the payment of fees. The pursuers have pointed out, as indicating the class who may in this way take advantage of the new system, that the children of Mr Caesar himself, the minister of the parish, were till recently among the paying pupils.

"It must be observed that the directors have never acted on the principle that the benefits of the foundation should be confined to actual paupers, or to persons who were altogether unable to pay for the education of their children. Mr Caesar, with whom, since he became a director, the responsibility of selection has chiefly lain, explains that the children admitted have been those whose parents 'would have difficulty in paying fees,' and 'as much if not more difficulty than any other persons in the parish.' But an absolute incapacity to make any payment was not considered indispensable to qualify for admission.

"All the children, whether paying or on the foundation, are treated in school in the same manner, except that a roll of bread is given to the foundationers daily for luncheon, while the other pupils, who have the same luncheon, pay for what they receive.

"The education in the lower school does not seem to be in any respect more advanced than that contemplated by the trust-deed. Nothing more appears to be taught than the subjects specially mentioned in the ninth head of the trust-deed, with the addition of geography and singing. The addition of these subjects, so far as they can be taught in the lower school, will not probably be maintained to constitute a violation of the trust.

"The subjects taught in the upper school not included among those specified by the testator are geography, mathematics, Latin, and French. Greek, although mentioned in the prospectus, has not in fact been taught under the present system. All of these subjects including, in one instance, the rudiments of Greek, were taught occasionally, as above explained, before the new system was adopted.

"The pursuers maintain that by the changes now explained, 'the upper division of the school has been converted into a high school, to which those only are admitted who pass an entrance examination, appointed by the trustees'; and that the effect of the new arrangement is to divert the funds of the hospital from the class of poor children intended to be benefited, and to provide, partly out of the funds of the hospital, a cheaper and higher class of education for the children of parents who are able to procure and pay for it at other educational institutions in the parish of Tranent.

"The institution of an examination at entering the school, or passing from the lower school to the higher, appears to be a very proper regulation, within the powers of the directors. The entrance examination is not competitive, but is intended to enable the directors to judge whether children, who have already been provisionally selected, are qualified to benefit by the teaching given at the hospital. This examination takes place twice a-year, in April and October; and it is stated both by the rector and Mr Caesar to be extremely elementary. The subjects of the examination are in general reading, writing, simple addition, and subtraction. But the questions vary according to the age of the child. No. 28.

"The second examination at passing into the high school is conducted by the rector, and is confined to the subjects which have been taught in the lower school. The practical result is that the children are drafted into the upper school when the masters think them fit for it, subject to the approval of the directors."

The pursuers argued;—Down to 1870 the hospital was simply a charitable institution. At that time the directors converted it into a hospital and a high school. They acted contrary to the will of the founder (1) in taking paying pupils; (2) in abolishing inmates; (3) in employing a higher class of teachers. The funds were diminished for the poor children by being spent on paying pupils. The accommodation and teaching powers were fully employed for the benefit of the poor before 1870. The name of the institution has been changed into "Stiell's Hospital and High School." The salaries of the teachers having been fixed at very low terms shewed the founder's intention that only elementary education should be given. The trustees had no discretion as to the class of children benefited, which was described by the founder as consisting of poor children.

The bursaries instituted in 1871 might go to paying pupils, who were not within the contemplation of the founder.¹

Argued for the defenders;—There was no diversion of the funds and no exclusion of the objects of charity contemplated by the founder. The new pupils were paying for themselves. Their fees were sufficient to pay the additional salaries of the masters. The tone of the school was raised and the teaching power increased by the addition of paying pupils. Besides, the object of the founder was not to educate pauper children. Children might be able to pay a small fee and yet be poor in the sense of the trust-deed.²

At advising,—

Lord President.—The pursuers of this action challenge the legality of certain new regulations made by the defenders as the acting governors and directors of Stiell's Hospital, Tranent, on the ground that they involve a diversion of the funds of the endowment for purposes not contemplated by the founder. It is not disputed that the governors have the power of making new regulations conferred upon them by the deed of foundation, and it is worth while to read the terms of that power as the limit of the discretion vested in the trustees. They are authorised "from time to time, as they shall see cause, to make such alterations, amendments, improvements, or additions to the rules and regulations laid down by me for the management of the said hospital and public school, they always keeping in view the original intention of said charitable institution." The power thereby conferred seems in accordance with the discretion always held to be vested in the trustees of a charity of this kind, subject to the control of the Court, and the principle which guides the Court is very much that has here been laid down as the power to be allowed the trustees.

Stiell's

There are a number of things complained of here without much foundation into which it is not necessary to examine in detail. But for the purpose of examining the more formidable it is necessary to understand the intention of the founder as gathered from the trust-deed. It is quite clear from it that the founder intended that the first thing to be done was to feu a piece of ground in the village of Tranent, and a certain accumulation of the capital was directed to that end. There was then to be a further accumulation of the rents and interests of the capital for a particular time, in order to put the trustees in funds to build a house for the accommodation of about thirty boarders, and a master, an assistant, and servants. The boarders were to be clothed and maintained there. But the house was also to be so situated as to have a schoolroom for about sixty children as day-scholars. The house being built, the next thing to be done was, not to appoint children to be inmates of the house, but, on the contrary, to set up the day-school; and it is quite plain that the institution of the day-school was to be preferable in point of time to the setting up of the hospital proper—that is to say, the house in which the children were to be clothed and maintained. It was only if there was a sufficient surplus after providing the day-school that this secondary object was to be carried out.

When the case was originally before us we had an argument on the relevancy of the action, and upon certain pleas which the Lord Ordinary had repelled. It appeared to us then (while we agreed with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary so far) that this was a case in which it was not desirable that proof should be taken, and we therefore remitted to Mr Kinnear to report. His report is now before us, and it is a very able and satisfactory one. Although he has not told us how far in his opinion the trustees have exceeded their power, if they have done so at all, he has furnished us with materials for forming an opinion ourselves. He says that it seems to have been in the beginning of the year 1870 that it first occurred to the governors that a material change in the management of the hospital might be made with advantage; and the most important changes introduced in September 1871 were as follows:—(1) The discontinuance of the old system of boarding and maintaining children as inmates of the hospital; (2) the restriction to sixty of the number of day-scholars to be educated on the foundation; (3) the institution of a preliminary examination; (4) the institution of a further examination of children passing from the lower to the upper branches (now for the first time introduced); (5) the provision for advanced education in languages and the physical sciences; (6) the increase of the teachers' salaries; (7) the introduction of paying pupils along with the free pupils on the foundation; and (8) the institution of bursaries.

In regard to the first of these matters—the discontinuance of the old system of boarding and maintaining children as inmates of the hospital—it is no doubt an important question. It must be kept in view that the truster himself had obviously a preference so far for a day-school in comparison with the hospital proper that it was not until the day-school had been fully and satisfactorily set up that his trustees were to proceed to elect inmates to the house. At the same time it is not possible to disguise from one's self that he did mean that as soon as the day-school was set up, capable of accommodating sixty scholars, there should be a proportion of about one-half of that number educated as inmates of the hospital. It has been represented by the governors, and it is quite within the knowledge of the Court, that there are great objections to the maintenance a system of that kind at the present day, and that wherever it is possible it is very desirable that the system of maintaining and clothing children in such an institution should give way to the far better object of providing a day-school. The only question is whether it is within the powers of the trustees to make at change—to discontinue and abandon altogether what constituted one part of the founder's original scheme. This question is certainly not free from difficulty, but upon the whole I am inclined to say that this is quite within the powers of the governors. The powers intended to be vested in them were to make such alterations upon the original scheme of the founder as might be considered necessary or deemed expedient in the different constitution of society and the altered circumstances of the times generally; and there are various cases in which the Court have sanctioned alterations of this kind. Within the last few days we have given our sanction to a change of a similar kind, though not exactly of the same description as this, in the case of Bishop Burnet's foundation (reported ante, p. 106), and I cannot help thinking it is within the power of these trustees, subject of course to the control of the Court, to prefer the day-school to the boarding system, even to the extent of discontinuing the boarding system altogether. Therefore I am not prepared to say that they have exceeded their powers in this respect.

The complaint which is made under the second head, that the governors have restricted their scholars to sixty, is not well founded in point of fact.

The third complaint is as to the institution of the examination for the children to be admitted into the day-school. I think this is a regulation entirely within the powers of the trustees. I do not think it can be maintained that any person has an absolute right, upon the mere ground of poverty alone, to the benefits of the educational endowments. I should be very sorry indeed to give any countenance to such a proposition, and I think it was quite within the powers of the governors of such an institution to say that they would select from among the poor children of the class intended to be benefited the most promising, and those who were likely to benefit most from the education which they were prepared to give. The preliminary examination of such a child must be of a very slight kind, but it may shew what children are best suited to reap advantage from their educational training. In the same manner, if the institution of the higher school be in itself lawful, I cannot for one moment doubt that the examination of children passing into it was also quite within the power of the trustees.

In the next place, I think the increase of salaries was quite within the power of the trustees. And further, with regard to the introduction of (1) what is called the higher school, and (2) of bursaries, I cannot see any illegality, provided that the benefits are confined to the objects of the founder's charity. But it is necessary to consider these changes in connection with the last and most important change—that of the introduction of paying pupils. In regard to that, I am far from saying that it was not in the power of managers of a charitable institution of this kind to add to it the instruction of pupils who pay for their education. Unquestionably, some of the best institutions both in Scotland and England were originally charitable institutions purely, and yet have grown up to be schools of very great importance for the instruction of the children of both rich and poor persons. The only condition that it was absolutely necessary to add to was that the paying pupils should not derive any direct benefit from the charitable fund. It would not do to say we shall take in children whose parents may pay to a certain extent, and to give them so far the benefits of the charity, advancing them to a higher position of culture than their parents could give them. That proceeding would not fall under such a foundation as this. There was also no objection to the bursaries, provided that the paying pupils did not benefit by them. In short, what the managers of an institution of this kind must do in adding paying pupils to the foundation is to make sure that in affording the benefits of education to the paying pupils they shall take care that the pupils paid the full value of it, or, in other words, that they shall not be educated either wholly or partially at the expense of the charity. It is not necessary that they shall make a profit by paying pupils. But if there is a margin of profit they must at least pay the full expense of what they get. The question comes to be whether they do so here. The trustees have made a mistake in confining the number of free scholars, and although they have increased their number they have not yet increased it to such a point as to exhaust the funds of the charity. On the contrary, it seems quite clearly made out that there are charity funds in their hands which would suffice to educate a large number of poor children in the proper sense of the term than they have at present in the school. And so in the present administration of these funds they are really making use of the funds for the benefit of what are called paying pupils. In short, the school funds are administered in such a way as to give instruction to those who are not objects of the charity. The amount contributed by paying pupils is plainly insufficient to furnish their quota of the expenses of the establishment. I think it indispensable, therefore, that we set the managers right in so far as regards that matter; and it follows from what has been said in respect to the institution of bursaries that these must plainly be confined to the proper objects of the trustor's charity, because if bursaries provided out of the charity were given to paying pupils the benefit of the charitable fund would be given to persons who are not the objects of the foundation.

It appears to me, therefore, as regards these matters, that we ought to direct that this part of the scheme of the managers should not receive effect. I am not disposed to say that in any other respect there is any error in principle in what has been proposed, and I can see a great deal of expediency in the general scheme. I think that the best course would be to make a finding in accordance with what has been suggested, and to remit to Mr Kinnear to adjust the scheme which the trustees have issued in accordance with these views.

LORD DEAS.—We have here a very clamorous summons against trustees who have endeavoured to discharge their duty to this charity conscientiously and to the best of their ability. If there has been an error at all, it is now admitted to have been an error of judgment merely, and I can only say, if there has been an error of judgment at all, I do not think it has been a great one. I agree with all that has been said by your Lordship in respect to the things you consider to have been within the power of the trustees. With respect to admitting or excluding paying pupils, I should prefer that there should not be any finding at present. The only conclusions of the summons which can be given effect to refer to the preparation of a scheme for the management of the hospital. These conclusions are not objected to, and there are good grounds for directing the preparation of such a scheme apart altogether from any charge or complaint against the trustees. Important changes which your Lordship proposes to make have been made—such as the discontinuance of inmates—and I quite agree with the observation that there has been a change of opinion in the present pon that subject, and in favour of giving children the benefit of domestic aining, if that can be done consistently with carrying out the object of the under. Another change which it is proposed to sanction is the increase of the laries of the masters, and to this the trustees are entitled to get judicial sanc-on also. There are besides other changes for which, if they are proper changes, ie trustees are entitled to obtain the sanction of the Court, and I can therefore ave no doubt of the propriety of ordering the preparation of a scheme.

 Allan v.
 Stiell's

That being so, I would prefer that when the scheme came before us it should e open for us to consider what effect the changes proposed would have on the uestion of admitting paying pupils. I cannot see the advantage of a finding on hat subject at present, but I can see great disadvantages from it, and I would ave liked to consider the question along with the other parts of the scheme. I do not think that the testator ever contemplated providing free education for all the poor children in Tranent, Prestonpans, and the two other parishes. It appears from his deed that all he contemplated was to provide for the maintenance and education of thirty inmates, and the education of sixty or thereby day-scholars—(His Lordship here read passages from the deed). I do not construe the deed as shewing the founder's intention to provide, in the first instance, for day-scholars, and, as a secondary object, for inmates. The institution is said to be "for the aliment, clothing, and education of poor children for ever," and a house is to be provided "having accommodation for thirty children, or a larger or lesser number according to the circumstances, a master, assistant, and servants, and a school-room for these children, and of sixty children, or the admission of such larger or lesser number of day-scholars as should be deemed expedient. But this was not to be done until the hospital was fit to be occupied. The single thing which favours your Lordship's view on this subject is the passage at the beginning of the ninth head—(His Lordship here read the passage). The primary purpose was to have a house built called "Stiell's Hospital," for the education of poor children. Now, I do not see why the funds set free by the discontinuance of inmates should necessarily be devoted to increase the number of day-scholars. When you take into view the broad powers given in a later part of the deed to make alterations on the rules and regulations, I am not prepared to say that the trustees have exceeded their powers, or that the necessary charges made did not open up an opportunity of conferring greater educational advantages than the founder considered his fund would be able to afford. The broad terms in which these powers to make alterations are conferred are very important—(His Lordship here read the first sentence of the last purpose). Now, if the trustees are entitled to make the other changes which they propose, I am not prepared to say that the reception of paying pupils may not be proper and allowable if it does not appear that this will diminish the funds available for the education of as many poor children as the founder had in view. We do not know whether it may add to these funds in place of diminishing them. If, on inquiry, it turns out that there will be no diminution, the objection will resolve into this, that part of the accommodation of the hospital which was, and is no longer, required for the inmates, will be taken advantage of for the paying pupils. I am not in the least prepared to say that this would be unlawful. But I would like to reserve my opinion until the scheme is before us.

The only other thing which I wish to say at present is this: Those who are favoured by the deed are called poor children. Now, we know that a most important change has been made by the recent Education Act as respects poor children, who now fall to be educated at the public expense. I do not think the founder intended to provide education for children who would otherwise be provided with education at the public expense. Or, in other words, to make a present of his means to the parochial boards of the parishes in which he was interested. This is a most important and novel consideration in dealing with such charitable and educational institutions, and I shall greatly regret if, when we come to discuss the proposed scheme as a whole, we shall find ourselves hampered in considering whether any, and if so, what, effect ought to be given to it.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordship and Lord Deas on those branches of the case upon which you are agreed. And with reference to the admission of paying pupils, if that should involve the exclusion of children who are proper objects of the charity, I concur with your Lordship in the chair, because, as matters now stand, I do not see how a scheme can be put into proper shape unless some such finding as that proposed by your Lordship is pronounced. But I should certainly not wish to pronounce any finding which would seem to imply that the trustees had intentionally deviated from the directions of the founder, because I am satisfied that they had no such intention. On one point, however, viz, the introduction of paying pupils to the exclusion of free scholars, I am disposed to think that they have gone beyond their powers. And if the scheme proposed points to the admission of scholars not on the foundation, to the competition for bursaries provided out of the funds of the institution, that, I think, also be beyond the power of the trustees.

As regards the construction of the deed, it appears to me to be pretty clear that the intention of the founder, as explained by the terms of the deed, was to provide an institution for "poor children;" and that, while he contemplated a part of that institution a hospital for inmates who were to be maintained and clothed as well as educated, that was to be subordinate to the day-school. In these circumstances, I concur in thinking that it was within the discretion of the trustees to give up the part of the institution which consisted of resident inmates provided the funds thereby set free were otherwise applied towards the education of proper objects of the charity; and I did not understand it to be contended on the part of the pursuers that such a change, subject always to the above qualification, or that the institution of a higher and lower school, was beyond the powers of the trustees. But I agree with your Lordship that if the effect of taking in paying pupils is to lead to the exclusion, either directly or indirectly, of children who are proper objects of the charity, that is beyond the power of the trustees. And as the scheme as proposed may, in the view I take of it, operate in such a way as to lead to this result, I am of opinion, with your Lordship in the chair, that a finding or instruction to meet this state of matters should be embodied in the interlocutor to be pronounced. And I think it should also be made clear that the bursaries provided out of the funds of the institution are not open to paying pupils, who were not, as it appears to me, within the contemplation of the founder.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the defenders, as trustees and governors of Stiell's Hospital, in framing, publishing, and acting on the prospectus and new regulations for the administration of the charity in the year 1871, and subsequently, have not exceeded the powers conferred on them by the trust-deed, in the position and settlement of the founder, or otherwise belonging to it."

them as trustees and governors, except so far as by the operation of the said new regulations pupils attending the school and paying for their education, as not being proper objects of the charity, receive benefit from the funds, property, and revenue of the charity: Find that no part of the funds, property, and revenue of the said charity can be legally employed for the education of persons who, being able to pay for their education, are not poor children within the meaning of the founder's trust-disposition and settlement: Find that the said trustees and governors are not entitled to admit pupils who are not proper objects of the charity as pupils, to the effect of excluding from the school other pupils who are proper objects of the charity, or otherwise than on the footing of the persons who are not proper objects of the charity paying fees which shall fully meet the expense of their education at the said school: With these findings, remit the cause back to Mr Kinnear to alter the said new regulations and adjust a scheme for the administration of the charity in accordance with the said findings and with the trust-disposition and settlement of the founder, and to report the same to the Court."

Burrell v.

Simpson & Co.

Claims were also lodged by Simpson and Company, and other owners of the cargo of the "Dunluce Castle;" by David Leith and others, seamen, who had lost their body-clothes and other property; by Thomas Thomson and others, underwriters, who had insured the "Dunluce Castle" for £6000, which they had paid to the petitioner; and by the petitioner himself, who claimed deduction for loss of freight and expenses of shipwrecked seamen.

The underwriters on record claimed the whole fund in satisfaction of their loss, and alternatively that they should be ranked pari passu with the owners of cargo and the crew, or otherwise should be preferred to the balance, amounting to about £800, after satisfying the owners of cargo and seamen; but in argument the two alternative claims only were maintained.

The cargo owners maintained that they were entitled to be preferred to the underwriters, on the ground that the latter could only claim as assignees of Burrell himself. If the owner of the "Fitzmaurice" had been a different person from the owner of the "Dunluce Castle" they did not dispute that the underwriters would have come in pari passu. The policy of insurance gave an independent title to the salvage, but not to other rights, such as a claim of damage.

The underwriters answered that the insurers were entitled to sue for compensation due to the owners,¹ and that not as mere assignees. The policy of insurance, when followed by total loss, operated as a vendition—a potential retrospective vendition, which went back to the date of the loss.

Burrell also disputed the claim of the underwriters to the balance of £800, assuming that the owners of cargo and seamen were to be satisfied before them. He argued that this was a claim against him, which could only be made through him. They were only his assignees. It was essential to the success of the claim that it might have been made good by himself.² But the person who injured Burrell was himself, therefore the claim could not be enforced. If it were otherwise, Burrell would not be indemnified under his policy of insurance. The underwriters would give the money with one hand and take it away with the other.

Answered for the underwriters, that the owner of the "Dunluce Castle" was trustee for the underwriters, and must either recover or allow them to do so.

There were some minor points in the case. The owners of cargo maintained—(1) That Burrell, in estimating the tonnage, was bound to include the berthage of the crew.⁴ (2) That he must pay interest from the date of the collision.⁵ (3) That he was liable to the successful claimants both for the expenses of this process and for those of the English suit which was restrained.⁶

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts out of which the questions we are now to dispose of have arisen are simple. It appears that on the 4th of February 1876, whi the "Dunluce Castle" was on her passage from London to Leith, she was run down by the steamship "Fitzmaurice;" they came into collision near Lowestoft, and the result of it was that the "Dunluce Castle" was sunk, and became a total loss. The fault of the collision is admitted to have been entirely on the side of the "Fitzmaurice." And accordingly this petition is presented by the owner of the "Fitzmaurice," under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862, for limitation of his liability in respect of the damage done by the collision. The statute provides that in such a case as the present, where there was no loss of life, the liability of the owners of the offending ship shall be limited to £8 a ton upon the registered tonnage of the vessel. There is a point connected with the mode of ascertaining the amount of the fund which it may be necessary to dispose of hereafter, but the important question arises in the competition among the different claimants. The claimants who are first in the field, I think, are the owners of the cargo of the sunk ship "Dunluce Castle;" and they claim not only to rank along with other claimants, but they claim an exclusive preference over the fund, which, if it be sustained, will have the effect of repairing their damage to the full amount, and leave a balance for the other claimants. There is another small claim on behalf of the seamen of the "Dunluce Castle," which I think it was hardly disputed must rank pari passu with that of the owners of the cargo, and even giving effect to both these claims there would still be a balance of somewhere about £800.

The next claim to be considered is for the underwriters upon the ship "Dunluce Castle;" and they claim, in the first place, to rank pari passu with the other claimants upon the fund, and alternatively, in the event of the owners of the cargo and the seamen being preferred to them, they then claim the balance.

The questions which have thus been raised would not be very difficult of solution if it were not for one fact, viz., that the owner of the sunk ship is also the owner of the offending ship; that is to say, the petitioner here, Mr Burrell, is the sole owner of both the offending vessel and of the sunk vessel; and that certainly gives rise to some considerations of an unusual kind and of very considerable delicacy. I do not think it can be disputed that the owners of the cargo have a good claim, and also the seamen, and I do not think it can be disputed either that under ordinary circumstances the underwriters in the sunk ship would have a good claim. But it is said that in respect of their being the assignees of Mr Burrell in the property of the ship, or what remains of the ship "Dunluce Castle," they are not entitled to compete with parties who derive no right through him, but claim adversely to him, and so it is said that the owners of cargo must prevail against them, and Mr Burrell says, that as in a question with him the underwriters upon the ship "Dunluce Castle" are not entitled to claim as against him, and would not be entitled to maintain an action against him for the wrong done to the "Dunluce Castle" by the "Fitzmaurice" because of the identity of ownership of the two vessels.

Now, in order to determine these questions it is necessary to consider very particularly what is the effect of a total loss, either actual or constructive, as in a question between the owners and the underwriters of the lost vessel. There can be no doubt that whether the loss be actual or constructive, if it be a total loss, the property of the sunk vessel passes to the underwriters. And it is also quite settled that all the incidents of that property pass with it. But it is necessary to go a little deeper than that general statement of principle in order to see what is the precise relation of the underwriters and the owners after the property

No. 29.

Burrell v. Simpson & Co.

No. 29. of the vessel has so passed from the one to the other. It is quite clear that in any transference either of an heritable subject or of a corporeal moveable by voluntary conveyance nothing passes as an incident of the subject of the nature of a claim of damages. The disponee of an heritable subject, or the purchaser of a corporeal moveable, takes it just as it stands at the time of the conveyance, with, of course, all the incidental rights belonging to it as a piece of property; but it is quite clear that in such a case a claim of damage for injury done to the property before transference takes place could never pass along with the conveyance of the subject. Now, it is quite settled that in that kind of vendition which takes place by the operation of law,—when the underwriter pays the contents of his policy upon a sunk ship,—a claim of damages against a vessel which has caused the loss of the ship by collision does pass along with the property of what remains of the vessel; and therefore it is quite obvious from that consideration alone, without going any farther, that the transference which is operated by force of law when the underwriter pays under his policy upon the lost ship is something quite different from an ordinary voluntary conveyance of a corporeal moveable.

It has been questioned whether in strictness it can be held that the property of the ship passes at all; and the difficulty has been suggested that the property of a British ship cannot pass from one owner to another except in the form provided by the Registry Act; and that, therefore, what is meant when the law says that the property of a ship passes from the owner to the underwriters is no more than this, that from that time the owner becomes trustee for the underwriters, the formal title of property remaining in him, and the beneficial interest as it were, only passing to the underwriters. That was a suggestion made by Lord Truro in the case of Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Company, arising out of the loss of the ship "Laurel."¹ It was no part of his Lordship's judgment in disposing of these cases on appeal, and can only be taken as obiter dictum, and I humbly think that his Lordship proceeded upon a mistake in making that suggestion. It is quite true that the property of a registered British ship cannot pass except in the form provided by the statute. But the thing which passes in the case supposed is not the property of a British ship; it is the property of a wreck, which is no longer a ship, which may, no doubt, notwithstanding its being totally lost within the view of the law, be raised from the bottom of the sea and repaired and become a ship again, but if it be so, it will no longer be the same ship, and it will no longer be entitled to the registry of the old ship, but will require a new register of its own. And therefore I think it plainly a mistake to suppose that any difficulty arises out of the Registry Act, and that there can be no difficulty at all in holding, in the literal sense of the term, what is laid down by all the authorities, that when a vessel becomes totally lost, the underwriters upon her, when they pay the contents of their policy to the owners, acquire the property in what remains of the ship—that is to say, they acquire the property in the wreck, and they acquire with that all the rights which were incident to the ship. They also subject themselves to all the liabilities attaching to the ship and its owners. For example, they will be liable for the reward of a salvor who had performed services in the way of saving some portion of the ship, and they might be liable also, in all probability, for debts which were constituted a lien over the ship. But the one thing to be observed, and which is of the greatest importance in the present case, is that the rights which the underwriters acquire, and the liabilities to which they are subjected, are the proper rights and liabilities of the sunk ship, and of the former owner of that ship only as owner. They do not represent the owner in any proper sense. They represent him in one sense, in so far as they have in themselves the ownership of the ship, and all the rights and liabilities thence resulting; but they do not by any means represent him in the same sense in which an ordinary assignee represents his cedent. All that they take upon them, and all that they acquire under this legal transference to them, is the rights of the ship and liabilities of the ship. I apprehend that the true doctrine, as contrasted with what I have represented as the view of Lord Truro, has been extremely well stated in a late case by the present Lord Chief Justice of England,¹ and I venture to quote his words as being very weighty authority, and at the same time, I think, clearly explaining the view which I am now endeavouring to submit to your Lordships. He says that "in the case of a total loss, whatever remains of the vessel in the shape of salvage, or whatever rights accrue to the owner of the thing insured and lost, they pass to the underwriter the moment he is called upon to satisfy the exigency of the policy, and he does satisfy it. It is admitted that if this ship had been recovered from the bottom of the sea by any of the contrivances of modern skill and science available for that purpose, the body of the vessel would have passed to the underwriters. If, moreover, her value had proved to be more than the estimated value in the policy, the underwriters would still have been entitled to the vessel recovered." It is only necessary to add a single word of explanation to this statement of law, because it is quite true that the right passes to the underwriters at the time when they satisfy their obligation under the policy. But then the passing of the right has a retrospective effect; it takes effect from the time when the casualty occurred, which is the cause of the total loss, whether actual or constructive.

Now, keeping these principles in view, the first question which I put is, whether in the circumstances that have here occurred the underwriters upon the "Dunluce Castle" have a good direct claim for damages against the owner of the "Fitzmaurice!" Under ordinary circumstances there cannot be the smallest doubt they would. That is quite settled; and the only peculiarity is that the owner of the "Fitzmaurice" was the owner of the "Dunluce Castle." Is that a good reason for rejecting the claim as a claim by the underwriters upon the sunk ship against the owner of the offending ship? The right which has passed to the underwriters by the legal transference of the vessel is a right to maintain this claim against all who are liable to satisfy it; and it must be kept in mind that the owner of the offending vessel is not the only person who is liable to satisfy this claim. The persons whose actual and direct fault caused the collision would be answerable—the persons who were charged with the navigation of the offending ship. And therefore the owner is one of the persons answerable for the collision, but answerable in the strict sense only in a sort of secondary ability. The culpa is the culpa of the persons navigating the ship. The owner is answerable in the claim only because he is responsible for the persons who did navigate the ship. Then, is it to be said that when the property of the sunk vessel has passed to the underwriters with all its incidents, including the right of claim against the offending ship for the damage done by the collision—is it to be said that the owner of the offending vessel shall escape from this liability because he was also owner of the sunk ship? I confess I am quite unable to see any ground in law for holding that. It seems to me, on the contrary, to be

Burrell v.

Simpson & Co.

No. 29. quite clear that the operation of the legal assignment of the ship from the owner to the underwriters is to carry with it all the rights which would have belonged to any owner of that vessel, no matter who he might be ; and as soon as by that legal assignment the owner of the offending ship ceased to be owner of the "Dunluce Castle" there was no longer any identity of persons between the party who makes the claim and the party who is liable to satisfy the claim. That identity is put an end to by the operation of law, and therefore I think that the underwriters in these circumstances would have a perfectly good ground for action against the owner of the "Fitzmaurice" to make good the damage caused by the collision.

Nov. 24, 1876.
Burrell v.
Simpson & Co.

That being so, the next question comes to be, whether as against the fund which we have now to distribute they have or have not as good a claim as the owners of the cargo ? The liability of the owner of the offending vessel, but for the statute, would be a liability to meet both of these claims in full, and apart from the statute that liability could never be satisfied except by a payment in full, unless in the case of bankruptcy of the party who was liable as the owner of the offending vessel ; and supposing such a case had occurred, that the owner of the offending vessel became bankrupt before these claims were satisfied : is there any reason to say that in a ranking in bankruptcy the one claim must be postponed to the other ? I do not see any reason for that. Now, this case which we have to deal with is what may be called a case of statutory insolvency. The statute interposes for the protection of the owners of the offending vessel, and says, we shall deal with you in this way, that you shall not be liable in debt more than a certain sum per ton of the tonnage of your vessel ; in other words we limit your liability to that ; and we thus create an insufficient fund, it may be, to meet the claims of those who are damaged by the collision. That is nothing more than a case of insolvency created by statute. And therefore it seems to me that the case is just the same here as if the owner of the offending ship had become bankrupt and these parties had been claimants in the sequestration. And if it be so, I do not see why the one party should be preferable to the other. I have said already that it does not appear to me that the underwriters represent the owner of the offending vessel in any sense. They may represent him as the former owner of the "Dunluce Castle," but they certainly do not represent him as the owner of the offending vessel ; and I do not know anything that the owners of cargo can say against them short of this—You are identified with the offending party here in some way or other, and therefore you cannot in his right be entitled to claim in competition with us. That is the nature of their argument, but it seems to me to want facts for its foundation. There is no identity between the parties ; there is no community of interest ; nay, there is no community of title. It is not the act of the owner of the "Dunluce Castle" and of the "Fitzmaurice" that has given to the underwriters the right upon which they are now claiming ; it is the act of the law that has given it to them, and they are strangers to the owner of the "Dunluce Castle" and of the "Fitzmaurice" just as much as the owners of the cargo of the "Dunluce Castle" are. The relation between the carrier and the owners of the cargo is quite as intimate as the relation between the owner and the underwriters of the ship, and it is out of the relation of the owner and underwriters upon the ship that the law has created the right upon which the underwriters of the ship are now claiming. I am therefore of opinion, upon the main question raised in this case, that the underwriters upon the ship have not only a good claim as in a ques-

with the owner of the "Fitzmaurice," but that they have also a perfectly good No. 29.
 claim to rank pari passu with the owners of the cargo of the "Dunluce Castle." Nov. 24, 1876.
 The claimants before us, therefore, in so far as their claims have been stated, I Burrell v.
 think must be all ranked pari passu upon the fund which we have to consider. Simpson & Co.

But there are one or two other points to which it is necessary to advert, which were separately raised here. There is a question raised as to what is to be taken to be the tonnage of the "Fitzmaurice" in estimating the amount of the fund. In the petition, as it was originally presented, the petitioner stated that the tonnage of the vessel was 473-65. He has since desired to amend that, and to state it as being 448-80. Now, the difference between the two is accounted for by the space occupied for the berthage of the crew, and the question is whether in estimating the tonnage of the "Fitzmaurice" for the purpose of this petition we are to take it as being 473 tons odds, or whether we are to deduct the space occupied by the berthage of the crew and reduce it to 448 tons? The "Fitzmaurice" is a steam vessel, and the provisions of the statute with regard to the measurement of steam vessels is different from that which applies to sailing vessels. In the Act of 1854, section 21, we have the rule for measuring tonnage of vessels, and in sub-section 4 there is a particular rule given for measuring or excluding poops and other enclosed spaces; and in the end of that sub-section there is the following proviso:—" (1st) That nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship, and in case of such excess the excess only shall be added; and (2dly) that nothing shall be added in respect of any building erected for the shelter of deck passengers."

Now, it is admitted that the space here proposed to be deducted does not exceed one-twentieth of the tonnage of the ship; and therefore in the ordinary case, measuring this ship for the purpose of registry, the space appropriated to the berthing of the crew would fall to be deducted. Then, in section 23, there is this provision with regard to steam vessels. The provision I have just read is applied to sailing ships, but in section 23 we have the 3d rule with regard to measurement:—" In every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine-room, an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid, and the remainder be deemed to be the registered tonnage of such ship, and such deduction shall be estimated as follows;" and then follow the particular rules for the mode of estimating the deduction. The point to be noticed here is that the space occupied by the propelling power is to be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid. Now, I apprehend that the meaning of that phrase there is the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained under the various provisions and rules of section 21, and one of these rules is to deduct the space occupied by the berthage of the crew. It seems to me, therefore, pretty plain that under this statute of 1854, in measuring steam vessel the owners are entitled to have deduction from the gross tonnage, in the first place, for the berthage of the crew, and, in the second place, for the space occupied by the propelling power.

Now, if that be plain, let us look in the next place to the 54th section of the Act of 1862, under which this question arises. It provides that "the owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not," in certain cases named, "be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, and to an aggregate amount exceeding

No. 29. £15 for each ton of their ships, nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room." Now, the argument which is maintained by claimants here, is, that this means that the tonnage of a steamship is to be taken without any deduction whatever, not only without deduction on account of engine-room, but also without deduction on account of berthage of seamen. That certainly seems a somewhat unreasonable view, there being no apparent ground for making a distinction between sailing ships and steamships as regards the deduction of berthage room for seamen, and it is based only, so far as I see, upon the use in this clause of the term "gross tonnage." It seems to be intended that gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room, necessarily means gross tonnage in the sense of tonnage without any deduction at all.

Now, comparing that with the previous statute, it appears to me that this is not a reasonable construction. What is meant here, I apprehend, by gross tonnage without deduction of engine-room, means just the actual tonnage without deduction of engine-room; or in other words, the contrast between a sailing ship in this clause and a steamship is this, that in the case of a sailing ship the registered tonnage is to be taken,—in the case of a steamship it is not to be the registered tonnage, but what is called the gross tonnage without the deduction of engine-room, which, if deducted, would make it the registered tonnage. In short, it is the want of the deduction of engine-room that makes this gross tonnage instead of being registered tonnage. And therefore I am of opinion that the petitioner is right on this point, and that he is entitled to state the tonnage of his vessel at the lower amount which is now proposed, giving effect to the deduction for the berthage of the crew.

The next question regards the interest upon the fund,—whether the petitioner is liable in interest? He maintains that the statute has so limited his liability that he never can under any circumstances be called upon to pay out of his pocket anything more than £8 a ton. But it rather appears to me that although £8 a ton is the limit of his liability, or in other words, as he has estimated it, £3950, 8s., there must be a term at which that is due and payable. Like all other debts it must be due at some particular time; and if it is not paid, it must bear interest like any other debt. I do not think the statute has provided him with any protection against that. Accordingly, I think the fund which is made for interest on this fund is well founded, and that interest must run from the time when the liability attached. That is to say, the time when the collision took place and the damage was done. No doubt under ordinary circumstances damage does not bear interest, but then the reason of that is that interest is just one of the items of damage to be taken into account by a jury in an ordinary case of assessing damages. The jury take into consideration everything that affects the position of the pursuer when he comes before them, and estimate to the best of their ability how much he has lost by reason of the fault of the defender down to the time at which they are estimating his damages, and it seems quite reasonable that there should be no interest upon that because the jury have already taken into account what he has lost in the way of interest as well as in any other way. But in the present case the sum is fixed by Act of Parliament. We are not assessing damages at all. We are distributing a limited fund, and if the statute had said that this fund should not

No. 29.

Burrell v.
Simpson & Co.

interest I could have understood the reason of that enactment; but without the statute saying so, I cannot imagine that that which by the operation of the statute has become a debt, or rather a sort of composition upon a debt, should bear interest from the time that it was actually due and payable; and upon that point therefore my opinion is adverse to the petitioner. And for a similar reason I am against him also upon the question of costs. I do not know any reason why a party who is liable in damages and who finds it necessary—absolutely indispensable—to come into Court for the purpose of having the damages assessed against himself in terms of an Act of Parliament, should not be liable for the expenses of the necessary proceedings to accomplish that object. And therefore, unless it can be shewn that there was some misconduct of the petitioner under this petition on the part of the claimants, I think the petitioner is fairly liable to pay the expenses of these proceedings. To be sure, if it can be shewn that there has been any discussion between the claimants themselves for which the petitioner is not answerable, he could not justly be saddled with that expense. But I am not aware that anything of that kind has occurred here.

There still remains for consideration, however, the question regarding the costs in an English suit which was instituted by one of the claimants here,—Simpson and Company,—the owners of the cargo. All we can do in point of law as regards that is to allow the parties who are in the position of pursuers of the action in England to go on with it for the purpose of having their costs ascertained and taxed.

LORD DEAR.—This case has been repeatedly and carefully considered at consultations upon more than one occasion, and I do not think it necessary to say anything more than that I am of the same opinion with your Lordship upon all the points.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship both as to the principles on which these matters are regulated, and particularly I concur in the observations which your Lordship has made with reference to the opinion of Chief-Justice Cockburn in the case of the North of England Insurance Company v. Armstrong. I feel it unnecessary to add anything to what has been said from your Lordship. It was conceded in the argument that if the delinquent vessel had belonged to a different owner the underwriters' claims were good, and that being the case I cannot see how in the case where the statutory sum of £8 per ton stands for distribution between the parties any different rule should be applied from the rule applicable where the owner of the delinquent vessel is the owner also of the sunk vessel.

Campbell, for the petitioner, claimed to be allowed the amount of freight which he had lost on cargo in the "Dunluce Castle;" and second, certain expenses for the crew.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are in the case which is No. 4 under the 54th section of the Act 1862—"Where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, on board any other ship or boat." Now, in that case the provision is that the owner of the offending ship shall not be liable for more than £8 a ton upon the tonnage of his ship in respect of loss

No. 29. or damage to ship, goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, on board of any other ship or boat. The claim for Mr Burrell that we are now considering is a claim in the first place, for loss of freight. Now, he never can bring that claim within the operation of this clause of the statute except as loss or damage occasioned to the ship. There is nothing about freight. There is no claim against this limited fund except for losses within the meaning of that section which I have read. And, therefore, if there is to be a claim for freight, it must be a claim for freight as an incident or part of the ship. Well, but the ship with all its incidents has passed to the underwriters of the ship, and there cannot be the smallest doubt after the decision in the case of the Greenock Marine Insurance Company that if there had been freight earned notwithstanding of the total loss that freight would have belonged to the underwriters on the ship, and it is a very strange thing that another person should be entitled to come forward and say—I claim damages in respect of its not having been earned, when it would not have belonged to me if it had been earned. That seems to me to be a sufficient answer to the claim in respect of the freight. Then, with regard to the amount which Mr Burrell has expended in maintaining the crew of the “Dunluce Castle” on shore after the occurrence of the shipwreck, there can be no doubt in the words that he was bound to do that. He was bound to do that in two capacities properly—first of all as owner of the “Dunluce Castle;” but if he had made that expenditure as owner of the “Dunluce Castle” he would have had a very good claim against the offending ship for repayment; but he was also clearly bound to do so as the owner of the offending ship, because these people had been wrecked and thrown upon the world through his fault. But there is no room for saying that that is a claim which the crew of the “Dunluce Castle” could have made under the 54th section of the statute. Their board on shore, their loss of employment, is not a thing that was on board of the sunk ship; and unless it be something that was on board of the sunk ship it cannot form the subject of a claim here.

LORD DEAS.—I think this matter might have been clearer on the face of the statute, but I do not differ.

LORD MURE.—I have arrived at the same result as your Lordship. The words of Lord Moncreiff in the case of the Greenock Marine Insurance Company seem to settle the question,—“I am of opinion that the vessel stands transferred to the underwriters, with all her advantages, as at the moment when the last occurrence took place before she came from the voyage into the dock at Liverpool and therefore that the freight, however it might in fact be received by the owner, belongs of right to the underwriters.”

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—“Find that the petitioner is liable, in respect of the collision mentioned in the petition, for the sum of £3590, 8s. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of four per cent per annum from the 4th February 1876 till the date of consignment, and limit the liability of the petitioner as owner of the steamship ‘Fitzmaurice’ in respect of said collision accordingly: Repel the claim made by the petitioner, and rank and prefer the whole other claimants pari passu on said fund, and appoint a state or scheme of division of said fund to be lodged by the petitioner shewing the amount due to each claimant in respect of the above findings: Recall the restraint imposed by interlocutor of 1876.

June 1876 upon the claimants, Simpson and Company, to the effect of allowing them to proceed in the action mentioned in the petition at their instance against the petitioner: Find the petitioner liable to the claimants in the expenses of this process, except such expenses, if any, as have been solely occasioned by the discussion between the claimants, Thomas Thomson and others, and Simpson and Company and others; and with regard to said last mentioned expenses, find the said Simpson and Company, &c., all claimants, jointly and severally, liable to the said Thomas Thomson and others: Appoint accounts," &c.

Revenue—Excise—Permit—Spirits removed without permit—Incapacity of Seller to sue for price—2 Will. IV. c. 16, sec 12, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 114, sec. 187.—Robert Morrison, judicial factor on the trust-estate of the deceased Alexander Conacher, distiller, Pitlochry, having charged Greig and Company upon a bill for the price of spirits, the buyers suspended on the ground that the spirits had been delivered without a permit, and that therefore the seller was rendered incapable of recovering the price, in terms of section 187 of 23 and 24 Vict. c. 114, which enacts,—“If a true and lawful permit or certificate shall not be sent with any spirits to the buyer thereof, such spirits shall, if the same be not seized in the transit for want of such permit or certificate, be forfeited to the buyer thereof, and the seller shall be rendered incapable of recovering the same, or the value or price thereof, in any Court of law or equity; and the seller in such case shall over and besides the loss of the said spirits forfeit double the value of or price agreed to be paid for the same, including the duty thereon.” The charger (besides stating that the spirits had been transmitted without permit by his manager without his knowledge, in pursuance of a general system of fraud upon himself and upon the Revenue, and had been received without permit by the suspenders without objection or notice of any kind to him), pleaded that the clause of the Act barring the seller from recovering the price only applied in cases where the spirits had been confiscated, and that here the spirits had not been confiscated. Plea repelled, and charge suspended.

Observed (per Lord President) that the provision in section 12 of the general Act regulating the removal of exciseable articles under permit (2 Will IV. c. 16) was not superseded in reference to spirits by the provision in section 187 of the special Act (23 and 24 Vict. c. 114) regulating the removal of spirits under permit.

MACKENZIE AND BELL, of Howard Street, Glasgow, raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire an action against Ernest Samuel, jeweller, Glasgow, under the Debts Recovery Act, and obtained decree in absence for £14 16s. 4d. on 17th January 1876.* In virtue of this decree they arrested funds of Samuel in the Commercial Bank on 30th May. On 11th July Samuel was served with a charge for payment of the sum contained in the decree, and on 14th July he was served with an action of furthcoming, which was directed against him and the Commercial Bank.

Samuel brought the present suspension of the decree, and all that had followed.

He stated that he had, on 30th December 1875, presented a petition for sequestration in the London Bankruptcy Court, and had offered a composition of 4s. in the pound to his creditors, that a resolution of his creditors was passed accepting this composition on 21st January 1876. On 2d February another meeting of his creditors was held, at which it was resolved to accept the composition offered at the first meeting.

The complainer maintained that the respondents were bound by the resolution of the complainer's creditors to accept the composition of 4s. in the pound, and that therefore it was incompetent to charge on the debts recovery decree.

The respondents pleaded that under the Debts Recovery Act, section 17,* the suspension was incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuses the note as incompetent; recalls the sist and interim interdict already granted, and decerns: Finds the complainer liable in expenses to the respondents; appoints an account," &c. †

* "No interlocutor, judgment, order, or decree pronounced under the authority of this Act shall be subject to reduction, advocacy, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of diligence, except as herein provided, on any ground whatever."

† "NOTE.—In this application, suspension is sought of a charge given to the complainer upon a decree given by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, dated 17th January 1876, pronounced in an action, at the instance of the respondents, raised under the 'Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867.' The charge was given on 11th July 1876, and it has been followed by arrestment and by an action of furthcoming against further proceedings, in which interdict is also sought.

"The ground of suspension is, that in certain proceedings under the English Bankruptcy Act, which were commenced in December 1875, an offer of composition was accepted by the creditors of the complainer at meetings held on 21st January and 2d February 1876; that the respondents were bound thereby; and that the charge now sought to be suspended is incompetent. But no objection appears to be stated to the decree itself, upon which that charge proceeds, and which, although pronounced in absence of the complainer, might have been resisted by him had he chosen to appear and defend the action. Without expressing any opinion as to the effect, if any, which these English bankruptcy proceedings may have had upon the right of the respondents to sue the complainer in the Courts of Scotland, I am of opinion that the remedy of suspension which the complainer now seeks is excluded by the Debts Recovery Act, which enacts (sec. 17) that 'no interlocutor, judgment, order, or decree pronounced under the authority of this Act shall be subject to reduction, advocacy, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of diligence, except as herein provided, on any ground whatever.' The statute refers to and incorporates in

The complainer reclaimed, and argued ;—The suspension was not excluded by the 17th section of the Debts Recovery Act. The complainer could not have opposed the decree at the time, but he was entitled to object to the charge which was given after he got his composition contract carried through.

The respondents argued ;—The suspension was incompetent. If the complainer had a remedy, it was under the English Bankruptcy Act. The only remedy he could have under the Debts Recovery Act was to apply for a rehearing.

Samuel v.
Mackenzie

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary proceeds on a misunderstanding of the nature and effect of the section of the "Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act," 1867, on which the respondents rely. I am sure one of your Lordships desire to refuse the fullest effect to this provision of the statute. It is a most salutary one, and the Court will never review any judgment of an inferior Court which is fenced by such a clause. But that is not the nature of this case, and the suspender here does not bring a suspension of the decree of the Sheriff.

It is necessary to attend to the state of the facts. Judgment was pronounced in absence of the complainer upon 17th January 1876. The reason why he was absent was that he had no defence, as the debt was due, and he had nothing to say against it. He therefore abstained from appearing. It is suggested that a way to get the better of this decree is to apply for a rehearing before the Sheriff under another section of the statute. But that would be of no use, because there could be no better defence then than before the decree ; and the purpose for which a rehearing is allowed is to enable a party against whom a decree in absence has been pronounced to be heard upon the merits. The charge was not given till the 11th July, six months after the decree, and in the meantime certain proceedings had taken place in the Bankruptcy Court in England, which are the foundation of the present suspension. It is needless to go through the details of these proceedings. The 21st January and the 2d February 1876 are important dates, for it was upon these days the arrangements for a composition were carried through. It is manifest that if they were regularly conducted the effect was to discharge the complainer of all debts due by him on payment of the stipulated composition.

On the record stands, the proceedings are quite regular, except in so far as it is admitted by the respondents that they received notices of the resolutions to the creditors to accept the composition. But it is now conceded by the respondents that they are now prepared to admit that the notices were given and received. The proceedings were carried on in the Bankruptcy

Whether, and to what extent, a remedy may be now open to the complainer is a matter on which I express no opinion. But it appears to me to be not doubtful that the remedy which he seeks is excluded by the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, and that the note of suspension and interdict must therefore be refused, with expenses."

Nov. 29, 1876.

Samuel v.

The charge here under suspension is a charge upon a decree for payment of the whole debt, and the ground of suspension is that the debt is not due, although at the date of the decree of the Sheriff it was due. But the debt which is contained in the decree may have been extinguished on payment of part of it, and if a charge is given for the whole debt under the decree it surely would not be incompetent to suspend the charge. The composition arrangement is only another mode of discharging the debt upon payment of a restricted amount. Further diligence upon the decree is thereby suspended.

It cannot be too distinctly stated that this is not a review of the interlocutor granting decree. The decree is here assumed to be valid and final. We are now affirming that under the circumstances in which the respondents are placed they are not entitled to enforce their decree in the face of the composition contract which has been carried through.

On these grounds I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled and the case must be remitted to the Lord Ordinary to pass the note.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber to pass the note, and grant interim interdict as craved."

Sale—Rescission of Contract—Reparation—Damages.—When a buyer of goods refuses to take delivery, or otherwise intimates repudiation of the contract, the measure of the sellers' damages for breach of contract is limited to the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date of repudiation.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

ON 17th September 1874 Warin and Craven, sugar merchants, London, sold, through a broker, James Dunn, 2000 bags of sugar to David Forrester of Glasgow. The sale-note set forth the sale of 2000 bags of beet root sugar "at 24s. 6d. per cwt. . . . free on board at Dunkirk. Antwerp . . . to be delivered at the port of shipment in about equal quantities per month during October, November, December 1874, and January 1875. The sellers will use every endeavour to engage freight room and expedite shipments, but are not liable for delay caused by war of tonnage."

The quantities to be delivered in October and November were ready at the port of shipment in these months, but the sellers were unable to get a vessel to carry them to this country until 21st November, when the "Bertha" and the "Yarrow" both sailed from Dunkirk with 500 bags of sugar on board each. These vessels arrived at Greenock about 20th November.

On 16th November Mr Forrester wrote to James Dunn, the broker the following letter:—"Please note that as you have failed to implement the contract between us, dated 17th September last, for 2000 bags sugar."

account of Messrs Warin and Craven, I now consider the said contract null and void, and shall refuse to receive any sugar under same, holding you or your principals liable for all loss and prejudice of whatever nature arising from the non-fulfilment of the terms of said contract, which please intimate to the parties interested, and oblige.”

Warin and Craven v.
Forrester.

Mr Dunn forwarded a copy of this letter to the pursuers, and on 17th November he wrote :—“ I regret exceedingly that, in consequence of the delay in shipping Mr Forrester's beetroot sugar that gentleman now considers himself altogether free from the contract, and supplements his yesterday's letter giving notice to that effect by the original of the enclosed copy letter received to-day.

“ Please instruct me in this unfortunate affair, and, in the meantime, if the sugars are not yet shipped to Greenock I would advise you to divert them to another market, ours being exceedingly dull. Perhaps you will kindly telegraph me early to-morrow if I am to resell the sugars if shipped.”

The 1000 bags which were intended for the October and November deliveries were sold at Glasgow on the employment of the pursuers for 22s. 8d. per cwt. on 20th January 1875. The 1000 bags which were intended for the December and January deliveries were sold by the pursuers at Dunkirk for 22s. 6d. on 20th December. The difference between the contract price of the whole 2000 bags, viz. 24s. 6d. per cwt., and the prices realised by these sales, viz. 22s. 8d. and 22s. 6d. per cwt., was £436, 7s. 4d.

Warin and Craven raised an action of damages for breach of contract against Forrester.

The defence was that the pursuers had failed to implement their part of the contract, 1st, by not having the sugar for the October delivery at the port of shipment in time, and 2d, by not securing tonnage in vessels trading to this country during the month of October.

The parties lodged a minute, by which they admitted “ that, for the purpose of assessing the damages (if any) to be found due by the defender, but for that purpose only, the fair average prices for sugars of the quality in question was 23s. 6d. per cwt. in November 1874, and 22s. 6d. per cwt. in December 1874 and January 1875.”

After a proof the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor containing, inter alia, the following findings :—“ In the second place, finds as matter of law (1) that, according to the sound construction of the said contract between the pursuers and defender, No. 6 of process, the pursuers were not bound to ship, but were only bound to deliver at the port of shipment within the month of October 1874 the 500 bags of sugar intended for the October delivery, and consequently that the failure to ship the said quantity in October was not a breach of said contract ; (2) that the agent or representative of the pursuers at Dunkirk having, immediately on the arrival of the said 500 bags at that port, applied for and been promised freight-room for that quantity on the first steamer that could take them, and the sugars having in implement of this engagement been taken by the s.s. ‘ Yarrow,’ which left Dunkirk on the 21st November, there was on the part of the pursuers no breach of their undertaking to use every endeavour to engage freight-room and expedite shipments ; and (3) that, in the circumstances above set forth, the defender is liable to the pursuers in the consequences of his repudiation of the said contract with the pursuers : therefore repels the defences, and decerns the defender to pay to the pursuers the said sum of £436, 7s. 4d., with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from 26th February 1875, the date of the summons in the present action, until payment, in terms of the conclusions

No. 32. of the summons: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses of process: allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits," &c.*

Nov. 30, 1876.

Warin and Craven v.
Forrester.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had not used sufficient diligence in getting a ship in October as they were bound to do. The defender was entitled to rescind the whole contract if the first delivery was not made in October.¹

The pursuers argued;—The contract was separable into its parts, and the defender was not entitled to rescind the whole contract even if it were held that the pursuers had failed to deliver the first 500 bags in time.¹

The contract bound the pursuers only to deliver at the port of shipment. The shipping was a different matter, and, as far as it was concerned, the pursuers were acting merely as agents for the defender, and they had taken all reasonable means to obtain ship-room. There was no obligation to warrant shipment.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages for breach of a contract contained in a sale-note between the parties, dated 17th September 1874. The subject is "about 2000 bags French or Belgian beetroot sugar free on board at Dunkirk or Antwerp." There is a provision that the sugar is "to be delivered at the port of shipment," according as it was French or Belgian, "in about equal quantities per month, during October, November, December 1874, and January 1875." As regards this clause I do not think its meaning very doubtful. The obligation of the sellers was to have goods at the port of delivery at the time mentioned; that is, to have 500 bags at one of the ports of delivery in each of the four months. It has been contended on the part of the defender that this imported an obligation to have the sugars on board a vessel within the month. I do not so read the contract, and to read it so, it seems to me, would be unreasonable. If the sellers had undertaken to provide vessels for the carriage of the sugar to a port in the United Kingdom there might have been an obligation to have the cargo on board in each of the months. That would have

* "NOTE.— The damages, for which decree has been pronounced are brought out as follows:—

"Contract price at 24s. 6d. per cwt., Nos. 112 and 113 of process, £2413 3

"These, when sold by Fraser and Company, at 22s. 8d. per cwt., realised, after deduction of charges, only 2171 4

"Loss, £240 19

"Second 1000 bags.

"Contract at 24s. 6d. per cwt., £2444 18 7

"Resale price at 22s. 6d. per cwt., 2249 10 5

"Loss, 195 8

"Total loss, £436 7

"The amount of damages, as the Lord Ordinary understood, was, on the assumption that the defender is not entitled to repudiate the contract, as point upon which there was a controversy between the parties in this litigation.

been a different contract. The delivery would have been at the port of discharge, for the sellers would have undertaken the carriage. If the sellers had the sugars ready to ship at the port within each of the four months in equal quantities, then I think they discharged their obligation.

No. 32.

Warin and Craven v.
Forrester.

There is this further clause in the contract:—"The sellers will use every endeavour to engage freight-room and expedite shipments, but are not liable for delay caused by want of tonnage." I rather agree with the observation made by Mr Darling in opening the case for the pursuers that in endeavouring to engage freight-room the sellers were acting as agents for the buyer. But, at the same time, I am not sure that this has any great bearing on the case. I do not see that a failure in that obligation would not constitute a breach of contract.

The answer made to the action is, that if the defender has broken the contract there was a previous breach on the part of the pursuers, in two respects—(1) that they did not deliver at the port of shipment the requisite quantity of goods in the month of October; and (2) even supposing the goods were there, they failed to discharge the obligation to engage freight-room. The burden of proving a breach by the pursuers lies, in the first instance, on the defender. It lies on him to prove that the goods were not at Dunkirk timeously. It is not an easy thing for the defender to prove that, and therefore he will easily discharge the onus. If he can shew reasonable cause to think they were not there the pursuers will have to shew that they were. In regard to the other matter, the burden is more seriously on the defender.

I think, on the evidence, there can be no doubt the pursuers have proved that the goods were at the port of shipment in October, and I do not think the defender has proved his other point either.

The consequence of the non-arrival of the sugar was that on 16th November 1874 the defender wrote to Mr Dunn, the broker, in terms amounting to a positive repudiation of the contract, and this repudiation of the contract was intimated to the pursuers by Dunn. They were not left in doubt, and got good advice from Dunn, who pointed out their remedy as having suffered a breach of contract. Resale is the only proper remedy for parties in the position of the pursuers to adopt, and there was nothing to prevent the sale of the sugar before arrived in this country. It could have been sold when in transition. But the pursuers did nothing even after the two vessels arrived. Dunn wrote to them again on the 25th that the market was dull. In fact the pursuers were fully certificated, even if they were not themselves bound to know, that the contract having been broken their proper remedy was to resell the goods and claim the difference as damages against the defender. If they had sold immediately the sugars would have brought 23s. 6d. No doubt the market fell in December, and if they had sold then I cannot help thinking they would have had more to say, as the case ultimately turned out. But they did not sell till the 20th January.

A seller's right to charge against a buyer a loss upon a resale of goods cannot properly be exercised by a resale occurring three months after the breach of contract. That would be a very loose and inexpedient proceeding to sanction, and I am not aware that any such privilege of delay has been admitted. A seller is plainly not entitled to speculate either for himself or for any other party. He is not entitled to consider his own interest. He must resell whatever the state of the market, and it is only if he immediately does so that he can charge the difference between the contract and the market price against the buyer. What was done here in January should have been done in November, and I therefore cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary on this point. The true estimate was therefore be the difference between the contract price and what the goods would have brought if sold in November. Whatever loss has arisen by the postponement of the sale till January must be deducted from the sum of damages now due to the pursuers.

LORD DEAS.—The only question about which I have any difficulty in the case is that of the amount of damages. I entirely agree in the law as stated by your Lordship. But my hesitation has arisen from the fact of the very short period to which we are confining the seller in order to effect a resale. That is a very narrow part of the case. But, on the whole, I agree with your Lordship that it is somewhat safer and sounder to be strict than loose upon that point.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the defender, David Forrester, against Lord Craighill's interlocutor, dated 5th June 1876, adhere to the said interlocutor except in so far as it decerns the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £436, 7s. 4d., with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from 26th February 1875, the date of the summons in the present action, and payment, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Recall the decerniture, and in place thereof decern the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £290, 0s. 8d. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the date of citation until payment: Find the pursuers entitled to additional expenses, modified to two-thirds of the taxed amount thereof: Allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit," &c.

THIS was a note of suspension and interdict by Edward A. Lucas and others, trustees of the late Sir George de la Poer Beresford, praying for interdict against the respondent, James Gardner, residing at Laroeh House, Ballachulish, selling or exposing for sale the estate of Ballachulish, which he had intimated his intention to sell. The circumstances were as follows:

No. 33.

Dec. 2, 1876.
Lucas, &c. v.
Gardner.

In 1861 Sir George Beresford purchased the estate of Ballachulish. He never obtained possession of the estate, on account of a dispute with Mr Tennant, who had acted as his agent. He died in 1870. The complainers, his trustees, in 1873 succeeded in obtaining a decree from the Master of the Rolls in England, under which they were entitled to get possession of the estate on payment of £56,000. Mr George Gardner, on of the respondent, acted as agent for the trustees, and he borrowed two sums, one of £40,000 and the other of £8000, on the security of the state, and paid £1500 from funds belonging to the trust-estate. The remaining £6500 was advanced by the respondent, James Gardner, on the trustees granting an absolute disposition of the estate of Ballachulish in his favour. This £6500 was procured by George Gardner from the City of Glasgow Bank upon three bills signed by himself, the complainers, and James Gardner, and taken up afterwards by James Gardner. The disposition was dated 26th May 1873. On 26th May and 4th June 1873 the trustees, as first parties, and the respondent, James Gardner, as second party, executed a minute of agreement, whereby it was, inter alia, declared—First, that the disposition was granted in security and for repayment of the sum of £6500, interest and consequents, and of all other sums for which the second party might become liable on account of or advance to the trustees; and on the same being paid to him, or his being fully relieved thereof, and of all relative expenses, that he should reconvey the lands, quarries, and others to the complainers under burden of the existing securities thereon, viz. £40,000 and £8000. Second, that in the event of the complainers failing to pay and relieve as aforesaid, upon the respondent giving them or George Gardner, writer in Glasgow, their agent, one month's previous notice that he desired payment or relief, he should be entitled to sell the quarries and others by public roup or private bargain, in Glasgow or Edinburgh, under burden of existing securities, and should account for and pay over to the complainers the free residue of the price, after full settlement of his own claims, and the expenses of and incident to the sale. Thirdly, the whole rents, slate quarry lordships, and money produce of the lands, quarries, and others, which the complainers would be entitled to uplift upon a conveyance in their favour being executed by Mr Tennant, should be applied by them or their factors in liquidating the obligation of the respondent for the sum of £6500, and the whole future rents, lordships, and produce should be also applied in the same way, under deduction of the sum required to pay the instalments on the securities and the instalments repayable of the principal sum of £40,000, "but nothing in this article shall in any way interfere with or prejudice the stipulation in article second hereof." Fourthly, it was agreed that the accounts of intromissions of the complainers' factor should be regularly submitted to and audited by Archibald Ferguson, writer in Glasgow, the agent of the second party.

The complainers granted in 1872 a lease of the slate quarries to the respondent, and he continued to work the quarries. Disputes arose between him and the complainers as to the amount he was bound to pay to them. In March 1876 they recalled the appointment of his son George, who had up to that time acted as their agent and factor.

On 10th September 1876 James Gardner, the respondent, gave intimation to the trustees that he desired payment of £9424, 6s. 9d., and intimated that if it was not paid within one month he would proceed to sell the lands in terms of the agreement.

The trustees then presented the present petition for interdict.

The complainers stated that they were not aware of the nature of the documents which they had signed—(Stat. 20) "The complainers had from time to time received returns from the respondent shewing a large output of slates from the quarries, which they believed would result, and which ought to have resulted, in large profits to them; but they had never received any money from the respondent, or any statements of their accounts with him, it having been the duty of his son, George Gardner, their agent, to obtain such money or accounts. The factor appointed by the complainers upon the dismissal of George Gardner then pressed the respondent for such a statement of accounts, and after much difficulty, in the month of August 1876, obtained from the respondent an account bringing out a sum of £9424, 6s. 9d. as due by the complainers to him. The amount consists only to the extent of two sums of £2619, 13s. 3d. and £1112, 9s. 10d. of payments alleged to have been made by the respondent to the City of Glasgow Bank in respect of the said £6500 debt (the remainder of the said debt having been paid by the said George Gardner, the complainers' factor, on their behalf), and the balance of the said £9424, 6s. 9d. consisting of a great variety of miscellaneous charges and alleged payments, many of which ought to have been made, and which the complainers believe were made, by George Gardner, their agent and factor, out of monies belonging to them which came into his hands, and which will form entries to his credit in his accounts with them, but with which the respondent had no concern, unless he may have paid them acting on behalf of his son George as above mentioned, and which do not form proper items of credit in his accounts with the complainers, and were not covered by the foresaid security. . . . The complainers believe and aver that upon a just accounting, if any balance at all is due by them to the respondent, which they do not admit, it will be of very small amount. Further, the complainers are not in a position to adjust accounts with the respondent until they obtain an account of his son George's intromissions, which they have not yet succeeded in doing, and which the said George Gardner is withholding, in collusion with the respondent, for the purpose of enabling the respondent either to convert the complainers into paying sums not truly due to him, or to sell the said estate and then obtain payment of such sums."

The respondent denied the material averments.

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The complainers are entitled to have the proposed sale interdicted, in respect that the sum claimed by the respondent is not truly due, and that they have all along been, and still are, ready and willing to settle accounts with him, and pay any balance which may be found due. (2) The respondent having, in the matter above mentioned, been acting in collusion with the said George Gardner adversely to the complainers' interests, and having by the said acting created, or attempted to create, improper charges against the complainers and deprived them of the means of speedily settling accounts, they are entitled to have suspension and interdict as craved.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The respondent being infest in the land and others described in the note of suspension under an absolute disposition, is entitled to sell and dispose of the same, under burden of the existing securities,—he being always liable to account to the complainers in terms of the minute of agreement, for the residue of the price, after full settlement of his claims against them, and under deduction of the expenses incident to the sale. (2) The complainers, being absolutely divested of the said subjects, have no right or title to interfere with the sale thereof by the respondent, except on condition of making full payment of the whole sums due to him, as set forth in the foregoing statement, and that within one month from the 16th September 1876, in terms of the said minute of agreement.

The Lord Ordinary, on caution, passed the note, and granted interdict. No. 33.
The complainers reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Although this is merely a question whether the note should be passed without or upon caution it involves considerations of delicacy. Where a creditor is armed with a power of sale, the Court will not interfere to prevent it, unless it can be shewn that an occasion for the exercise of it has not arisen. This is a peculiar case. No doubt here, as in every other instance, the power of sale is just a part of the security, and the security of the creditor is not so good without it. And therefore to stop it is to deprive the creditor of a part of the security he holds. On the other hand, the Court are still quite entitled to interfere if they are satisfied that the occasion for exercising the power has not fairly arisen.

The consideration of the present case seems to me to be influenced by the terms of a minute of agreement between the parties, by which the disposition in favour of the respondent was qualified. The sum advanced by the respondent was £6500, and I assume that the complainers were in straits for money, and could not borrow on the usual terms, and that they took this unfavourable form of obtaining an advance because they could not get a more favourable. They granted an absolute disposition, and it was followed by an agreement that it was to operate only as a security, and not only for the sum of £6500 then raised, but also for any other advance that might be made by the respondent to the complainers. It appears to me that the true construction of the second head of the agreement is that the respondent, when he proceeds to exercise the power of sale, shall be in a position to shew that the £6500 has not been repaid, that any other advances have been constituted so as to be immediately liquidated, and that the other sums due are in the same position. If that were the nature of the account before us it seems to me that the sum in respect of the non-payment of which the power of sale would be proposed to be exercised would be a liquid sum, or one quod statim liquidari potest, and that there would be relative vouchers on both sides, without need for further inquiry or accounting. If an account of that nature had been given to the complainers, and due intimation were made of the intended exercise of the power of sale, I should have been very to stop it, even upon caution.

But this case is very different. The balance in respect of the non-payment of which the respondent proposes to put his power of sale in force amounts to £242, 6s. 9d. It is clear that that balance must be brought out on an account of a peculiar kind. It is not alleged that in addition to the £6500 there are definite advances, which, with the interest, make up the debt. That is not the nature of the respondent's statement. His statement is that upon an account, which is produced, the balance I have mentioned arises.

The account begins with a certain portion of the £6500 which appears to be still outstanding, but which, it is admitted, is to a certain extent paid up. But from July 1874 to May 1876 the account proceeds in such a way as to shew that it is not a proper account between debtor and creditor under the security, but that there is something else entering into it, totally alien to such a relation. The respondent, it appears, has entered into the possession and management of the estate in respect of his son being factor, and while he charges all the expenditure made from day to day on the complainers' behalf, he credits on the other side the rents and lordships due to them, and upon the whole account brings out the balance of £9424, 6s. 9d. That is not at all the kind of balance contemplated by the second head of the agreement, and for that reason it is not a balance which we can test in a question of this kind.

It seems to me that under existing circumstances the respondent is not entitled to exercise the power of sale. Upon the question how soon he may be entitled I desire to give no opinion. It is quite possible that even a cursory examination, more searching only than we are able to make in a hasty discussion in the Bill-Chamber, may shew that there is a balance as between debtor and creditor upon the footing of this particular agreement, and when that so appears the respondent will be in a different position from that in which he now is. He may then apply to the Lord Ordinary for recall of this interdict. But upon the nature of this account, as at present presented to us, all that I determine is that in my opinion it is not such an account as should be followed by the exercise of a power of sale, and therefore I think the note should be passed without caution or consignation.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordship, and I think there are some additional grounds for granting this interdict without caution.

Where a heritable creditor is vested with a power of sale, either under a bond and disposition in security or under an absolute disposition and relative back-bond, the Court will not interfere unless it can be shewn that no prejudice is likely to arise to the creditor by delay, and that there may be prejudice to the proprietor by an immediate sale. Here the power of sale is more stringent and less qualified than I can remember ever to have seen before. The sale may be either by public roup or private bargain, and one month's notice only is required to be given. Usually the premonition required is three months, and the power of sale is not allowed to be exercised without certain advertisements. The usual stringency of the provisions against the debtor in the present case is rather a reason for than against judicial interference to prevent probable injustice from being done.

Now, I do not see that any prejudice is likely to arise to the creditor by delaying the proposed sale in the meantime, whereas, if the sale is allowed to proceed, it may bring ruin on the complainers. This is one of a class of high land estates which we know may be thrown away if sold at one time, and may bring a very large price if sold at another. It is matter of notoriety that the present depressed state of trade has greatly diminished (it may be hoped temporarily only) the competition for such properties, where sport and amenity are material inducements in the eyes of a purchaser.

These considerations go to support the view taken by your Lordship, and I am clearly of opinion that we ought to pass the note without caution or consignation.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the account produced is ex facie not an account falling under the terms of the second head of the agreement between the parties. It is a factorial account between the complainers and the son of the respondent. It is distinctly averred by the complainers that the account partly consists of "a great variety of miscellaneous charges and alleged payments, many of which ought to have been made, and which the complainers believe were made, by George Gardner, their agent and factor, out of monies belonging to them." If that is true, the account will be cut down to a very large extent. It will be necessary for the respondent to instruct the Lord Ordinary that the account falls within the second head of the agreement before he can have the interdict recalled.

Lord Advocate v. Earl
of Zetland.

Succession-Duty Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, sec. 2—Entail—Disposition—Devolution of Law.—Under a destination to the heirs-male of A, an entailed estate passed from one of A's heirs-male, who died without issue, to his nephew, the next heir-male, who was a great-great-grandson of the entailor. Held (by seven Judges) that in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act the nephew did not succeed by "disposition" to the entailor as his predecessor, but that his predecessor was his uncle, from whom he took "by devolution of law."

ON the death of Thomas, second Earl of Zetland in 1873, the succession to certain lands opened under the destination of two deeds of entail mentioned to Lawrence, the third Earl. The present question arose as to the succession-duty payable by the Earl.

1ST DIVISION, with four consulted Judges.
Lord Shand.
B.

The Lord Advocate maintained that the property held under the entails were taken by the Earl by devolution from his uncle the last Earl of Zetland, as his predecessor, and that, being a descendant of a brother of the predecessor, he was liable to pay succession-duty at the rate of three per cent.

The Earl of Zetland maintained that the estates were not derived by him from the last Earl as predecessor in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act, but that the predecessors from whom they were derived were the makers of the two entails, both of whom were his lineal ancestors, and that he was consequently liable in succession-duty only at the rate of one per cent.

The first of the two deeds of entail was executed on 25th May 1768 by Lawrence Dundas of Kerse, and contained the following destination,—"To the said Thomas Dundas (afterwards Thomas Lord Dundas), my son, in liferent, for his liferent use only, during all the days of his natural life after my death, and to the heirs-male lawfully procreated or to be procreated of his body, in fee, whom failing," to certain substituted heirs in their order, as specified in the said deed of entail.

Thomas Dundas, who had succeeded to his liferent under the first deed, was empowered by a private Act of Parliament to disentail certain lands upon entailing other lands of a similar value, and he executed in 1813 a second deed of entail which contained a destination to the same effect as the deed of 1768.

Upon the death of Thomas, Lord Dundas, in the year 1820, his eldest son Lawrence Lord Dundas, afterwards first Earl of Zetland, succeeded to the estates as the institute under the destinations to Thomas Lord Dundas, in liferent, and the heirs-male of his body in fee.

Lawrence, first Earl of Zetland, died in the year 1839, and was succeeded in the entailed estates by his eldest son Thomas, second Earl of Zetland, as heir-male of tailzie and provision under the above-mentioned destinations.

Lord Advocate
v. Earl
of Zetland.

Thomas, second Earl of Zetland, died in 1873, without leaving issue. The present, the third Earl of Zetland, was his nephew, being the eldest son of the late Honourable John Charles Dundas, the younger brother of the last Earl, and succeeded to the estates contained in both of the entails.

A special case under 19 and 20 Vict. c. 56, was adjusted between the Lord Advocate and the Earl, in which the following question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"Who is to be regarded, in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act, as the predecessor of the said Lawrence Dundas, the present Earl of Zetland (1) in regard to the lands and estates held under the entails of 1768 and 1813?"

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the deceased Thomas, second Earl of Zetland, the heir of entail last in possession of the estates in question, is to be regarded in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act as the predecessor of Lawrence, third and present Earl of Zetland, in the whole lands and estates which are the subject of the special case, and that the rate of duty to which the said Lawrence Earl of Zetland is liable in respect of his succession to the said lands and estates is three per cent, and decerns: Finds the said Lawrence Earl of Zetland liable in expenses, and remits the account thereof," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . It has been repeatedly said in the cases of this kind that have occurred, that the answer to the question, Who is the predecessor of the person who has succeeded? depends on the answer to be given to the other question, Has the person who has succeeded obtained his right by disposition or by devolution within the meaning of the Succession-Duty Act? If the present Earl has derived his right by disposition, the entailor was his predecessor. If he has derived his right by devolution then his predecessor was his uncle, the last heir in possession.

"I am of opinion, both on principle and on the authorities, that the latter of these views is the sound one. The whole subject has undergone a very full discussion in the cases of Lord Saltoun, 16th December 1858, 21 D. 124, 31 Scot. Jur. 76, and 7th July 1860, House of Lords, 3 Macqueen, 659, 2 Scot. Jur. 641, and Gordon, 19th July 1872, 10 Macph. 1015, 44 Scot. Jur. 571. In the former of these cases it was expressly decided that an heir under a deed of entail, called by name, and taking up the estate as a new stirpe, or the first of a new series of heirs after the exhaustion of a previous branch or branches of the destination, takes the estate—laying out of view the particular mode of making up his title in accordance with Scotch law—by disposition or conveyance directly to himself, and not by devolution, and that consequently the entailor is to be regarded as his predecessor. The opinion of the minority of the Judges in this Court, which ultimately received effect, as well as those of the learned Judges in the Court of appeal, in almost every instance contain expressions shewing that, while the head of a new branch of the destination called nominatim takes from the entailor as his predecessor, his heirs, taking as such under that description, ought severally to be regarded as taking by devolution, not by disposition—the result being that the last heir in possession, by whose death the estate devolves, and not the entailor, is in the case the predecessor. In the succeeding case of Gordon that view was adopted. The case is a direct decision to that effect. The result is, that in the great majority of instances in the case of entailed estates the predecessor of the succeeding heir in the sense of the Act is the immediately preceding possessor to whom the succeeding heir stands in relationship by blood, more or less near, and the succeeding heir has thus the advantage of this relation in fixing the rate of succession-duty.

"The counsel for Lord Zetland did not dispute that the case of Gordon was decisive of the present question, but stated that it was intended to submit the point for reconsideration. Of course this can only be done before the Court in review. I can only give effect, as I have done, to the rule already laid down. But I may at the same time say, that even if the question were open, I should

The Earl of Zetland having reclaimed, the Court ordered the case to be argued before the Judges of the First Division, with the assistance of four Judges of the Second Division.

The Earl of Zetland then argued;—The Judges in the case of Lord ascertain no difficulty in deciding this case in accordance with the view given effect to in the case of Gordon.

"If it be suggested that the distinction drawn in the statute between succession by disposition and by devolution is intended to mark the distinction between intestate succession and succession by deed of any kind, and that consequently every one who takes a beneficial interest by deed throughout any course of succession, however long, takes by disposition from the grantor as his predecessor, the answer is, this view has been practically negatived after full consideration by the Court of last resort in the case of Lord Saltoun; for in that case the ground of decision was, not that Lord Saltoun took the estate as an heir called by a deed, but that there was a direct conveyance to him nominatim as the head of a new branch of the destination. The idea that the line was drawn between intestate succession on the one hand and succession anyhow by virtue of a deed, received no countenance from any of the Judges, and would have been subversive of the rule which has been applied to succession in entailed estates in England, where the donee or remainder-man who takes by purchase is the successor, and the entailor the predecessor; while 'with respect to the heirs of the body the donee in tail is the ancestor, and the heir of the body is the successor'—(per Lord Wensleydale, 3 Macqueen, 685).

"If then a narrower rule is to be adopted, it appears to me that the rule indicated throughout most of the opinions in the case of Lord Saltoun, and which received effect in the case of Gordon, is the only practical one, and is probably the best fitted to do justice in the great majority of cases, leading generally to liability for a smaller succession-duty where the immediately preceding possessor of an estate is an ancestor or near relative, than in the case where he was a stranger to the person next succeeding. It was suggested in the argument that where a son immediately followed his father in the possession of an entailed estate the Court should hold the father to have been the predecessor, but that if the degree of relationship was greater the heirs succeeding should be regarded as taking from the entailor. There appears to be no principle for this view. And even if it received effect, the result would probably be that though it appears that in this case Lord Zetland, as a descendant of the entailor would benefit, in the great majority of cases it would be a misfortune for the heir succeeding that he should be held to take by disposition from the entailor, often a stranger in blood to him, and at least not a lineal ancestor. If it be assumed in the present case that the entailor was a stranger in blood to the persons called under the branch of the destination which still regulates the estate, then, according to the argument submitted for Lord Zetland, each succeeding heir would have to pay ten per cent as succession-duty. The only exception suggested was that of a son following his father in the estates, in which case it was said the rule ought to be different. I am unable to see any principle for the difference, for a person directly succeeding his uncle has in the general case the same reason for claiming that his uncle should be regarded as his predecessor, as to limit the duty to three per cent instead of ten, where the entailor is a stranger to him, as a son succeeding to his father would have in maintaining that his father was his predecessor, so as to limit the duty to one per cent in similar circumstances. It appears to me that the practical and sound rule in the interpretation of the statute is that which has received effect by the judgments of the Court and the practice which has resulted, viz., that in a destination to a person named and his heirs, or in a series of similar substitutions, the head of each separate branch should be held to take by the disposition in his favour from the grantor of the deed as his predecessor, while the others take by devolution, and have thus the benefit, in a question as to the succession-duty, of the relationship which subsists between the person named and those called as his heirs."

Lord Advocate
v. Earl
of Zetland.

Saltoun had made a distinction between persons named as substitutes and those unnamed; but, although this might be a good distinction in an English deed of entail it was not so in a Scotch deed, because all substitutes in a Scotch deed were in the same position, whether named or not. The case of Gordon (supra cit.) was wrongly decided, because the Judges founded their judgment on mere obiter dicta in the case of Saltoun, and disregarded the difference between the heir of the body in an English deed and in a Scotch deed. As long as the descent was within the issue of the entail, the heirs took by devolution of law. When a new stirps came in under the entail then the heir took by disposition.¹

The Lord Advocate argued;—The cases of Saltoun and Gordon were well decided, and ruled the present question.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, when this reclaiming note came before us in the First Division on the 4th of November last the counsel for the Earl of Zetland admitted that the judgment in the Second Division in the case of Gordon was directly adverse to the pleas he was about to maintain. But he intimated at the same time that the special case had been adjusted between Lord Zetland and the Lord Advocate for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of the Court of last resort on the question raised and decided in the case of Gordon and that he was prepared to contend that the question had been determined by the Second Division on principles inconsistent with those adopted by the House of Lords in Lord Saltoun's case. In these circumstances, the Judges of the First Division thought it desirable, and consistent with practice in the like cases, to appoint a hearing before the Judges of both Divisions, with a view to a deliberate reconsideration of the question before pronouncing the judgment to be carried to appeal. We have now heard a full and able argument on the question in all its bearings.

The facts of the case may be very shortly stated. In 1768 Sir Lawrence Dundas made an entail of certain lands in favour of "Thomas Dundas, my son, in liferent for his liferent use only during all the days of his natural life and to the heirs-male procreated or to be procreated of his body in fee," whom failing, to certain other substituted heirs. The entailor died in 1774, and his son Thomas, who was created Lord Dundas, succeeded to the liferent of the estate. He was empowered by a private Act of Parliament to disentail a portion of the entailed lands upon condition of entailing other lands of equivalent value. This power he exercised, and the lands substituted for the disentailed lands were settled by him by deed of entail in 1813, which destined the land in conformity with the previous entail, "to myself in liferent for my liferent use only during all the days of my natural life, and to the heirs-male lawfully procreated or to be procreated of my body," whom failing, to the other heirs substitute called in the previous entail. On the death of Thomas Lord Dundas in 1820, his son Lawrence, the first Earl of Zetland, entered into possession of the estate as full fiar under both the deeds of entail. The first Earl of Zetland dying in 1839, was succeeded by his son Thomas, the second Earl, who died without issue in 1873. The present Earl, being the eldest son of the immediate younger brother of the second Earl, was thus the nearest existing heir-male of the body of Thomas Lord Dundas, the entailor's son, and as such was duly erved and returned as nearest heir-male of tailzie and provision to his uncle, his immediate predecessor in the estate. No. 34.

The question for decision is, whether, under the operation of the statute 16 Dec. 5, 1876. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Zetland. and 17 Vict. c. 51, the present Earl's succession is to be taxed on the footing of his being the successor of the last Earl, his uncle, or of his being the successor of the entail. If I were called upon to decide the question before us on scientific legal principles I should adopt without qualification the opinion of my brother Lord Deas in Lord Saltoun's case. According to legal principle every substitute of tailzie takes the entailed estate as the heir of the immediately preceding substitute—no doubt as heir of provision, but not the less on that account as his heir in the proper legal acceptance of the term.

But scientific principles are in the present question displaced, to some extent at least, by statutory rule, and the statute which introduces the disturbing rule is intended to apply equally to the two different and somewhat inconsistent systems of succession to heritable property which prevail in England and Scotland respectively. Therefore, as Lord Chancellor Campbell says, the technicalities of both systems must be disregarded, and the language of the Legislature must be taken in its popular sense.

What, then, according to this canon of construction, does the Legislature mean when it distinguishes between a disposition of property by reason of which a person becomes beneficially entitled thereto on the death of another, and a devolution by law of such beneficial interest to one person on the death of another? In both cases there is a succession in the statutory sense; in the former case the predecessor is the settler or disponer; in the latter the predecessor is the ancestor of the person taking the succession.

The inquiry is, who is the predecessor of the present Earl of Zetland? But the answer depends on the solution of another question—does the present Earl take the estate by disposition or by devolution of law? If he takes it by force of the disposition of the entail, contained in the deed of entail, then the entailor is his predecessor. If he takes it by devolution of law from the heir last entailed and seized as of fee in the entailed lands, then his uncle, the last proprietor, is his predecessor. It appears to me that the judgment in the House of Lords in Lord Saltoun's case has established, in the construction and application of the statute, a distinction between two classes of heirs of entail—between an heir who succeeds by virtue of his being individually named or circumstantially described in the entail, and who may therefore be fairly said to take per formam doni, and an heir who takes as one of a class of heirs described, exempli gratia, as the heirs of a body of one individually named or circumstantially described. Now, it is quite clear that the present Earl of Zetland does not belong to the former category, and it is equally clear, I think, that he does belong to the latter. But it is contended that a further distinction may be introduced consistently with the judgment and with the rule of the statute among heirs who take, not because they are individually named or described, but because they belong to a class of heirs who are appointed to succeed one generation after another until the class is exhausted. The distinction sought to be introduced is between an heir who succeeds by force of the entail, who would not succeed to the last proprietor according to the law of intestate succession, and an heir who, being the heir entitled under the destination, is also the heir aliiquei successurus.

I confess I do not see how this distinction can avail Lord Zetland, for in point of fact he combines the character of heir of tailzie and that of heir of line of his

Lord Advocate
v. Earl

uncle the last Earl. But I think it right to say that I am not prepared to admit the proposed distinction, and I agree in the opinions of the Judges of the Second Division who decided the case of Gordon, in which the party succeeding was a heir-male of the body of a nominatim substitute, but was not the heir of line of the last heir in possession. I think that when upon the death of a nominatim substitute the estates devolve on the heirs-male of his body in their order, the succession is, according to the true construction of the statute, a devolution by law. The entailor has selected the class he wishes to favour—heirs-male of the body—but he has left it to the law to say what shall be the order of succession of the individuals within that class. The law on the death of the eldest son of the nominatim substitute prescribes that the son of that eldest son, and not his immediate younger brother, shall take as the next heir-male of the body of the nominatim substitute. But if the law of succession were altered, and an immediate younger brother were preferred to the eldest son of a deceased proprietor, then a destination to heirs-male of the body would suffer a corresponding change of meaning. In short, the will of the entailor when he calls a class of heirs-male of the body is, that the law shall determine within that class who is the person to take on every occasion on which a death occurs among the class, causing a devolution of the estate; and from this it seems to follow that on every such occasion the transmission of the estate from the dead to the living is a devolution by law. For the same reasons I reject another suggestion made in the course of the argument, that a devolution by law may be held to occur only as the descent of the estate among the heirs-male of the body is direct from father to son, but not when it diverges to collaterals and their descendants, as in the present case of succession by a nephew to an uncle. If the above reasoning be sound, this is a merely fanciful distinction not contemplated by the statute, and plainly not justified by that popular sense of the words used, which it has been settled affords the true rule of construction.

Lastly, it was contended that succession among a class of heirs prescribed by the entailor cannot be devolution by law unless the class of heirs prescribed by the entailor be the same class of heirs to whom the estate would devolve in intestate succession. If this argument is to have any meaning or consistency, it must go the length of maintaining that the order of succession among a class of heirs of entail can never be by devolution of law unless the destination of the tailzie be to the heirs of line, or the heirs at law, or the heirs whatsoever of the entailor, or of some person named or circumstantially described, so that the order of intestate succession may come into operation as soon as the entailor or party first named or described fails. But it is well settled in many cases, and notably in the cases of Leny of Dalswinton, June 28, 1860, 22 D. 1272, 32 Scot. Jur. 587, and of Gordon of Cluny, March 2, 1866, 4 Macph. 501, 38 Scot. Jur. 232, that as soon as the estate, in terms of the destination, devolves on heirs of line or heirs at law, or heirs whatsoever, there is an end of the tailzie, and such heirs are not heirs of entail. The success of this argument, therefore, would lead to the conclusion that there can never be within the meaning of the statute a devolution by law from one heir of entail to another, which I apprehend to be quite inconsistent with the principle of the judgment in Lord Saltoun's case.

After the fullest consideration, therefore, I have found no reason to doubt the soundness of the judgment pronounced in the case of Gordon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question presented in this case is precisely similar that which we had to consider in the case of Gordon in the Second Division ; No. 34. and as in that case I had occasion to express pretty fully the views which I entertain on the subjects that have been discussed before us, I think it quite unnecessary, especially after the very clear and satisfactory opinion that we have listened to, to enter upon the subject at all. The opinion which I had formed at that time, and which I still retain, is that the doctrine of Lord Saltoun's case substantially, if not identically, runs along the same lines as the English doctrine of purchase and descent, and that in construing this statute we shall not go far wrong if in considering the signification of the terms devolution of law and disposition we follow the analogy which I think has been provided for our guidance. The result of that, as I expressed in my opinion in the case of Gordon, is that wherever a party takes under an entail according to the forms of the law of Scotland, either as the institute, or as a nominatim substitute, or as the head of a new or fresh stirps or class of heirs, he is held to take by gift or disposition ; on the other hand, that any one who takes simply as the member of a stirps or class takes by devolution of law.

Dec. 5, 1876.
 Lord Advocate v. Earl
 of Zetland.

In the present case that rule is quite sufficiently applied by coming to the result that your Lordship has expressed, and thus every one within the class, whether the succession go directly in the line of descent among the members of the class or deviate, it may be, to collaterals, or ascend to a former generation, still all these constitute the stirps, and will take by descent, by inheritance, by devolution of law. I do not think it necessary to say more. I had intended to make one remark upon Mr Balfour's most ingenious argument, that this rule is only applicable as long as the line of succession continues in the line of descent, and that even within a stirps where a succession goes to a brother or an uncle it ceases to be inheritance and becomes disposition. But your Lordship has already expressed what I think is a very sufficient answer to that view. On the whole matter I remain of the opinion which I expressed in the case of Gordon.

LORD DEAR.—I am entirely of the opinion which has been expressed by your Lordship in the chair. I am very glad that, adopting the analogy of the law of England which was discussed in the correspondence between Lord Hardwicke and Lord Kames, and by reading the statute exceptionally in a popular sense, the House of Lords found themselves in a position to arrive at the result which they did in the case of Lord Saltoun ; because I think it a much more reasonable and equitable result than that to which, by a majority, we held ourselves compelled to come in this Court, having regard to the principles of feudal law and conveyancing applicable to heritable rights in Scotland.

LORD NEAVE.—I am of the same opinion, upon the grounds stated by your Lordship. This matter was fully considered in the case of Saltoun here and in the House of Lords, as well as in the case of Gordon ; and I think the judgment in Saltoun's case, which ruled the case of Gordon, ought also to rule the present case. A stirps once begun, the party takes by devolution of law from his predecessor. There is a good deal in the remark which has been made that there is a certain equity in the different amount of tax imposed in the one case and the other. A person succeeding to a father or uncle has fair reason to look forward to the estate becoming his ; but the matter is different in the case of a comparative stranger. The question, however, is what is the interpretation of the statute ; and I agree in the view stated by your Lordship on that subject.

Dec. 5, 1876.
Lord Advocate v. Earl
of Zetland.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I pronounced the judgment as Lord Ordinary in the case of Gordon, which was afterwards affirmed by the Second Division of the Court. In the note to my judgment in that case I explained fully the grounds on which I proceeded, and I stated that these were in conformity, as I thought, with the principles given effect to in the case of Saltoun. I have not heard anything of the argument addressed to us here to induce me to think that I went wrong in the case of Gordon, or that the unanimous decision of that case by the Second Division was in any respect ill-founded. And as it was acknowledged that that decision was directly in point, I therefore concur in the result that your Lordships have arrived at.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. The case of Gordon, which is admitted to rule this if rightly decided, proceeded, I think, upon a sound construction of the statute which we are here called on to interpret. I shall simply add this—that after having heard the matter fully argued, and having considered the opinions in the case of Gordon, and those delivered by the House of Lords in the case of Lord Saltoun, I do not very well see how the Second Division of the Court could have come to any other conclusion. But I find that Lord Chancellor Campbell in the case of Lord Saltoun, after stating that he considered the appellant was a party who took directly under the entail, says—“I consider it equally clear that if the appellant were to die leaving a son, the son would take by devolution, the appellant being considered the predecessor, and so it would go on by devolution from generation to generation, till the stirps came in under the entail.” That was the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, as to what the general rule of law was with regard to such questions, and Lord Wensleydale uses very similar expressions. He says—“The donee or remainderman who takes by purchase is the successor to the entailor, the predecessor with respect to the heirs of the body, the donee is the ancestor, and the heirs of the body are the successors.” Now, these are said to be obiter dicta. I do not think that they are. I think they were the distinct expression and explanation of the grounds on which the learned Judges arrived at the conclusion they came to. And applying these observations, and in particular that of Lord Wensleydale, to the pedigree in the present case, I have come to the same conclusion, that which your Lordship has arrived at; for I find that the first stirps was Lawrence, the first Earl of Zetland, and that the party whose case we have now under consideration is an heir of the body of that first stirps.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and I have nothing more to add.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“The Lord Ordinary, having resumed consideration of this cause, with the assistance of the four Judges of the Second Division, and heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the Earl of Zetland against Lord Shand's interlocutor of 17th July 1876, after consultation with the said four Judges, and in conformity with the opinion of all the seven Judges present at the said hearing, recall the said interlocutor: I find that the deceased Thomas, second Earl of Zetland, is, within the meaning of the Succession-Duty Act (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 67), the predecessor of the present Earl of Zetland in the lands contained in the two deeds of entail, dated respectively in 1768 and 1813, and that the rate of duty to which the Earl of Zetland is entitled is one-tenth of the value of the lands so contained.”

THE ABERDEEN HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS, Respondents.

—Lord-Adv. Watson—Kinnear.

No. 35.

Dec. 8, 1876.
West v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.

River—Upper and Lower Heritors—Salmon-Fishing.—Harbour commissioners under Acts of Parliament diverted the channel of a tidal river, having purchased the salmon-fishings at that part of the river. When the diversion was completed there was a steep embankment on one bank of the altered channel, which prevented fishing from that side, and the take of the fishings was reduced to less than half its previous amount. After three years they proceeded to reduce the slope of the embankment by laying stones and gravel at the foot of it, extending into the bed of the river. The effect of these operations was to diminish the depth of water at that part of the channel, and to enable the proprietors of the fishing to catch more fish, but not to obstruct the passage of fish up the river.

An application for interdict, at the instance of the proprietors of the immediately superior fishings, on the ground that the harbour commissioners had no right to use their statutory powers for the benefit of the salmon-fishings, and that, as proprietors of the salmon-fishings, they had no right to execute any operations (except repairs) on the bed of the river, refused.

Is 1868 the Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners obtained an Act of Parliament empowering them to divert the channel of the river Dee for a considerable distance below the Wellington Suspension Bridge. For this purpose the Act gave them power, which they exercised, to acquire the banks of the river immediately below the bridge, the proprietors of which had a salmon-fishing called the Midchingle fishings, the commissioners being taken bound to provide new shots and fishing stations in the altered channel. This condition was never insisted in, but in 1871 the fishings themselves were sold to the commissioners under an agreement confirmed by another Act of Parliament. The Act of 1868 also gave power to the commissioners to make deviations within certain limits from the deposited plans with the sanction of the Board of Trade.

The commissioners completed their works in 1873, and at first made a steep embankment on the north side of the altered channel that it was impossible to fish from it. But in 1876, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, they reduced the slope of the embankment partly by depositing stones and gravel at the bottom of it, so that a gradual slope extended into the bed of the river.

Lieut.-Col. West and others, proprietors of the Pot and Fords fishings, which were immediately above the bridge, and adjoined the Midchingle fishings, presented this note of suspension and interdict, craving interdict against the commissioners depositing sand, mud, and stones, or carrying on any operations or constructions in the alveus of the river, or at least against their doing so, so as materially to obstruct the free passage of salmon, or to enable them to fish where they could not previously fish, more advantageously than before; and also from altering the bed or bank within the lines shewn on the plans deposited with reference to the Act of 1868.

They pleaded;—(3) The respondents are not entitled to use their powers as commissioners except for the statutory purposes connected with the harbour; and, in particular, they are not entitled to use these powers to promote their interests as proprietors of salmon-fishings. The respondents, as salmon-fishing proprietors, are not entitled to execute any operations in the bed and on the banks of the river, except such as are necessary to repair any injuries caused thereto by floods or otherwise, and to restore the said alveus and banks to the condition in which they were at the completion of the diversion on 1st March 1873.

The note was passed and interim interdict granted. A proof being answer was led, from which it appeared, in addition to the foregoing facts, that the Fords, Pot, and Midchingle fishings had been fished under a joint arrangement from 1834 to 1872, when the channel was diverted. For the four years previous to the diversion the share of the catch accounted for to the proprietors of Midchingle was 9700 lbs., whereas the quantity taken by the respondents during the four following years was only 4100 lbs. The river was about 300 feet wide at low water, its least depth being about three feet at the south side and centre, and its greatest present depth at the north bank, where it is about five or six feet deep. The effect of altering the slope of the embankment, and of depositing gravel along the foot of that slope, would be to reduce the depth of the current there, and might tend to divert the fish nearer to the centre of the river or even to the south side altogether; but the gravel bed would still be covered at low water with about three feet of stream, and the operations would not obstruct the passage of salmon, although the respondents might catch more fish than before.

The Lord Ordinary recalled the interim interdict, and refused the suspension.

The complainers reclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—In this case the complainers are proprietors of certain salmon fishings on both banks of the river Dee higher up the river than the suspension bridge mentioned in the proceedings. The respondents, the harbour commissioners, are proprietors of certain fishings on both banks below the bridge, extending to the sea. A portion of these last fishings is what is called the Midchingle fishings, lying immediately below the complainers' fishings. The harbour commissioners have recently been performing certain operations on the north bank of the Midchingle fishings, where they are proprietors of the land as well as of the fishings. The complainers seek to interdict the respondents from proceeding with these operations, which consist mainly of changing the shape of the north bank in a way to which I shall more particularly advert immediately.

The question which arises between the two parties is not what may be called the general question between upper and lower heritors of fishings; it arises in very special circumstances. The commissioners have two characters—commissioners of the harbour, and proprietors of the fishings. It is only in the latter character that they are here. As regulating the navigation they have to deal with the Board of Trade, whose sanction to their operations they have already got. But the fishings stand in a peculiar position. By the Aberdeen Harbour Act of 1868 the commissioners were authorised to divert and thereby shorten the course of the river Dee, and were authorised to purchase land by compulsion for that purpose, on condition of forming new shots or stations for the Midchingle, Raik, and Stell fishings, which did not then belong to the commissioners. But in place of this an agreement was entered into to purchase these fishings at a price to be fixed by arbitration, and an Act was passed in 1871 confirming that agreement. Section 4 of that Act, after setting forth the former Act and the agreement, provides “that the commissioners may hold at enjoy the whole sea and river salmon-fishings mentioned in the said agreement, and exercise all the rights for fishing for salmon belonging thereto, with all the necessary facilities therefor, in like manner and to the same extent as the proprietors thereof could have done before such purchase." Then it goes on to say that the commissioners by the acquisition of these fishings shall "acquire and take, and may hold and enjoy, the right of fishing for salmon within and along the new channel of that part of the river Dee which is by the recited Act authorised to be diverted, with all the necessary facilities therefor, in like manner and to the same extent as the right of fishing for salmon in the present channel between the points of commencement and termination of the diversion as or may be held and enjoyed by the proprietors of salmon-fishing therein." And then, further, it says that the rights of salmon-fishing in the new channel shall "for all purposes of title be held to be the same as such rights of fishing for salmon in the present channel."

No. 35.

Dec. 8, 1876.
West v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners.

These sales were carried out; the price of the fishings was fixed by Mr Leslie, and was paid. Then the diversion was made with the approval of the Board of Trade in 1872 and 1873—one effect of which was to make the channel of the river 200 yards shorter than it had been before. The commissioners in making this diversion found it expedient to build an embankment on the north side of the river, the pitch of the embankment being 1 in 3. The effect of this was found to be to make it impossible to have a shot for fishing on the north side at all, and thereby largely to diminish the produce of the fishings. The operations now in course of execution are intended to reduce the steepness from 1 in 3 to 1 in 7, and thus give an opportunity for having a shot there. With this view the commissioners proceeded to deposit stones and gravel outside the piles to the distance of 48 feet from the bottom of the original slope, making a gradual slope to the centre of the river, and reducing the depth on the north side to about 3 feet at low water. The depth of water in the centre was increased. It was admitted at the bar that there will be at low water a depth of 7 feet in the centre.

It is now necessary, for obvious reasons, to go back to the history of these fishings to ascertain what was their state prior to the execution of any of these operations. Before 1834 there were four shots; in that year an agreement was made between the proprietors of the "Midchingle" fishings and the proprietors of the "Pet" and "Ford" fishings, by which these three fishings were to be worked as one, and a proportion of the fish to be accounted for to the proprietor of the Midchingle fishings. This agreement was acted on till 1872,—that is to say, from 1834 to 1872 these fishings were fished in common, and the produce was divided between the parties according to what was understood to be their share.

Certain states of the produce have been made up, from which it appears, as stated in the Lord Ordinary's note, that for four years preceding the diversion of the channel the quantity of fish accounted for to the proprietors of the Midchingle fishings was more than double the quantity they themselves caught in these fishings during the four years following the diversion.

In these circumstances, the commissioners proceeded to execute the operations now complained of. It is contended on the other side that after having made this embankment they had no right to touch it. It did occur to me that owing to the lapse of time it might have been prudent to have applied to the Lord Ordinary for leave to execute these operations; but that omission cannot

affect the matter of right which it is the avowed object of both parties in this action to have settled.

Now, in the state of matters I have mentioned, I cannot doubt that if the commissioners had made the embankment at first as it has now been made they would have been doing a thing authorised by the Act of Parliament.

As regards the matter of right, it was contended that no lower heritors were entitled to make an alteration in the river, whether it affects the upper heritors or not; but here the commissioners were specially authorised to make the alterations, and therefore the question does not arise whether the proprietors of the lower fishings is entitled at common law to perform such operations. That is not the question here; it is—Were the commissioners doing anything not authorised to be done by them by the Act of Parliament?

At the same time, if we are to compare the results expected to be attained by this additional shot with the state of matters previously it is very difficult to say that there is injury at common law. Since 1834 the fishings have been in commotion. But prior to that date the Midchingle fisheries had four shots, which produced much more than double what these fisheries now produce. It is said fish will be turned back. The only reason given for that suggestion is that fish prefer deep water. It is admitted that fish can come up in three feet of water, the depth of the bank at low water. It is said that they are more easily frightened in shallow water. All the witnesses agree that should this be so the fish will turn into the deeper water. If so, they will find it in the middle of the river. The objection resolves, in short, into no more than this, that the commissioners will get more fish by having a shot on the north side of the river than they would do without that shot.

I am of opinion that the respondents are legally entitled to do what they are doing here.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The peculiarity of this case is that the respondents combine the characters of proprietors of salmon-fishings and harbour commissioners. If this were not so the case would have been even clearer than it is. Prior to 1868 they did not combine these characters, and were laid under an obligation by the Aberdeen Harbour Act of that year to the proprietors of certain salmon fishings in the river Dea. When the river was diverted it was provided by the 82d section that they should “make out and provide on lands belonging to them, or to be acquired by them for the purposes of this Act, such number of new shots or stations for fishings, and in such situations on either side of the new channel of the river, and with such extent of servitude or privileges on the banks thereof, and such access thereto, as shall be requisite for the proper fishings of the river when so diverted.” This was found likely to cause difficulty in reconciling the interests of navigation and salmon-fishing, and therefore the respondents decided to obtain an Act of Parliament confirming an agreement that they had made with the proprietors of these fishings for their purchase.

Now, I cannot doubt that the commissioners, having become proprietors of these fishings, were entitled to have such facilities as they were bound to provide for the former proprietors under the Act of 1868. The question is, whether they have been carrying out their operations as licensed by the statute and the agreement. They are said to have made these fishings more valuable.

not say that they would not be entitled to do so if they did not thereby interfere with the rights of others. The circumstance that in attending to the supreme interest of navigation the commissioners lost sight of the salmon-fishing interests is of no moment. The leading object of the commissioners is to provide for navigation, and that they had to consider first of all; but as proprietors of salmon-fishings they also represented the interests of the public. Their revenues are to be applied to the furtherance of navigation, and the rents of the salmon-fishings are as much public property as the harbour rents.

(After narrating the nature of the operations carried out by the commissioners on the north bank, his Lordship continued)—Now, when they found the bank too steep I cannot doubt that they were entitled to alter it so as to obtain more convenient shots. How they did this is immaterial; the result is that the deepest part of the river is thrown into the centre of the channel instead of being immediately below the north bank. The complainers say that what the respondents have done or are doing injures their upper fishings by obstructing the passage of salmon, and if that statement were well founded they are entitled to what they ask. But what is an obstruction in the legal sense? An improvement in the means of fishing, by which the lower heritor increases the produce of his fishings, is no obstruction, unless there is something illegal or objectionable in the mode by which he effects it. There is in one sense no more fatal obstruction to the passage of a fish than catching it, because it certainly can go no further; but it is no legal obstruction if the lower heritor catches double what he did before, provided there is nothing objectionable in the mode by which he does so. There must be an obstruction that will prevent the passage of the fish that escape the lower heritor. Now, here there is nothing in the nature of a weir or fixed obstruction. The objection is that the depth has been diminished and that fish will be easily frightened. Assuming that to be well proved, which I think it is not, that is quite a visionary grievance. For these reasons I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Repel the reasons of suspension: Recall the interim interdict granted on 21st March 1876: Refuse the interdict, and decern: Find the complainers liable in expenses," &c.

share of such child or children predeceasing should accrue to the survivors equally, with a declaration that the shares were to be strictly alimentary, and not assignable or attachable by creditors. No sale took place until after the children had attained majority. Held (1) that the declaration that the shares should be alimentary only applied to the period before the children attained majority; and that the trustees were then bound to convey to the beneficiaries; (2) that the fact of the residue consisting of heritage which could not be divided corporeally into the requisite number of shares did not render a sale of the heritage necessary, as the division might be made by granting pro indiviso rights or by exercising the power to borrow; and therefore (3) that the right of each beneficiary was heritable, being a jus crediti to heritage.

MRS AGNES BALLANTYNE or MABON died in 1837, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement conveying her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees. The deed conferred on the trustees power "to sell and dispose of the subjects above conveyed as they may think proper, and convert the same into cash, or to borrow money on the security of the said subjects, or to apportion and divide the same among my children afternamed as they may think proper or be advised." The deed provided for the payment of debts and certain legacies and annuities. By the fourth purpose the trustees were directed "to hold the whole residue and remainder of my said whole subjects and estate in trust for my children David Mabon, John Mabon, Thomas Mabon, William Mabon, Agnes Mabon, and Charles Mabon equally, and in case of any of my said children dying before majority or marriage then the share of such child or children predeceasing shall accrue to the survivors equally, share and share alike; declaring always it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said several provisions shall be strictly alimentary, and shall not be assignable or liable to be attached in any way by any of the creditors of my said husband and children respectively."

Mrs Mabon was survived by all her children named in the trust-disposition. Of these, three, Thomas, William, and Charles, were alive at the date of the action aftermentioned. David died about 1856, leaving one daughter, Mrs Gibson. John died about 1858, leaving three children James Mabon, his eldest son, and a daughter, Mrs Agnes Mabon nee Anderson, and another son, William. Agnes Mabon married Alexander Cowie, and died in 1850, leaving five children, of whom David Cowie was the eldest.

The trust-disposition was lost sight of and was not found again till 1871. In 1861 Thomas Neilson was appointed judicial factor on the intestate estate of Mrs Mabon, and on the discovery of the deed in 1871 he was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate, the trustees under the deed having failed to accept, and on Mr Neilson's death in 1871 William Auld was appointed judicial factor.

The estate consisted of house property in Glasgow, and in 1869 part of it was taken from the judicial factor under compulsory powers by the prison board of the northern division of Lanark, under the Prisons (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1869 and the Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act of 1845, and in 1870 the trustees under the Glasgow Improvement Act of 1866 took the remainder of the estate, also under compulsory powers. The amount paid for these subjects was deposited in bank by the judicial factor, and amounted, with interest, to nearly £7000.

The judicial factor brought the present multipiepinding to determine what were the rights of the beneficiaries.

David Mabon's only child, Mrs Gibson, was entitled to one-sixth share of the trust-estate, whether it was heritable or moveable.

There was no question as to the right of Thomas, William, and Charles to their shares, but the judicial factor pleaded ;—On a sound construction of the trust-deed the trustees are required to hold the shares of the said Charles Thomas, and William Mabon in trust for them during their lives, and to pay the annual income arising therefrom to them respectively as an alimentary provision. No. 36.
Dec. 8, 1876.
Auld v.
Anderson, &c.

Among the representatives of John and Agnes, who had died after their shares vested, the question was whether their shares were to be regarded as heritable or moveable succession in their persons.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—" In the first place, and as regards the character of the truster's succession, Finds as matters of fact (1) that the estate left by the truster consisted at her death of sundry houses and plots of ground, partly on the north side and partly on the south side of the Drygate of Glasgow ; (2) that, though by the trust-deed there was conferred on the trustees full power to sell and dispose of the subjects thereby conveyed as the trustees might think proper and convert the same into cash, these were not sold and disposed of and converted into cash by the trustees ; (3) that there was nothing in the trust administration, as provided for by the truster, or in the purposes of the trust, which rendered indispensable the conversion into cash of the heritages composing the trust-estate as left by the truster ; and (4) that these heritages have recently been taken under compulsory powers from the judicial factor, by whom, for want of trustees, necessary trust administration has for years been carried on, partly by the prison board of the northern district of the county of Lanark, and partly by the trustees under 'The Glasgow Improvement Act, 1866,' and the prices received constitute the fund in medio in the present action : Finds as matters of law (1) that the taking by the public bodies above specified was not a sale and disposal of the trust-estate, and conversion of the same into cash in the exercise of the powers conferred upon the trustees, and that the character of the truster's succession, as heritable or moveable, must be determined as it would have been if the trust-estate had still consisted of the heritages left by the truster ; and (2) that the other facts being as above set forth, the trust-estate must be regarded and dealt with as heritable and not as moveable succession : In the second place, and as regards the right of the truster's children, among whom the residue and remainder of the trust-estate was to be apportioned and divided, or for whom it was to be held by the trustees, finds that, according to the sound interpretation of the trust-deed, each of these beneficiaries, on attaining majority, or being married, acquired a vested right in his or her share, and was entitled to delivery thereof, free from any burden or condition by which the free use or disposal of the same would or might be affected, so soon thereafter as, in the circumstances of the trust, this could be conveniently accomplished : In the third place, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be heard as to the application of the foregoing findings to the several claims in the competition, and an interlocutor disposing of these claims accordingly be pronounced, reserving meantime all questions of expenses."

Mrs Agnes Mabon or Anderson and William Mabon, heirs in mobilibus of John, reclaimed, and argued ;—When a sale was necessary to carry out the directions of the testator, and the trustees had a power of sale, the character of the succession was changed from heritable to moveable succession. In judging whether such a sale was necessary the whole terms of the deed required to be examined. No division could have taken place here until there was a sale of the heritage. A sale was therefore neces-

No. 36. sary, and the estate should be divided according to the rules of moveable succession.¹

Dec. 8, 1876.
Auld v.
Anderson, &c.

Argued for Charles Mabon and David Cowie;—The trustees had merely a power of sale, and as this power was not exercised the character of the succession was heritable. The conversion which actually took place was long after the date of vesting, and besides, was under compulsory powers, and therefore could have no effect in altering the nature of the succession.²

The judicial factor argued;—The truster's intention was that the provisions should be alimentary, and he was directed to hold the capital of the trust-estate, and therefore was not entitled to pay it over. All the beneficiaries were entitled to was their shares of the income.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the question is, how is the succession of the estate of David Mabon to be regulated in terms of the trust-disposition? She left her estate to her six children, and directed her trustees to hold “in trust for my children, David Mabon, John Mabon, Thomas Mabon, William Mabon, Agnes Mabon, and Charles Mabon equally; and in case of any of my said children dying before majority or marriage then the share of such child or children predeceased shall accrue to the survivors equally, share and share alike; declaring also as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said several provisions shall be strictly alimentary, and shall not be assignable or liable to be attached in any way by any of the creditors of my said husband and children respectively. This is the operative part of the trust-disposition; it is the only part of it which expresses the will of the testatrix as to the division among her children. There is a clause in a former part of the deed which has been said to do so, but I do not deal with that presently. The estate consisted entirely of heritable property at the date of her death, and, till a recent period, continued in the same form. The conversion of it was made by either of the factors, who could not have done so without obtaining special powers from this Court.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the trust-estate must be regarded as heritable and not as moveable succession, and “that, according to the sound interpretation of the trust-deed, each of these beneficiaries, on attaining majority or being married, acquired a vested right in his or her share, and was entitled to the delivery thereof free from any burden or condition by which the free use or disposal of the same would or might be affected, so soon thereafter as, in the circumstances of the trust, this could be conveniently accomplished.”

Now, upon the matters to which these findings refer three points of difficulty have arisen and have been discussed. First, it has been maintained by so that the provisions of the trust-deed may receive effect; that he must reserve the capital during the lifetime of the children, and pay the annual income to ^{Dec. 8, 1876.} them respectively as an alimentary provision. That, I think, is inadmissible ^{Auld v.} under the trust-deed. I think that the plain meaning of its provision is that ^{Anderson, &c.}

 the trustees, so long as they held the shares, were to consider them as alimentary, but that so soon as they vested in the children they should be entitled to pay over the capital sum to them. In the second place, it cannot, in my opinion, be contended that no share vested till all the children had either attained majority or been married. It is of very little consequence whether that was the meaning or not, for the period at which that happened is long past; but I may say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary on that point too.

Then the only question that really remains is, what was the character of the succession? Now, the interest of the parties in this question is a good deal limited. As regards three of the children they are alive, and are each entitled to one-sixth of the estate, whatever its character may be. Another, again, died in 1856, leaving only one child. That child will take his share whether the estate be heritable or moveable. It is with regard to the families of John, who died in 1858, leaving three children, and of Agnes, who died in 1850, leaving five children, that the question does arise—was this succession heritable or moveable? If it be heritable, one-sixth will fall to the eldest son of John, and one-sixth to the eldest son of Agnes. If it be moveable, each sixth part will be divided among the families of John and Agnes.

Now, the Lord Ordinary, it appears to me, has taken the right view here also.

The clause I read to your Lordships from the deed does not suggest any intention to convert the estate before it is assigned to the children. The only other part of the deed that is said to suggest this is that occurring immediately after the conveyance to the trustees. She conveys to them "as trustees, for the ends, uses, and purposes after-mentioned, all and sundry lands and heritages, of whatever kind or denomination, as also my whole moveable or personal means and estate," "with full power to my said trustees to sell and dispose of the subjects above conveyed as they may think proper, and convert the same into cash, or to borrow money on the security of the said subjects." There is undoubtedly a power of sale conferred on them, and as a concomitant of that power a power of borrowing money on the security of the property. One easily understands why a testator, having nothing but real estate such as this, should give a power of sale and borrowing. It would be very inconvenient in many cases that might arise in the management of the estate if no such provision had been made. For instance, if the testatrix had left debts behind her which must be discharged so as to extricate the trust the subjects would have to be sold in part or money borrowed on their security.

Then the other alternative is put before them. If they do not sell they are to "apportion and divide the same among my children after named as they think proper or be advised." It is quite plain to me what was in the mind of the testatrix here. The heritable property shall be apportioned or divided as the trustees may think proper or be advised. It has been maintained that the only way of dividing it was to find as many subjects, all of equal value, as there are parties, and give one to each party. But that contention is quite a false and Auld v.

mistaken one. If the trustees were to proceed to a division they would find many better ways than that. They might frame a scheme of division, or they might convey the whole estate pro indiviso to the whole parties. But I find words of very great importance in the deed in solving this difficulty. The trustees are to divide the estate "as they may think proper or be advised." That cannot be meant to affect the amount of the share that each child is to receive, for afterwards it is provided that they are to have equal shares. It must therefore mean the manner of division. I think, then, it is left to the trustees to apportion and divide the estate in forma specifica. How this is to be done is left to their discretion.

The question that arises is this, Is it a natural consequence of these provisions that the estate should be converted into money? or is it not rather merely that the trustees shall have power in a case of difficulty occurring in the administration of the estate to sell? It is quite consistent with the authorities that the existence of a power of sale will not affect the nature of the estate if no sale has taken place and the administration has been in conformity with the expressed wish of the testator. I am of opinion, then, that each child acquired as he came of age a jus crediti in a heritable estate. What has actually taken place is that the properties have been acquired under statutory powers by certain public bodies. But as the compulsory powers under which that was done were exercised long subsequent to the date of vesting that fact can have no effect.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. The whole estate consisted of heritable subjects, and the succession must be ruled by the law of heritable property, unless the opposing party can make out one of two things, either that the testator intended the estate to be converted, or that the purposes of the trust are inexecutable unless that be done. Unless it be the power of sale there is no indication of such an intention. There is no direction to sell which would have had the effect of conversion. But a mere power to sell will not convert unless the power be exercised. It is maintained, however, that the purposes of the trust cannot be carried out in any other way. I am not satisfied of that. There might be two other ways open. The provision giving power to borrow is unqualified, and I am disposed to think that the trustees might have borrowed money and used it to equalise the children's shares of the heritable estate, or, if that was not found practicable, they might have conveyed the estate to the children pro indiviso, as your Lordship has suggested. The result of such a conveyance would have been very much the same as if money had been borrowed to equalise the shares, and any one of the pro indiviso proprietors might thereafter have insisted upon the property being divided, or, if that could not be done, upon its being sold and the price divided. I am therefore of opinion, with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, that the succession here is heritable. Your Lordship has already pointed out that this will only make a difference as to two of the shares, those of Agnes and John.

As to the alimentary clause, I agree that it has no effect on the present question. The truster meant that the capital estate, as well as the income, should be alimentary. That might affect the rights of a husband and his creditors, but it did not make the daughter a liferenter.

I agree also in what your Lordship has said in regard to the conversion which has actually taken place. It took place long after the period of vesting of the provisions, and so can have no effect on the present question.

Master and Servant—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, 39 and 40 Vict. c. 70, sec. 6—Meditatione Fugæ Warrant—Process.—Held that a petition presented under sec. 6 of the Sheriff Courts Act for the apprehension of an apprentice in meditatione fugæ, and for his detention till he should find caution de judicio sisti in an action to be brought by his master to have him ordained to return to his service or to pay the penalty of £20 named in the indenture, was competent.

JAMES RAMSAY, smith and cartwright, Glasgow, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow against John M'Dermott, his apprentice. The petition prayed for the apprehension of the apprentice and his detention until he found caution de judicio sisti—in any action at the instance of the petitioner which might be brought against him within six months, to have him ordained to return to and continue in his master's service during the term of his apprenticeship, and to find caution to that effect, or otherwise to pay £20, being the penalty stipulated in the indenture of apprenticeship.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
M.

Ramsay stated in a condescendence annexed to his petition that he believed M'Dermott was in meditatione fugæ, and was about to leave Scotland and proceed to America, and that he (Ramsay) was about to raise an action of the nature above described.

M'Dermott was apprehended on warrant of the Sheriff-substitute Lees. He was afterwards examined, and having admitted that he intended to leave the country the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor finding that he was in meditatione fugæ, and granting warrant for his incarceration till he should find caution.

M'Dermott brought a note of suspension and liberation.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Passes the note, and refuses hoc statu to grant liberation."

M'Dermott reclaimed, and argued;—The master's proper remedy was under "The Employers and Workmen Act, 1875," sec. 6. It was not competent to apprehend on a meditatione fugæ warrant when the action to be raised was not for a sum of money. The petitioner was not entitled to the new form of petition prescribed by the "Sheriff Courts Act, 1876," because an application for a meditatione fugæ warrant was not a civil proceeding in the ordinary Sheriff Court, to which the new form of petition was limited. If caution was wanted the Court might accept the respondent's own bond.¹

Argued for Ramsay;—No doubt proceedings under the Employers and Workmen Act might have been taken against the complainer, but then might have gone off to America. Any one who was under an obligation ad factum præstandum like the apprentice or to pay a sum of money might be arrested on such a warrant as the present.

M'Dermott v.
Ramsay.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a kind of question in which one is extremely anxious to hear everything that can be said in favour of the apprentice, but I am sorry to say I can see no ground whatever for his liberation.

With regard to the objection to the form of proceedings, it is difficult to say on what that is founded. In the Sheriff Courts Act of this year one form is prescribed for the forms ordinarily in use previously, and it is intimated that this is to apply to every case whether it would have originated by summons or petition under the old forms. The 6th section provides "that every action in the ordinary Sheriff Court shall be commenced by a petition." In the interpretation clause the term "action" is defined to include "every civil proceeding competent in the ordinary Sheriff Court." Now, in the former proceedings there were two classes of proceedings, the one beginning with the summons called "actions," the other beginning with a petition, and called "summons proceedings." The term "action" in this statute is made to include every one and therefore this new form is applicable to this case as to every other.

With regard to the nature of the remedy adopted here I see no reason why an application to apprehend a person in meditatione fugæ should be incompetent where the action proposed to be instituted against him is one ad faciendum præstandum. I see no reason, and I know of no authority, for holding that it is incompetent. The action to be brought here is for the fulfilment of the indenture entered into by the complainer. There will also, of course, be a conclusion for a penalty to the amount of the damage suffered by the master, but that does not alter the nature of the case, and therefore I see no reason for doubting that an application to imprison a person in meditatione fugæ to answer in an action of this kind is competent.

But one is unwilling to shut the door against the possibility of an amendment, and after what Mr Alison has told us of the proposals made by the master I venture to suggest to your Lordships that the case should be allowed to stand over for a week.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT, on 16th December 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of no offer of caution de judicio sisti adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note."

ANDREW ROBERTSON, Pursuer.—Nevay—J. A. Reid.
JOHN PLAYER, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Macdonald—Rhind.

Lease.—A sub-lessee of a piece of building ground had the option under his lease of demanding a renewal if the tenant himself obtained a renewal from the landlord. Under a deed of agreement to which the principal tenant was a party, and in which he undertook certain obligations in regard to granting access, the sub-lessee sublet a portion of his holding to a second sub-lessee. The deed contained no assignation of the clause of option. The principal tenant obtained a renewal of his lease from the landlord. In an action against the second sub-lessee by the last sub-lessee, held (diss. Lord Deas) that the pursuer was not entitled to a renewal of his sub-lease.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

THIS was an action by Andrew Robertson, Edinburgh, against John Player, coach-hirer there, for declarator that the defender was bound to grant him a renewal of his sub-lease.

ant the pursuer a lease for twelve years from Whitsunday 1876 of a No. 38.
 ece of ground in Pitt Street at £2, 5s. per annum.

The pursuer averred as follows:—In 1862 Mr Little Gilmour of Dec. 12, 1876.
 erton let two stances of building ground to John Player for fifteen Robertson v.
 ars. On 14th March 1862 Player sub-let a portion of the ground, Player.
 easuring forty-five feet of frontage, to John Dunn, for fourteen and alf years from Martinmas 1861. The sub-lease contained a declaration at in the event of Player obtaining a renewal of his lease he should, in e option of Dunn, grant him a renewal of the sub-lease. By a second b-lease of the same date, "to which Player was a party," Dunn let to ndrew Robertson a piece of the ground, measuring twenty feet of front-ge, for fourteen years and two months from 8th March 1862.

The terms of this deed, so far as material, were as follows:—"It is ontracted, agreed, and ended between the parties following—John Dunn,
 . . . and John Player, . . . on the one part, and Andrew Robertson, . . . in manner following, that is to say, the said John Dunn, in consideration, &c., lets to the said Andrew Robertson, his heirs, ssignees, and sub-tenants, all and whole that piece of ground, measuring twenty feet or thereby, . . . the said piece of ground being part and portion of that piece of ground at Pitt Street aforesaid set and in act and assedation let by Robert Pringle, W.S., as factor for W. J. ittle Gilmour, . . . to and in favour of the said John layer, conform to tack entered into between them, dated the 9th and th days of January 1862, to which lease reference is hereby exemely made, and the conditions and stipulations therein, in so far as applicable to this sub-tack, are hereby specially referred to and held as epeated brevitatis causa,—in the peaceable possession of which piece of round and subjects hereby sub-set the said John Dunn binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, to maintain and defend the said Andrew Robertson and his foresaids at all hands, and against all deadly as law ill,—for which causes and on the other part the said Andrew Robertson inds and obliges himself, his heirs and executors, to pay to the said John Dunn, his heirs or assignees, or to the said John Player, the sum of £2, sterling, being the one-half of the rent payable by him to the said John ayer by the sub-lease entered into between them, dated the 14th day of arch current, for the whole of the ground thereby made over: . . .
 urther, the said Andrew Robertson shall have the exclusive right of property in the ground behind the said building now erecting by me, the id John Dunn, and reaching to John Player's stables: And I, the said Player, hereby give the said Andrew Robertson, and his foresaids tenants, full right of the use of the stair leading from the pavement to the ground part of the building, on their paying a proportion of e expense of upholding the same, along with himself and any parties o may build on the stance belonging to him on the north of said stair, ould they require to use the same, the expense of repair being to be ided rateably according to the rental of the several properties using same by themselves or tenants, it being understood that Mr Player ll not give authority for the stair being used for any other purpose an for foot passengers only."

The deed was signed by Dunn, Robertson, and Player.

Player had obtained a renewal of his lease, but declined to grant a re-wal of the second sub-lease to Robertson.

It was not alleged that Dunn had obtained or been called on by the rsuer to demand a renewal of his sub-lease from Player.

The defender pleaded (1) that the averments were not relevant.

No. 38.

Dec. 12, 1876.
Robertson v.
Player.

The Lord Ordinary sustained this plea, and dismissed the action.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

The case was heard before the Lord Probationer (Adam), who was of opinion that the interlocutor should be adhered to.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Under Player's sub-lease to Dunn, in the event of Player obtaining a renewal of his lease, Dunn was entitled to demand a renewal of sub-lease, but not of anything but that sub-lease of the same subject, and at the same rent, unless there was a change in the rent which Player himself had to pay; and further, nobody but Dunn had any right to exercise the option.

Then Dunn proceeded to grant a sub-lease of a portion of the subject to Robertson. It is Dunn who sub-lets. Player is not the lessor, and is not in the position of a landlord as regards Robertson. Dunn is the party who receives the rent, and is bound in the usual warrandice. But Player is not a party to the deed because he comes under an obligation with regard to a certain stair.

Then Dunn does not assign to Robertson either expressly or implicitly an obligation to grant a renewal on demand. It would have been anomalous had he done so, because it would have given the sub-lessee of a portion of the subject the right to demand either a renewal of the lease of the entire subject in favour of Dunn against Dunn's will, or a renewal of only a portion, which was not an obligation undertaken by Player to Dunn.

But it is needless to speculate what would have been the result if the option had been done, because I think it was not done. If Dunn had been in the position of a landlord, Robertson had acquired no right to compel him to ask Player for a renewal, still less is he entitled to go against Player, between whom and himself no relation of lessor and lessee ever existed.

It is further obvious that the demand on Player is quite unreasonable. Player may have been willing and even anxious to grant a renewal of the lease of the whole subject to Dunn, and that is what he bound himself to do. But he was not willing, and he is not bound, to sub-let a fragment of the subject to a party who is not his lessee.

I am therefore disposed to adopt the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAS.—The case is this:—In January 1862 Mr Little Gilmour let a building ground described in the first article of the condensation for 15 years after Whitsunday 1861, that is to say, until Whitsunday 1876, to the defender Player, the purpose of the lease being the erection on the ground of buildings of a temporary description. The proprietor reserved right to put an

* "NOTE.—As the sub-lease by Dunn, with the consent of the defender, the pursuer is read by the Lord Ordinary, it involves no obligation on the defender or on Dunn to renew that contract at or before its expiry, this sub-lease in so far being in marked contrast to the sub-lease by the defender to Robertson. The fact that Player, for a reason not explained, was a consentor to the sub-lease by Dunn to the pursuer, could not import into that sub-lease an obligation that sought here to be declared, which otherwise could not have been enforced. This being so, a new or separate contract, entitling the pursuer to sue from the defender the sub-lease sued for, behoved to be averred. But no such contract has been set forth, and in fact it was not suggested at the debate that any such contract ever was concluded. For these reasons the plea of the defender against the relevancy of the summons has been sustained."

Player.

On 14th March 1862 Player, on the narrative that Dunn was then erecting a house and shop on a portion of the said ground, sub-let that portion of it to Dunn for 14½ years after Martinmas 1861, "with and under the several conditions and declarations particularly specified and contained in the lease" between Mr Little Gilmour, the proprietor, and Player, which were specially referred to the sub-lessee, and held as repeated, "declaring that in the event of the said John Player obtaining a renewal of his lease he shall, in the option of the said John Dunn, grant a renewal of the present sub-lease to him and his foresuits, and, in case of any change of the rent of the said whole subjects, on payment of a proportional part thereof effecting to the subjects hereby sub-let."

On the same occasion Dunn and Player, by sub-lease dated 14th and 15th March 1862, sub-let to the pursuer Robertson a portion of the ground held by Player under Mr Little Gilmour. This sub-lease commences in these terms:—

"It is contracted, agreed, and ended between the parties following, John Dunn, mason, presently residing in 39 Bristo Street, Edinburgh, and John Player, coach-hirer, Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, on the one part, and Andrew Robertson, residing in 3 Howard Place, secretary of the Scottish Provincial Insurance Company, on the other part, in manner following." The contract then states that Dunn sub-lets to Robertson, his heirs, assignees, and successors, that piece of ground on which Dunn was then erecting a brick tenement, consisting of a shop and two dwelling-houses, and that for the space of fourteen years and two months from 8th March 1862, "when Robertson had entered into possession, which piece of ground is described as part of the ground let by Mr Little Gilmour to Player, by lease dated 9th and 20th January 1862, "to which lease reference is hereby expressly made, and the conditions and stipulations therein, in so far as applicable to this sub-tack, are hereby specially referred to and held as expressed." For which causes, and on the other part, Robertson bound himself to pay to the said John Dunn and his heirs or assignees, or to the said John Player, the sum of £2, 5s. sterling, being the one-half of the rent payable by him to the said John Player" for the whole ground sub-let by Player to Dunn on 14th March then current, "declaring that this lease shall only be put an end at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after Whitsunday 1866, as provided for in the said lease" by Mr Little Gilmour to Player, and declaring further that the building then erecting by Dunn should be finished in a tradesman-like manner (meaning, obviously, by Robertson), and that certain specified particulars with regard to the gables should be observed, Dunn reserving a certain privilege of the south gable if he should build on the adjoining stance, the gable itself to be the property of Robertson, and to be taken away by him at his removal.

In December 1874 or July 1875 the defender Player did obtain from the proprietor a renewal of his lease for twelve years after Whitsunday 1876, with a tack in favour of the proprietor at Martinmas 1879, or any subsequent Whitsunday or Martinmas, on a similar condition as before, of one year's notice of his intention himself to build thereon; and the question now is whether the pursuer Robertson is in right of the option which was conferred on Dunn to demand corresponding renewal of his sub-lease from the defender Player. The Ordinary finds that there are no relevant statements to infer that conclusion, and therefore dismisses the action. From that judgment I am disposed to differ. By the sub-lease to Robertson Dunn divested himself of all interest under his own sub-lease and its conditions so far as regarded the ground now in dispute. He thereby, I think, made over to Robertson to that extent the option which he had to demand a renewal of that sub-lease from Player. So certainly, would have been the result if the whole ground which Dunn tenanted had been sub-let to Robertson. It is true that the clause conferring the option is not expressly assigned to Robertson. But I take it to be clear that a sub-lease operates as an assignment to all effects, except that the grantor remains bound to the landlord. That leaves merely the difficulty arising from Robertson being sub-lessee of part of the ground only. But that difficulty is, I think, removed by Player having become a party to the sub-lease in favour of Robertson. He did so in the strongest of all forms, by describing himself as continuing along with Dunn on the one part and with Robertson on the other part. But the result would not have been varied although Player had been described as a consenter to what bore to be done by Dunn, or Dunn had been described as a consenter to what bore to be done by Player, for it has been ruled that even in a disposition, consent carries to the disponee all the consenter's rights and interests in the estate as well as those of the direct disponer.

Looking to the object and terms of these leases and sub-leases, and to the way they have been acted on, I think the equitable as well as the legal result must be to entitle Robertson to obtain from Player the extension of his sub-lease as concluded for in the summons, unless there are disputed facts to the proof which does not appear to be alleged; and in any view I am of opinion that the action ought not to have been dismissed as irrelevant.

Bankrupt—Stat. 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 115 and 176—Trustee and Commissioners—Compromise—Transaction. Sec. 176 of the Bankruptcy Act enacts that in a sequestration "the trustee with consent of the commissioners, compound and transact or refer to arbiters any question which may arise in the course of the sequestration regarding the estate, or any demand or claim made thereon."

Held that a transaction by which the trustee and commissioners in a sequestration gave up a portion of the bankrupt's heritable estate to a heritable creditor in lieu of his claims against the estate was not subject to challenge, on ground that the statutory conditions attaching to a private sale of heritable property had not been complied with—the transaction being a bona fide compromise, and not a sale.

2D DIVISION. BY missive offer, dated 2d October 1862, Robert Dempster, mason in Glasgow, and Robert Bruce Dalzell, joiner and builder, Glasgow, agreed to chase from Robert Denniston, merchant, Glasgow, a steading of ground fronting Argyle, Main, and Holm Streets, Glasgow, containing 1580 square yards or thereby, at the price of £6500, over and above a feu-duty of £100 or thereby, the price to be converted into a yearly ground-rent at two ears' purchase, to be allocated over certain buildings which they thereby undertook to erect. Denniston accepted the offer of the same date, and agreed to make temporary advances to Dempster and Dalzell at the completion of each story of the tenements, and on the roofing-in of them. Dempster and Dalzell further bound themselves to have two tenements fronting Argyle Street erected and finished by the 1st day of July 1863, and the remaining tenements by 15th May 1864, it being, inter alia, declared and agreed that should they make a stoppage during the course of erection of any building for more than one month, unless from the state of the weather precluding building operations, then the whole buildings should immediately revert to and become Denniston's property in consideration of his advances, and he should have power, without any process of law whatever, to enter into possession, and either finish the buildings or sell them, as he might deem most advisable. This steading of ground belonged in different portions to two sets of trustees, for whom Mr Denniston acted in the matter.

Dempster and Dalzell entered into possession of the steading of ground in or about the month of November 1862, and erected on a plot or area thereof, extending to 664 square yards or thereby fronting Argyle Street and Main Street the two tenements referred to in the missive, on or about 1st July 1863. When these two tenements were approaching completion Denniston conveyed to Dempster and Dalzell, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor, as trustees, and in trust for behoof of themselves and their respective heirs and successors, the plot or area of ground containing 664 square yards or thereby, with the whole houses or buildings erected or to be erected upon the same. This disposition was recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines for Renfrewshire on 15th May 1863. Denniston, during the erection of these two tenements, made certain advances to Dempster and Dalzell in terms of the missive offer, and these advances, excepting a balance of £1063, 18s. 7d., were repaid to him out of a sum of £8000 borrowed by Dempster and Dalzell upon the security of a bond and disposition in security over the 664 square yards, houses and buildings thereon, dated and recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines on 15th May 1863. In security of his balance, and for farther implement of the missive offer of purchase, Dempster and Dalzell reconveyed the plot or area of ground, containing 664 square yards or thereby, and houses and buildings thereon, to Denniston, by disposition ex facie absolute, dated the 15th and recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines 18th May 1863. A back-letter was written by Denniston to Dempster and Dalzell, dated 15th May and recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines 3d October 1863, by which Denniston acknowledged that he held the ex facie absolute disposition as security for the sum of £1063, 18s. 7d. and interest thereon, and also implement of the fulfilment of the obligation undertaken by Dempster and Dalzell in the missive offer of purchase and acceptance. Upon the remainder of the 1580 yards, being the part of the original steading of ground contained in the missive offer of purchase and acceptance which fronted Main Street and Holm Street, Dempster and Dalzell, during the summer of 1863, began to erect the three tenements stipulated in the missive; but before these tenements were completed Dempster and Dalzell both became embarrassed in their circumstances, and the estates of the firm of R. and J. Dalzell, of which R. B. Dalzell was a partner, and of R. B. Dalzell and James Dalzell as the individual partners of the company and as individuals, were sequestrated on 27th February 1864, and the estates of Dempster were sequestrated on 9th March 1864. Before 27th February 1864 a stoppage took place in the course of the erection of the three tenements fronting Main Street and Holm Street, and that not in consequence of unfavourable weather, and it continued for more than one month. The trustees and creditors on none of the sequestrated estates proceeded to complete the erection of these tenements, and neither they nor the bankrupts had funds to enable them to do so. Denniston had, during the progress of the work, made to Dempster and Dalzell the temporary advances stipulated in the missive; and in the month of April 1864, after the stoppage had continued for more than a month, Denniston, after repeated intimations to the trustee on the sequestrated estate of R. B. Dalzell, entered into possession of the ground and unfinished tenements, and finished the same at his own expense, and also entered into possession of the 664 square yards, and houses and buildings thereon, all on the footing that the whole ground and subjects reverted to him as his own property in terms of the missive. Mr Sinclair, accountant at Glasgow, then the trustee on the sequestrated estates of Dalzell and his firm, intimated to Denniston that he disputed the right of the latter to enter into possession of the property under the missive, but he took steps to prevent Denniston from entering into possession, and Denniston continued in possession of, and exercised all ordinary acts of ownership upon the subjects, without interference or objection on the part of any subsequent trustees in the sequestration, or on the part of Dalzell, until the present action was raised. The creditors on the sequestrated estate of Dalzell and his firm, at the third general meeting on 25th April 1864, resolved and instructed the trustee to dispose of the whole heritable estate forming part of the sequestrated estates, or in which the trustee was interested, by public sale, and to take all necessary steps for that purpose, but no public sale of any part of these subjects was ever advertised or took place. In 1867 Denniston offered to abandon all claims ranking against the estates of Dalzell and his firm on the trustee and commissioners abandoning all claim to the property in Argyle, Main, and Holm Streets, being the whole steading of ground containing 1580 square yards, with the whole buildings and houses thereon; and Dempster, whose sequestration had come to an end by a discharge on a composition contract, but who had not paid the composition due by him to Denniston, then agreed to an arrangement to the like effect, so far as he was interested in that property. At a meeting held on 15th August 1867 the trustee and commissioners on the estates of Dalzell and his firm, after considering Denniston's offer, passed a resolution to the effect that, as there was no the most remote chance of the properties ever yielding anything to the estates, it would be advisable to abandon them on the terms proposed by Denniston, and they instructed the trustee accordingly. At a meeting of the creditors on the sequestrated estates of Dalzell and his firm, held on 16th April 1868, the meeting passed a resolution by which they approved of the minute of the trustee and commissioners, dated 15th August 1867, and instructed the trustee, with consent of the commissioners, to join with Denniston in discharging the missive offer of purchase dated 2d October 1862, and the back-letter dated 15th May 1864, and, farther, to join with Dempster in executing the necessary deed in favour of Denniston, or the trustees for whom he acted, vesting them with the absolute right and title of the property, upon their discharging the sequestrated estates of all claims they might have of ranking thereon and on the understanding that Denniston should relieve the estates of the whole expense of the discharge and deeds. In pursuance of the resolutions a disposition, renunciation, and discharge, dated 26th and 27th August 1868, was executed by Dempster, Mr Sinclair (now deceased), as trustee on the sequestrated estates of Dalzell and his firm.

with the special advice and concurrence of the commissioners on the sequestrated estates, and Denniston, and by the two sets of trustees already mentioned, whereby Denniston, as an individual, and the trustees, renounced and discharged the missive offer of purchase, and acceptance thereof, and discharged Dempster of the composition due by him on their claims against him in connection with the properties, and discharged the sequestrated estates of Dalzell and his firm of all claims by them against these estates, and generally discharged Dempster and the sequestrated estates of all claims and demands whatsoever against them relating in any way to the standing of ground and buildings thereon, and also freed and relieved Dempster and Dalzell of certain claims connected with the titles of the property, and of the personal obligation contained in the bond and disposition in security for £8000 over the tenements fronting Argyle Street, and Denniston, and Sinclair as Dalzell's and his firm's trustee, with consent of the commissioners, renounced and discharged the missive offer of purchase and acceptance thereof and back-letter, and declared that the subjects and buildings thereon should thenceforth be the absolute property of the trustees for whom Denniston acted.

Dalzell was discharged under his sequestration without composition on 12th June 1866; and after the death of Mr Sinclair a Mr Parnie was, on 1st March 1874, appointed trustee upon the sequestrated estates of Dalzell and of his firm.

On 15th October 1875 Dalzell raised an action against Denniston and the trustees for whom he acted, and also against Parnie, the trustee on his sequestrated estates, in which he concluded for reduction of the minute of the commissioners on the sequestrated estates of himself and his firm, dated 5th August 1867, of the minute of meeting of the creditors on the same estates of 16th April 1868, and of the disposition, renunciation, and discharge which followed thereon, along with the minute to register the same and certificate of registration. There were also declaratory and other conclusions to establish the pursuer's right and complete his title to the subjects.

It was averred that the value of property in Glasgow had risen greatly between the date of the pursuer's sequestration in 1864 and the time when the properties were abandoned to Denniston in 1868, and since, so much so, that if they had been sold a large reversion would have been gained for the creditors and bankrupt.

Dalzell pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having the radical right and title to the half pro indiviso of the said subjects, is entitled to decree of declaration to that effect, and to have the said pro indiviso half of said subjects set up or made over to him upon the terms condescended on. (2) The transaction and arrangement with Mr Denniston and his trustees concluded on having been altogether illegal, incompetent, and unauthorised, the pursuer is entitled to have the documents constituting and following upon the said transaction reduced, or to have the defenders bound to dispose and convey the said pro indiviso half of the said subjects to him, as concluded for.

On 28th March 1876 the Lord Ordinary, after having considered a report, pronounced an interlocutor, whereby, after numerous findings in fact, which have been embodied in the preceding narrative, he continued as follows:—"Finds that the pursuer has not established that the said transaction was unfair, or that it was gratuitous on the part of the trustee and commissioners, or that it was not to the advantage of the creditors of the sequestrated estates of himself or his firm, or that the value of the subjects exceeded the amount of the advances of Mr Denniston and his trustees: Finds, on the other hand, that the defenders have not proved that the pursuer, in the knowledge of the facts, homologated or acquiesced in the said transaction : Finds that, in so far as regards the just and equal half pro indiviso of the subjects in Main Street and Holm Street (being the whole of the original steading of ground contained in the missive offer of purchase and acceptance, excepting therefrom the said plot of area of ground containing 664 square yards, and the tenements thereon in Argyle Street and Main Street), the full right of property therein having reverted to the said Robert Denniston in 1864 in the manner above mentioned, the said transaction was not a sale of the heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt, and was not ultra vires of the trustee and commissioners on the sequestrated estates of the pursuer and his said firm : Therefore assails the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, in so far as the same may extend or relate to the said subjects in Main Street and Holm Street ; and, quoad ultra, finds, as regards the just and equal pro indiviso half of the said plot or area of ground, consisting of 664 square yards or thereby, that in respect the same formed part of the date of the sequestration, and also in 1867-1868, part of the heritable estate of the pursuer falling under the sequestration of the estates of himself and his said firm, the foresaid transaction was a sale of the said heritable estate, and that the same not having been a public sale, and the requirements of the Bankruptcy Acts in the case of a private sale not having been complied with, the said transaction was ultra vires of the creditors and of the trustee and commissioners on said sequestrated estates, and is reducible, and that the pursuer, on paying to the defender Robert Denniston, or the foresaid trustees for whom he acts, any balance which, upon a just accounting, shall appear to be due to him or them by the pursuer, or by the trustee on the sequestrated estates of the pursuer and his said firm, and upon the pursuer farther making payment to the trustee in the said sequestration of whatever sum may be necessary to satisfy and pay in full the whole liabilities of the pursuer, in so far as the same have not been already paid by dividends from the said sequestrated estates, and upon paying or providing for the charges for recovering and distributing the said estates, the pursuer will be entitled to decree of reduction and declarator in terms of the conclusions of the summons, in so far as the same are applicable to his pro indiviso half of the said plot or area of ground, consisting of 664 square yards, with the houses thereon, and to obtain a valid and effectual disposition thereof from the defenders : He appoints the cause to be enrolled for farther procedure, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses ; and grants leave to all parties to reclaim."

Denniston and his trustees reclaimed, and argued ;—The trustee and commissioners had, with the concurrence of the creditors, entered into this transaction with Denniston ; and as there really were claims which Denniston had against the sequestrated estates, and in which he was entitled to succeed, they were entitled, under the 176th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to make a compromise with him.* The bargain under the original missive offer and acceptance related to the whole subjects, and when the purchasers failed to implement the conditions of the contract, Denniston was in a position to enforce his rights under the contract in respect to the whole subjects.

* The 176th section provides—"The trustee may, with the consent of the commissioners, compound and transact or refer to arbitration any question which may arise in the course of the sequestration regarding the estate, or demand or claim made thereon, and the compromise, transaction, or decision arbitral shall be binding on the creditors and the bankrupt."

Argued for Dalzell;—It was ultra vires of the trustee and commissioners to enter into the transaction complained of, which amounted in effect to a private sale of the whole subjects to Denniston, and by the 115th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1856, such a sale could only be effected with the concurrence of the Accountant in Bankruptcy,* which had not been obtained. At the worst, supposing that Denniston had a right to resume the Holm Street and Main Street subjects, the Argyle Street subjects could never revert to him in virtue of the missives, and the transaction, far as it affected these subjects, fell to be reduced.

Dalzell v.
Denniston, &c.

LORD NEAVE.—It is of importance that trustees on sequestrated estates should have this power of compromise which has been conferred on them by statute. If there really does exist a dispute between the trustee and a third party it is quite proper that, upon both parties giving up something which they believed to be their rights, a compromise should be come to. We have nothing to do with the merits of the compromise as it has turned out. It is enough that there were conflicting claims and a real dispute, and that in order to come to a settlement this compromise was entered into.

I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that what was done here was a sale of the Argyle Street subjects. It was not a sale at all. The matter was a proper one for a compromise, and a compromise was accordingly effected.

LORD ORMDALE.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot see any difference between the positions in which the two properties in question stood. There was a compromise as regarded each of them. Nor have I been able to see any evidence of such bad faith on the part of Mr Denniston as would suffice to be a ground of action for reducing the compromise. A trustee in a sequestration has always power, with the concurrence of the commissioners, to compromise claims made against the estate, whether heritable or moveable. Of course it is necessary that there should be conflicting claims to be compromised, and I am satisfied that in this case there were such claims as made it advisable that they should be compromised. There does not seem to be any doubt that these claims were serious, and in no respect fictitious. It is not necessary that an action should be raised to enforce it to make a claim serious. It is sufficient that a dispute exists, and such a dispute we have here.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur. The whole question is whether the arrangement, entered into and acted upon between the trustee in Dalzell's sequestration and Denniston is valid and effectual under the bankruptcy statute.

The Bankrupt Act, sec. 176, empowers the trustee, "with consent of the commissioners, to compound and transact or refer to arbitration any questions which arise in the course of the sequestration regarding the estate," and such compromise is declared binding on the creditors and on the bankrupt.

The defender pleads that the agreement between him and the trustee and commissioners is valid under this clause, and cannot now be challenged by the charged bankrupt. On the other hand, the bankrupt maintains that the

* Sec. 115 enacts—"It shall be competent for the trustee, with the concurrence of a majority of the creditors in number and value, and of the heritable creditors, if any, and of the Accountant, to sell the heritable estate by private gain, on such terms and conditions regarding price and otherwise as the trustee, with concurrence of these parties, may fix."

No. 39. agreement was not a compromise at all, but a virtual sale of the bankrupt's heritance, and not being by public roup, or in the mode prescribed by the Act, it is null and void.

Dec. 12, 1876.
Dalzell v.
Denniston, &c.

Now, to decide this question it is necessary to look to Denniston's position as regards these properties. He was originally the proprietor of the ground, and sold it to the bankrupt under certain conditions as to building on it and the like. I think there is no real or substantial distinction between the two portions of the property. The back-letter granted by Mr Denniston to Mr Dalzell bears that on implement of the whole obligations in the missive offer he is to reconvey the whole subjects—that is, the tenement already completed as well as those only commenced, and that to Mr Dalzell or his disponees. The position of Mr Denniston, then, was this: He had been the original proprietor of the ground, and he had agreed to feu it on certain conditions. He had divested himself temporarily, but that was only in order to validate the bonds for borrowed money, and then the whole subjects were reconveyed to him (Mr Denniston), to be held in terms of the back-letter till the conditions as to building were fulfilled. Now, these conditions never were fulfilled, and were not fulfilled when Mr Dalzell was sequestrated. What, then, was Mr Denniston's position? He was ex facie absolute proprietor, subject only to the personal obligations of the back-letter, and it might be fairly maintained that if the conditions of the back-letter were not fulfilled he was entitled to resume the absolute property, and the trustee or bankrupt would not do what was necessary under the back-letter.

Now, there was a real dispute between the parties as to the subjects. Denniston was, in the worst possible view, a creditor, with a right to irritate and forfeit the interest of Dalzell, if either he, or the trustee on his sequestration, did not pay the sums stipulated for in the agreement. The trustee could not or could not pay the sums due, or fulfil the conditions of the back-letter, and Denniston held the property, and claimed to rank for his loss. In this way a dispute arose between Mr Denniston and the trustee, and the trustee was entitled to transact under the 176th section of the Bankrupt Act. The pursuer says the trustee should have sold the property. But what could he sell? Simply a law-plea! He had no title to the property, and no power to give and could give neither title nor possession to any purchaser. The subjects were in the possession of a heritable creditor, assuming that to be Mr Denniston's position. Even if Mr Denniston had said no more than "pay me my advance or give me the property," that would have been a dispute, according to my understanding of the statute. The power to compromise does not depend on raising of an action, but on the fact that there is a dispute, or a subject in controversy, about which an action may be raised. The word "estate" of the bankrupt comprehends heritable as well as moveable property, and a dispute or interference as to the right to an heritable subject is just one of the disputes which the trustee, with consent of the commissioners, may transact or compromise. Suppose Mr Denniston had raised an action of declarator that in consequence of the failure to build, &c. he was absolute proprietor of the subjects, free from obligation contained in the back-letter, surely this action might have been promoted. I think it can make no difference that the compromise proceeded without the formality of raising an action.

It is to be kept in view, also, that here the compromise had reference to the very subjects in regard to which the dispute arose, and to nothing else.

the part of the bankrupt's estate was involved. Had it been otherwise, we might have had a very different and a much more difficult question to deal with.

The trustee and commissioners have under the statute the power to enter into such a compromise as this by themselves; but here, not content with that power, they called a special meeting of the creditors to consider what was proposed, and at that meeting their proposed arrangement was deliberately approved of. There was no allegation of fraud, and no pretence for saying that the trustee and commissioners did not do the best they could for behoof of the creditors, and of the bankrupt, who had the reversionary interest in the estate. I am of opinion, therefore, that the compromise which was carried through by the trustee, and which has been acted on ever since, is binding upon the pursuer, and that the pursuer is not entitled to set the same aside.

The Lord Justice-Clerk concurred in holding that the transaction was valid under the 15th section of the Bankruptcy Act.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to said interlocutor, in so far as it assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons relating to the subjects in Main Street and Holm Street: Quoad ultra alter the interlocutor, and assoilzie the defenders from the remaining conclusions of the summons, and recall the findings of the interlocutor so far as inconsistent with this judgment: Find the pursuer liable in expenses to both defenders, and remit," &c.

Scott's
Trustees.

Question—Term of Payment—Residue.—A proprietor of an entailed estate, making provisions of specific amount to his younger children, payable at his death or marriage, directed his trustees, after the purposes of the trust "have been fully satisfied by the succession to the lands of P . . . opening to them," to pay the residue to his eldest son under burden of an annuity to his mother. This was a property to which the testator had succeeded, subject to a liferent, and a very large portion of the estate at his own disposal. The liferenter was the testator. Sums having been set aside to satisfy the provisions of the trust for the younger children, of which the term of payment had not arrived, the eldest son called on the trustees to convey the residue to him. Held that, irrespective of the question whether the younger children's portion had vested or not, the residue was entitled to a conveyance.

Decision (per Lord Shand) on the vesting of residue.

There was an action of declarator and payment by W. M. Scott of 1st Division against the trustees under his father's trust-disposition and settlement, concluding that the residue of the estate was vested in him, and that he was entitled to payment of it. Lord Young. B.

Walter M. Scott, the pursuer's father, died in 1862. By his deed of settlement he directed his trustees after payment of debts to hold the residue of the estate for his children, other than the heir of entail of Wauchope, to share alike, the provisions to be paid after his death on their marriage, "or as soon thereafter as my trustees may be enabled to divide the residue by the death of the liferentrix of the lands of Pinnaclehill" (an estate to which the testator had succeeded, subject to a liferent). By a codicil the provisions to younger children were altered. The testator directed the trustees under the trust-disposition to pay to each of his daughters "in manner therein-mentioned" a sum which, together with what they would receive under their parents' marriage-contract and a bond of provision, would make £4000, the second son in like manner £10,000, other sons £6000, and the codicil proceeded as follows:—"And I also further direct that my said trustees shall, after the above and the other purposes of my said trust-disposition and settlement have been fully satisfied (by the succession to the lands of Pinnaclehill and other subjects forming the residue of the trust-estate of the late James Dickson, opening to my said trustees), convey the residue of my means and estate to my eldest son Walter, but that under the burden of an annuity of £200 to his mother, if she is then and while she continues to be my widow only."

The liferentrix of Pinnaclehill predeceased the testator by a few months. The testator was survived by five children,—the pursuer, who succeeded to the estate of Wauchope as heir of entail; a daughter, who was married in 1871, and received her portion; a second son, who attained majority in 1875, and received his portion; and two other unmarried daughters in minority, of whom the younger would attain majority in 1880.

Sums were invested to meet the provisions of the daughters in minority, and there was a considerable residue.

The Lord Ordinary assolizied the defenders.

The pursuer reclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The claim of the pursuer is for a conveyance of the residue of his father's estate, in terms of the direction contained in the codicil to the father's trust-disposition and settlement.

The only question raised by the defenders is whether the trust-estate is in the situation contemplated by the truster.

The original settlement divided the entire general estate of the truster among his younger children. It is not quite accurate to say that it deals with the residue at all. The entire estate is to be divided deductis debitis et impensis. There are no legacies. The codicil, on the other hand, provides legacies to the younger children to a definite amount, and then disposes of the residue in favor of the eldest son.

The original deed also appointed a time at which the shares were to vest. The eldest child was to take a vested interest till majority, or, in the case of daughter, till marriage. And another condition which operated a postponement of the payment of payment, which was also declared to be the term of vesting, was that the payment was not to be made till a certain expected succession should fall in. There was also a clause of survivorship.

In the codicil this is all much altered. Specific sums are directed to be paid to the younger children. To each of the daughters a sum which, together with the provisions contained in their parents' marriage-contract, and a bond of provision will make £4000, to his second son £10,000, and to other sons, if he should have any, £6000. The interest until the term of payment mentioned in the trust-disposition is to be paid to the widow for the children's maintenance.

Then comes this direction:—"And I also further direct that my said trustees shall, after the above and the other purposes of my said trust-disposition and settlement have been fully satisfied (by the succession to the lands of Pinnaclehill and other subjects forming the residue of the trust-estate of the late James Dickson, opening to my said trustees), convey the residue of my means and estate to my eldest son Walter, but that under the burden of an annuity of £200 to his mother, if she is then and while she continues to be my widow only."

will and other subjects, forming the residue of the trust-estate of the late James Jackson, opening to my said trustees), convey the residue of my means and estate to my eldest son Walter, but that under the burden of an annuity of £200 to his mother, if she is then and while she continues to be my widow only." No. 40.
Dec. 13, 1876.
Scott v. Scott's Trustees.

Now, the question is whether the above purposes, that is, the provision of certain sums to the younger children, and the other purposes of the trust-disposition and settlement, have been fully satisfied by the succession to Pinnaclehill being opened to the trust. If so, the trustees are not only empowered but directed to convey the residue to the pursuer.

A question may arise whether the provisions in favour of younger children did not vest a morte testatoris, the direction as to vesting not being repeated in the codicil. For the decision of the present question I do not think it is necessary to determine that point, because whether these shares have vested or not I think the words of the direction to convey the residue are so clear that its construction is free from all ambiguity.

It is well to notice in passing that whereas the children entitled to two shares were attained majority and received payment, other two children are still in minority and unmarried, and their shares, at least according to the view of the court, will be necessarily retained for their behoof.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the purposes of the trust within the meaning of this codicil have been fully satisfied by the succession to Pinnaclehill having fallen in.

The testator appears to have looked to this succession (which was not a mere successionis but a succession which had actually opened, the beneficial interest being withheld during the survivance of a liferenter) as the means of enabling him to satisfy the provisions of his trust-disposition and afterwards of the codicil. He plainly did not consider himself in a position to make such provisions unless he had had the expectation of this succession when he says that the conveyance of residue is to be made as soon as the purposes of the trust satisfied by that succession opening. I can read the words in no other sense than that as soon as the succession comes in, and the trustees are in ample funds, the residue beyond the fixed provisions is to be conveyed to the eldest son, subject to an annuity in favour of his mother. On that simple view, I think, we are on safe ground of judgment without determining whether the shares of the younger children have vested.

There is another consideration which goes a long way to support the same opinion. The codicil provides an additional annuity of £200 to the testator's widow, not from his death, but as soon as the succession to Pinnaclehill should fall in. Now, how did the truster provide for that annuity? He did not direct his trustees to pay it, and they have no power under the trust-deed or the codicil to pay it. But they are to convey the residue to the eldest son, subject to the burden of his paying the annuity, and therefore it is plain that the widow's annuity cannot commence until the conveyance of the residue to the son. If the construction contended for by the trustees were correct, the widow could not have the enjoyment of her annuity till the youngest daughter attains majority, which will not be till 1880, or is married. That would be a startling result, and it suggests doubts of the soundness of such a construction. It seems to me that the truster's intention was that so soon as the Pinnaclehill succession became available the widow should have her annuity. She cannot do so, as the trust is framed, till the son gets the residue, and therefore I think that

No. 40. the succession coming in is the point of time at which both events are to take place.

Dec. 13, 1876.
Scott v.
Scott's
Trustees.

What the terms of the conveyance ought to be is another matter. I think the best course will be to pronounce a finding that the pursuer is entitled to the residue of the estate. What the sum is to be or the terms of the conveyance is a matter for adjustment.

LORD DEAS.—The original deed disposed of the whole general estate of the trustor to his younger children; and it is plain that vesting was to take place on their respectively attaining majority or being married if the Pinnaclehill succession had then fallen in.

The codicil provides certain specific sums to each; and it was plausibly contended that the direction it contains "to pay to each of my daughters in manner therein-mentioned" (that is to say, in manner mentioned in the trust-deed) being in the necessity of majority or marriage as well as the opening of the Pinnaclehill succession as conditions of vesting, so far as regards the provisions of the daughters. Now, assuming, although not deciding, that to be so, there still remains to be considered the effect upon the present question of the clause directing the conveyance of the residue. I agree with your Lordship that the decision of that question turns entirely upon that clause; and nothing could well be clearer or more explicit than its terms. It imports, I think, that, in the view of the testator, all the other purposes of the trust would be fully satisfied by the succession to Pinnaclehill opening (as it has now done) to the trustees, and consequently he directs the trustees on the occurrence of that event to convey the residue of his means and estate to his eldest son Walter (the pursuer of the action); whom failing, to his second son; whom failing, among his other children, share and share alike, burdened in each case with an annuity of £300 to their mother during her viduity.

Some questions of detail may remain behind connected with the terms of the conveyance to be granted, which the parties may probably be able to adjust. But I am of opinion that the time for granting the conveyance has come, and that is the leading question to be decided.

I may add that the provision in the codicil of an annuity of £200 to the widow as a burden on the residue, points strongly in the same direction. The parties are agreed that it is not in lieu of any former annuity, but additional, and the words "if she is then and while she continues my widow," in the collocation in which they are used, indicate, I think, that it was to commence immediately. The absence of any direction as to interest on the residue strengthens the same view.

For these reasons I cannot come to the same result as the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I concur. Only two purposes of the trust remain to be fulfilled—the payment of the shares provided to two younger children, and payment of the residue. As to funds, the trustees are in possession of heritable estate (Pinnaclehill) worth £800 a-year, equal to, say £24,000, and £30,000 of money, in all an estate of £27,000, or, at least, of large amount beyond what is required for payment of the two shares.

As regards the law to be applied in these circumstances I entertain no doubt.

According to the leading case of Carleton v. Thomson (July 30, 1867, 5 Macph. H. L. 151), and many other authorities, there is a clear presumption in favour of the vesting of residue, and against accumulation where that is not expressly directed. This presumption will be displaced where there are one or more trust purposes to be fulfilled, which require or necessarily infer postponement of vesting; where there is some antecedent condition to be fulfilled by the legatee—that is to say, a contingency personal to the legatee, inferring a postponed term of vesting; or where there is an event of some other nature contemplated by the testator which infers a postponed date of payment of residue, with a destination over in favour of others applicable to that time.

No. 40.
Dec. 18, 1876.
Scott v. Scott's Trustees.

But here there is no trust purpose the fulfilment of which must be waited for, the trustees having ample funds to provide for the younger children's provisions; and there is no condition to be complied with by the legatee. There remains, then, only the question whether there is any event contemplated by the truster which infers a postponement of the date of payment with a destination over applicable to the time when that event shall happen.

I agree with your Lordship that the clause of direction to convey the residue must be read as referring to an event which after the testator's death was still in the future. The truster directs that the residue is to be paid, not when the portions are all paid, but when the purposes of the trust "are satisfied," and that by the succession to Pinnaclehill "falling in"—that is, as soon as by the occurrence of that event the trustees are put in ample funds to "satisfy" the provisions. As the succession having fallen in before the truster died, the trustees were then put in funds for that purpose, and there was, therefore, no future event antecedent to the vesting of the residue. On the contrary, the event referred to in the deed having happened before the truster's death the residue was then to have vested a morte testatoris.

But if that view were open to doubt, I think it would be removed by the effect of the provision of the annuity of £200 to the widow, which is payable after the conveyance of the residue. The youngest daughter will not be entitled till 1880. The testator died in 1862; and I do not think it could have been his intention that the enjoyment of the annuity should be delayed for eighteen years (or, indeed, for any period) after not only his own death, but the fund for payment became available by the estate of Pinnaclehill falling in.

I arrive at this conclusion without reference to the question whether the portions of the younger children have also vested a morte testatoris, in which case the whole provisions in the deed vested at one date. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the view that the younger children's provisions did so vest. I do not consider that material, because the trustees may retain enough to "satisfy" the provisions, and are yet in a position to pay over a large residue.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the pursuer is now entitled to demand a conveyance of the residue of his father's trust-estate, in terms of the direction to that effect contained in the codicil dated 6th September 1861 appended to the trust-disposition and settlement dated 21st December 1859," &c.

Reid v. Baird.

Lease—Reparation—Landlord and Tenant—Damnum fatale.—Held that a landlord of a house and shop was liable in damages sustained by his tenant through the sudden melting of an extraordinary accumulation of snow on the roof, in respect that the injury would not have been sustained if the construction of the roof had not been defective.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian and Haddington.

ON 15th January 1876 Archibald Reid, clothier at Longridge, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh against David Baird, proprietor of a house and shop in West Calder of which the pursuer was tenant, and concluded (1) for £40 as damages suffered by him in consequence of the flooding of the premises in January 1875, and (2) for £6, being the amount he had to pay a sub-tenant of part of the premises. The ground of the action was that the damage had been sustained in consequence of a flow of water which had "been caused by the defective construction of the roof of the premises, or because the defender had "failed to keep the same in a proper and efficient state of repair, and by which flow of water the stock and effects of the pursuer in the said premises were damaged to the above extent, and for which the defender is liable, having been bound to keep the said premises wind and water tight during the pursuer's tenancy."

Baird defended the action, and stated that "the roof was of proper construction, and was in a complete state of repair." Whatever damage had occurred, he said, was caused by stress of weather, and was a damnum fatale.

A proof was allowed to both parties. From the evidence led it appeared that the roof was so constructed that instead of the ends of the slates projecting over the front wall of the house, this front wall was carried up in the form of a parapet or blocking course, behind which there was a gutter lined with lead to receive the water off the slope of the roof. This gutter terminated in a rhone or pipe which conducted the water to the ground. At the west end of this gutter the lead with which it was lined rose on the side next the roof to a height of 1½ inches above the edge of the parapet opposite, but at the east end, where the rhone was, the lead did not rise to within 1½ inches of the height of the top of the parapet opposite. The consequence was that when the gutter got too full, owing to the rhone being stopped up, or from any other cause, the water instead of escaping over the parapet rose over the lead on the roof and soaking in under the slates got inside the house. On the occasion in question there had been a heavy fall of snow on Friday, 1st January followed, on Saturday, the 2d, by a sudden and rapid thaw, and as most of the snow had been removed from the gutter the rhone was insufficient to carry off the melted snow, and the water accordingly overflowed the lead at the east end of the gutter, and so flooded the house. On Monday, 4th January, Reid had employed some men to clear the gutter of ice and snow.

It also appeared that a somewhat similar accident, but on a much smaller scale, had occurred in December 1873, and Reid had not explained to Baird of it, or informed him that anything of the sort had happened.

Reid, in his evidence, stated that the mode in which he arrived at the sum claimed as damages was by going over the stock in the shop at the time of the flooding and noting the amount of depreciation in value of the several articles in a pass-book. A copy of these notes was produced.

On 12th January 1875 Reid had written Baird, claiming £18, 10s, the amount of damage caused to his stock and furniture by the overflood.

With regard to this demand he stated—"I asked £18, 10s. as the amount of damage at that time; but a good number of my goods became subsequently damaged through the dampness and mildew produced by the overflow above mentioned."

Reid v. Baird.

On 15th March 1876 the Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) pronounced decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Baird appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the defender;—The overflow was obviously the result of the tenant's neglecting to clear the unusual quantity of snow from the roof. A tenant was bound to use a reasonable degree of diligence to protect his house from harm.¹ He was bound to do his best to obviate any great or manifest injury.² The snowstorm was quite apparent, and so was the thaw, and yet nothing was done until too late. There was therefore a failure of duty.³ The tenant now said that there had been a previous snow, but he had not told the landlord of it, and so by his own neglect had prevented any defect being put right. The landlord had fulfilled his duty if the house could resist ordinary weather. No house could be made absolutely secure against abnormal circumstances. In any case the amount of damages was excessive. In January 1875 the tenant himself fixed it at £18, 10s., and he now asked for £40 odds.

Argued for the pursuer;—It had been proved that there was a serious defect in the construction of this roof, and the landlord was liable therefor. He was bound to give his tenant a wind and water tight house. As regarded alleged neglect on the part of the tenant, he was not bound to be always suspecting his roof. Snow was one of the ordinary incidents of this climate, as also was thaw, and a landlord was bound to provide against it. The landlord had had an opportunity of checking the amount of snow if he had chosen, but he never availed himself of it. -
Advising,—

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is certainly a narrow one in all its aspects, and is unfortunate that we ever had to deal with it. An appeal to the Sheriff would have been the most reasonable course to have followed.

For the whole I am not disposed to alter the Sheriff-substitute's judgment on the merits. In the first place, there is no doubt that the flooding of this ground and shop was caused by the faulty construction of the roof. That seems to be admitted on both sides. The roof was so constructed as not to slope right down over the house, but to terminate in a parapet, and the lead which was used to line the inner portion of the parapet did not extend sufficiently to one place, and when the snow got piled up between the parapet and the house, and a thaw set in, and the snow melted, the water soaked in through the work of the roof under the slates, and so produced the damage now sought to be recovered. The defence is, that the damage was caused by an unusual or exceptional snowstorm, and no doubt that seems to have been the case, but snowstorms must be calculated for in building houses in this climate, and cannot be said that a house is properly built if it will not resist even an exceptional snowstorm.

Another point was attempted to be made for the defender, that if the tenant

There is some evidence of previous warning of this risk of flooding, but it does not appear to what extent or when this had occurred. On the whole matter, although this is a narrow case, and if the Sheriff-substitute's judgment had been the other way I should have had great difficulty in overturning it, I think we should adhere upon the merits.

The damages, however, seem to be excessive, and without going into details I would suggest that we should modify the sum awarded to £25, and quoad ultra adhere.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find that the roof of the house in question was defectively constructed, and that the flooding of the house, which is the ground of this action, was directly caused by such defective construction; but find that damage was sustained only to the extent of £25, and to that extent sustain the appeal and alter the judgment appealed from: Quoad ultra dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment appealed from, and decern: Find the respondent (pursuer) entitled to expenses in this Court as well as in the Sheriff Court, and remit."

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
I.

THOMAS STODART, innkeeper in Lesmahagow, raised this action of declarator and removing against John Brown Dalzell, draper there, and his brother, on 4th January 1876. He averred that he had purchased, conform to disposition in his favour, dated 15th June, and recorded 6th July 1874, from a certain Janet Taylor, a triangular piece of ground in Lesmahagow, measuring eleven falls or thereby, but that Dalzell had taken possession of, and refused to remove from, a portion of that ground extending to one fall and fifteen ells. Dalzell defended the action, and alleged that in 1849 William Taylor, Janet Taylor's brother and author, had agreed to c...

vey in feu to Gavin Dalzell, his father, for an annual feu-duty of 4s. 11½d., a portion of the ground in dispute, and afterwards in 1859 this piece of ground was enlarged by several yards, and the feu-duty raised to 6s. He also stated that, on the faith of this promise to feu, Gavin Dalzell, who possessed buildings erected on ground adjoining held by him on long lease, entered into possession of the ground in 1849, and constructed sunk cellarage under part of the ground, and erected a retaining wall, and performed other acts of proprietorship; and the subjects had since been possessed by him and his family, and the feu-duty duly paid to William Taylor and his sister. He further averred that Stodart, who had been for long a resident in Lesmahagow, and was intimately acquainted with William Taylor, was before the purchase in full knowledge of Gavin Dalzell's feu-right, and of the amount of feu-duty payable therefor, and that he was not a bona fide purchaser of the subjects in dispute, and that there was an obligation on him now to grant a title to him as representing Gavin Dalzell.

Stodart v.
Dalzell, &c.

Dalzell pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's authors were under a binding agreement to grant a feu of the ground in question to the late Gavin Dalzell, and his heirs and successors. (2) The pursuer, when he purchased the property belonging to Janet Taylor, having been informed, or at least being well aware, that Gavin Dalzell's heirs held and possessed a portion thereof as a feu, the pursuer's title is subject to the feu-right so agreed to be granted by his authors. (3) The pursuer not being a bona fide purchaser of the subjects described in the summons, and his title being subject to the feu-right agreed to be granted by his authors, he is not entitled to decree as concluded for, but is bound to implement and fulfil the said agreement.

On 15th February 1876 the Lord Ordinary allowed the defenders a proof of their averments, and the pursuer a conjunct proof. The facts, as they appeared from the proof and documents, were as follows:—

Dalzell produced a document in these terms:—"The following is statement of the measurement of ground as feued by Mr Gavin Dalzell, merchant in Abbey Green, being part of the feu at the north end of the feu the property of Mr William Taylor, surveyor in Abbey Green, upon the lands of Peasehill, the property of J. Woodman Linning, Esq., lying in the village of Abbey Green, parish of Lesmahagow and county of Ayr, amounts to one fall fifteen ells Scots measure, bounded as follows:—On the south by the feu the property of the said William Taylor, on the west and north by the public road, on the east by the feu the property of the said Gavin Dalzell.

"Abbey Green, the 26 May 1849."

Appended to this was a diagram of a triangular piece of ground. Stodart admitted that when he purchased the whole subjects he received, among other papers, a duplicate of the above document. Dalzell also produced a number of receipts for feu-duty, commencing in 1849 and continuing down 1874. The first of these receipts was holograph of William Taylor, and in the following terms:—"Received from Mr Gavin Dalzell the sum of 2/6 sterling, as a half year's feu-duty, for one fall and fifteen ells Scotch measure of ground, feued of me, being payment, Whitsunday 1849 to Martmes 1849, at the rate of 3/6 per fall yearly.

"WM. TAYLOR."

None of the subsequent receipts were holograph, but up to November 1863 they were all signed by William Taylor, and from and after 1859 the feu-duty was increased to 6s. owing to Gavin Dalzell having then

William Taylor died in 1864, and the receipts "for feu-duty" after that time were for periods of five years; the one signed by a man Gibb, and the other by James M'Morran, the son of Janet Taylor, William Taylor's sister, on behalf of Janet Taylor, as heir-at-law of William Taylor.

Dec. 16, 1876.
Stodart v.
Dalzell, &c.

Stodart admitted in his evidence that he knew that Dalzell had a right to a portion of the subjects which he had purchased, but he explained that he believed it was only as a yearly tenant. He said he had been told by M'Morran—with whom he had made the bargain for the purchase of the ground—that Dalzell paid 6s. per annum. He also stated that William Taylor had told him that "the Dalzells paid him a rent." The only persons who were present when Taylor made the purchase, besides himself, were M'Morran, and a Mr Hamilton, a bank agent.

Mr Hamilton deponed that before the bargain was made Dalzell's name was mentioned to Stodart as having a portion of the ground, and that Stodart said that part of Dalzell's house was built on the ground. At the time the purchase was made M'Morran handed Stodart the titles to the ground, and among them the measurement above quoted. M'Morran stated that he had told Stodart that that referred to the bit Dalzell had. He added—"I told him that was the bit Dalzell had. He asked what he paid per annum, and I replied '6s.' He said it should have been marked on the bit of paper what Mr Dalzell paid, but he remarked that William Taylor had not wanted to let the man who drew out the plan know what he was receiving from Dalzell." The receipt for the money granted by M'Morran bore to be for the price of lands "as possessed by my late uncle, William Taylor . . . with the existing burdens thereon," but no such limiting words were inserted in the disposition.

On 23d March 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, Finds that on 15th June 1874, when the pursuer obtained a title to the ground, consisting of eleven falls or thereby part of the lands of Peasehill, in the parish of Lesmahagow, mentioned in article 1st of the condescendence, and also on 2d February 1874, when he purchased the said ground from James M'Morran, acting on behalf of Janet Taylor, the proprietor thereof, the defender James Dalzell had right as feuwar thereof, to one fall and thirteen ells or thereby of said ground, being the subjects in dispute, and with reference to which the pursuer concludes for decree of removing against the defenders in the present action, and was entitled to demand and obtain from the said Janet Taylor, as his superior, a feu-charter of the said one fall and thirteen ells or thereby of said ground at the feu-duty of six shillings a year: Finds that on said dates respectively when the pursuer obtained said title and made the said purchase, he had notice of facts and circumstances sufficient to inform him that the defender had right, as feuwar, to the property of the ground in dispute, or at least that the pursuer had notice of facts and circumstances sufficient to impose on him the duty of inquiring as to the defenders' right, and that he designedly abstained from making such inquiry as would readily have informed him thereof: Finds that in the circumstances, while the pursuer has right to the ground embraced in the title produced and founded on by him, he is barred from maintaining against the defenders any right to the ground in dispute beyond the right of superiority, and is not entitled to decree of removing as concluded for. Assolziez the defenders from the conclusion for decree of removing, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, and remits," &c.*

Dalzell, &c.

arish of Leamnahagow of about eleven falls in extent, at the price of £25, and the present dispute refers to one fall thirteen ells of this ground situated at its northern boundary. Taking the price paid by the pursuer as the criterion of the value of the disputed ground it is worth somewhere about £3, and it is certainly to be regretted that a litigation like the present should have been carried on about so trifling a subject. The repeated suggestions made to the parties to come to an amicable settlement of the case have been met by the difficulty that the expenses of the litigation are now so much greater than the value of the objects in dispute as to have become really the material question in the case, and the parties having been unable to settle their mutual claims on this account the case must be disposed of on its merits.

"The defenders claim right to retain possession of the disputed ground in virtue of an agreement of feu which they allege was entered into between their late father and the late William Taylor a number of years ago. They do not dispute the pursuer's right to the ground within his title from Janet Taylor, William Taylor's sister, but they maintain that the pursuer is bound to recognise their agreement of feu of the small portion in dispute in respect of the knowledge which he had when he obtained his title, and separately, when he made his purchase.

"It is clear that in a question between the defenders and their father, their predecessor, on the one hand, and Janet Taylor, the seller, and her late brother on the other, there was a binding contract of feu entered into so far back as 1849. The measurement or diagram of the ground prepared and exchanged between Taylor and the defender's father bore expressly to be a 'measurement of ground as feued by Mr Gavin Dalzell.' Possession was given in 1849, and the ground was thereafter used in connection with the adjoining property belonging to Mr Dalzell. Buildings, consisting of walls, staircases, and outhouses, were erected within the ground, and payment of feu-duty was made year after year, in return for which receipts were granted as for feu-duty at first by Taylor, and after his death on behalf of his sister. In an extension of Dalzell's building beyond the boundary of his former property part of it was erected on the ground in dispute. It is thus clear that a contract of feu existed in a question with Janet Taylor, and that its existence is proved by the writings and actings of the parties.

"When the pursuer purchased Taylor's property, consisting, as already stated, of thirteen falls, the land purchased was described in the receipt for the price, dated by M'Morran, and which embodied the contract entered into as 'part of the lands of Peasehill as possessed by my late uncle William Taylor . . . with the existing burdens thereon.' It is clear that this purchase gave the pursuer title to the disputed ground only, under the burden of the feu-right. The ground sold was described by the possession, and the only possession which William Taylor had for many years was that of superior. The dominium had been in the possession of Dalzell, and the right to a feu was an existing burden on the property in a question with Taylor. The seller was, I think, obliged to require words of similar limitation to be inserted in the conveyance to the pursuer's favour, and if that had been done the pursuer could not have created the right which he now maintains. The pursuer, however, got the conveyance prepared himself. It contained no qualification of the description of the subjects or reference to the state of possession, nor to the existing burdens, and it was signed by Janet Taylor without having been revised by any professional man qualified or professing to be qualified for that duty.

"In these circumstances the question has arisen whether, notwithstanding the contract of feu which subsisted between the defenders and Janet Taylor, the pursuer is entitled to eject the defenders from the disputed ground, and to vindicate the property as exclusively his own because the defenders have not a completed registered title. I am of opinion that he is not so entitled, but that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the date when he obtained his was not sufficient to set up a disposition of heritage. Before such an obligation could be set up both parties must be bound. Here there was title, and even at the earlier date, when he made his purchase, as imposes upon him the obligation of recognising the feu-right.

"The case is distinguishable from those which have generally occurred hitherto for decision in this country, and of which Petrie v. Forsyth, 16th Decemr 1874, 2 Rettie, 214, is an instance, in two respects (1) that the dispute is one in which each of the parties claims right to the whole subject of purchase, for the defenders maintain only that the pursuer is bound to recognise the burden affecting his right to a small part of the property; and (2) that the defenders and their author had been in open peaceable possession of the subjects for many years. Without going in detail into the proof I am of opinion that when the pursuer completed his title he was quite aware of the existence of the defenders' claim, and of facts sufficient in law to give the defender James Dalzell right to the feu. It was at this date only that the pursuer acquired right by the force of his title to dispute the defenders' right, for by the contract entered into in February he was bound, as already stated, to recognise the defenders' right. Even, however, in February I am of opinion the pursuer had knowledge of facts sufficient to preclude him from maintaining that he was not bound to recognise the contract of feu. He had been on terms of great intimacy with William Taylor. He knew not only that the defenders were in possession of a small corner of the ground in question, but had been so for many years, that a part of the defenders' property was built on the ground, and that walls and a staircase existed and had existed for many years for the purpose of permanently enclosing the ground and connecting it with the defenders' other property. At the same time a copy of the measurement already referred to was given to him, and part of that measurement, viz., the triangular diagram, was, I am satisfied, directly brought under his notice. The pursuer says he thought all this indicated to him the existence of a yearly tenancy only, but I cannot accept this statement as correct. It was not reasonable to suppose that a careful measurement and diagram would be prepared for a yearly tenancy. Unfortunately Mr Hamilton has very little recollection as to what occurred when the bargain was made, but Mr Moncrieff, though evidently a person quite uneducated and unacquainted with business, states a fact of much significance on the question of the pursuer's knowledge, viz., that when the bargain was entered into the pursuer remarked that the annual payment was not entered in the measurement, because Taylor had not wanted to let the measurer know the amount. This observation shewed that the pursuer's attention had been pointedly called to the measurement, and that he seemed to have some previous knowledge about it. The existence and terms of the measurement itself and the pursuer's knowledge of the long possession of the ground are, I think, sufficient to shew that he was made aware that the defenders were in possession under a permanent right, or a contract for a permanent right. The truth appears to be that he thought the contract, however it might affect Taylor or his sister, was not binding in law on him as a purchaser,—that is, that as there was no completed and registered formal title he would not be bound. Before the title was completed I am satisfied he was fully informed by the defender Mr John Brown Dalzell that he maintained his brother's right to a feu, and there is no doubt that by that time he was fully acquainted with the terms of the measurement.

"In this state of the facts I am of opinion that the pursuer was aware that the defenders were and had been in possession under an agreement to feu; but even this knowledge is not, I think, essential to the defenders' success in this case. If the pursuer was made aware of facts and circumstances which indicated the existence of a right on the defenders' part, he was in fairness bound to make full inquiry, and cannot plead the fact of his having wilfully abstained from making such inquiry, as enabling him now to disregard the defenders' right. At this point of view the length of the defenders' possession in connection with the adjoining property, a feature which has not occurred in the previous reported cases in this country, is of peculiar importance. He was not entitled with nothing to bind the vassal if he had wished to get rid of his feu—there was no writ of his to bind him.¹ There was no evidence of rei interventus sufficient to set up such a right as was here claimed. Nothing had been done which could not be referred to yearly tenancy.² (2) With regard to Stodart's private knowledge of a prior right, there was nothing to put him on his inquiry. He had been told that Dalzell paid rent; he had never heard of its being a feu-duty.

Stodart v.

Dalzell, &c.

Argued for Dalzell;—The holograph receipt by Taylor and the subsequent possession and actings of Dalzell constituted an obligation on Taylor and his representatives to grant a feu-right to Dalzell.³ There was sufficient evidence to shew that Stodart was aware that Dalzell had a right of some sort, and he should have inquired into its nature before purchasing, or else he took the risk.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think both questions are very narrow, and but for the long and decided rei interventus I should have thought it doubtful that a holograph receipt by the granter for one single half years' feu-duty should of itself be sufficient writing to establish a permanent right of the nature claimed.

Here, however, in the first place, the succession of consecutive receipts for feu-duty following on the holograph one to which I have referred, and the nature of the possession, would have been sufficient to establish this feuwar's right against the granter. The right had been constituted, and could have been proved against him. In the second place, I am quite satisfied that the purchaser knew enough to put him on his inquiry. I am quite satisfied from the evidence of Hamilton and M'Morran that they and the purchaser knew that Dalzell had some sort of right. The pursuer asked the question before the purchase, and was told that Dalzell was in possession of a portion of the ground. This was quite sufficient to create an obligation to inquire, and I am inclined to think that he omitted to inquire on purpose. M'Morran had himself granted a receipt for this sum to Dalzell, in name of feu-duty, and must have known the nature of the right. I am not inclined to alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

et, had it stood alone before him, to assume the possession to have been precarious. In the case of Marshall v. Hynd, 18th January 1828, 6 S. 384, Lord Murray recognises the duty of a purchaser in many circumstances making inquiry as to the rights of third parties, and the same view was supported by the law in the recent case of Petrie. In England the law is clear, and based on the principles of equity, equally applicable in this country.—See Holmes v. Howell, 8 De G. Stodart v.
Dalzell, &c.

It would be unfortunate if the idea were to prevail that the public records, looked at by themselves, can in all circumstances be held as conclusive. The case of Lang v. Dixon settled that point otherwise, and many other cases to the same effect have subsequently followed. It would be most inequitable if a man in the full knowledge of a prior right, by merely having his title put first upon record could be in a position to ignore the prior right because it was not a record before his own. It would be allowing him to take advantage of his own fraud.

In this case the first holograph receipt contains enough to constitute a permanent right in the person of the feuar. The right is described as a feu-right, and the payment as a half-yearly one, and that writing is holograph of the superior and subscribed by him. It is true the other and subsequent half-yearly receipts are not holograph, but there can be no doubt they were granted in good faith, and were so received by the feuar, and they followed upon a holograph receipt containing particulars sufficient to constitute a feu-right. Parole evidence is therefore admissible to prove rei interventus following on the right so constituted; and we have abundance of evidence of rei interventus.

If all this had been known to Stodart, how could he have honestly refused to give a title to the feuar? I do not think, however, that there is sufficient evidence to establish that Stodart knew positively how things stood. I do not think he had seen the receipts or knew exactly the position of matters. I do not therefore go so far as the Lord Ordinary on that point. I concur, however, in finding that he was aware of sufficient facts and circumstances to put him on inquiry, and if he had made inquiry he could not fail to have ascertained how matters really stood, and that is sufficient. It is unnecessary to go into the details of the evidence as to this, as the case is so special as to prevent it being a precedent.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, but I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the present is a narrow case in both its branches.

A very important principle of law is involved, which must be preserved entire, and to which, when fairly raised by the evidence in each case, effect must always be given. That principle is, that a singular successor is entitled to be free from the personal obligations of his predecessor, and to take the subject unaffected by any burden not appearing on the title or on the records. But the singular successor has only this right if he was in ignorance of the existence of any obligations or deeds granted by the seller relative to the subject, and if he was in all respects a bona fide purchaser, without notice of any right in a third party or of any circumstances imposing a duty of inquiry.

In this case I think the pursuer was bound to make inquiry. Dalzell was in possession of this ground, and part of his house was even built upon it. The pursuer knew this perfectly; indeed he knew the exact extent to which Dalzell's house was built upon the ground which he was purchasing, and he explains that he knew that it was only a very small part of the house which was built on the ground in question.

But whatever was the exact state of the knowledge of the pursuer, and whatever was the opinion which he might have formed as to the legal right of Dalzell, I think that there is enough proved in this case to bar the pursuer from pleading that he is a bona fide singular successor, and in no way concerned with the mere personal obligations of his author. I think there is enough to make Stodart liable in the obligations of his author, so far as relates to the subject in question. If that be so, then Taylor was certainly under an obligation to grant a feu-right. The receipts and rei interventus proved are sufficient to establish that. The first receipt, which is holograph of Taylor, contains quite enough to define the nature and extent of the feu-right, and the terms on which it was to be held. I think, as in a question between Taylor and Dalzell, Taylor might have been compelled to grant a formal feu-right to Dalzell, and then I think the present pursuer knew enough about the matter to exclude him from now saying that he is a bona fide successor, and has no concern with the bargain between Taylor and Dalzell.

JOHN RAMSAY BISHOP and his father J. T. F. BISHOP as his Administrator-in-Law, Claimants.—Fraser—J. A. Crichton.

CHRISTINA MARGARET DUNCAN AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Rutherford.

Succession—Vesting—"Survivors or Survivor" equivalent to "Others or Other."—A truster directed his trustees to pay the free income of his estate, after deducting an annuity to his widow, in equal portions to his brother and four sisters, and failing them without issue, to the survivors and survivor. He further directed his trustees, on the death of any of his brother or sisters leaving issue, to pay to such issue (and the issue of any predeceasers) the capital sum bequeathed by their parents, so far as that could be done consistently with retaining enough to secure the widow's annuity; and, on the death of his widow, "to take over and settle my whole heritable and moveable means and estate . . . in that in equal shares, upon my said brother and sisters in liferent for their joint use alienably, and the issue of their bodies respectively, whom failing, to the issue of the survivors or survivor in fee." The truster was survived by a widow and his brother and four sisters. His brother and three sisters predeceased the widow, the brother and two of the sisters leaving issue. The remaining sister survived the widow, and died without issue. In a competition for the fee of the share liferented by the surviving sister, it (1) that, although the fee of the shares liferented by the brother and sisters who left issue vested in such issue a morte testatoris, or as soon thereafter as they came into existence, the fee of the share of the last surviving sister, who died without leaving issue, vested only on her death in the issue of her brother and sisters, or their descendants who survived her, as if the words "survivors or survivor" had been "others or other," and that, therefore, as regards this share of the fee, intestacy was excluded; and (2) (diss. Lord Gifford) that the share was vested in such surviving issue per stirpes.

JOHN RAMSAY died in 1843 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, 2^d Division, which he directed his trustees to pay to his widow, Mrs Elizabeth Craighill. 1.

No. 43. Bromfield or Ramsay, a certain annuity, and also to pay certain special legacies. The remaining purposes of his trust-settlement were expressed as follows:—

Dec. 21, 1876.
Ramsay's
Trustees v.
Ramsay, &c.

"Fifthly. I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees to pay the free annual interest and proceeds of my means and estate (under deduction of the annuity and other provisions hereinbefore settled, and the necessary expense of this trust) in equal portions to the said James Ramsay, my brother, Mrs Catherine Ramsay or Finlay, Mrs Jess Ramsay or Young, Mrs Sylvester Ramsay or Duncan, and Isabella Ramsay, my sisters, and that during all the days of their respective lives, whom failing without issue, to the survivors and survivor; declaring always, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the said proceeds and annual interest shall not be assignable or affectable by the diligence of creditors, nor subject to the jus mariti of husbands, but it is of an alimentary nature, and shall be payable to my said brother and sisters on their own respective receipts allienarly.

"Sixthly. I hereby further direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee acting for the time, upon the death of any one or other of my brother or sisters hereinbefore named, to pay to the child or children of such deceased brother or sister in equal portions the capital sum liferent by the parent so deceasing (the issue of such children being entitled to the share of their parent if also predeceased), and that in so far as the same can be done with a due regard to the foregoing purposes of this trust, of which my said trustees shall be the sole judges: And at the death of the said Mrs Elizabeth Bromfield or Ramsay my said trustees shall make over and settle my whole heritable and moveable means and estate, . . . and that in equal shares, upon my said brother and sisters in liferent for their liferent use allienarly, in terms and under the conditions before specified, and the issue of their bodies respectively whom failing, to the issue of the survivors or survivor in fee."

The truster's sister, Mrs Jess Ramsay or Young, died in 1851 without issue.

His brother, James Ramsay, died in 1861, leaving issue.

His sister, Mrs Sylvester Ramsay or Duncan, died in 1863, leaving issue.

His sister, Mrs Catherine Ramsay or Finlay, died in January 1865, leaving issue.

His widow, Mrs Elizabeth Bromfield or Ramsay, died in May 1865.

His sister, Isabella Ramsay, the last survivor of the liferenters, died in 1873, unmarried.

The trustees divided the free annual proceeds of the residue among the liferenters, in terms of the fifth purposes of the trust-deed, first in the proportion of one-fifth to each, and afterwards, on Mrs Young's death, one-fourth to each. On the respective deaths of James Ramsay, Mrs Duncan, and Mrs Finlay, they made payment, in terms of the sixth purpose of the trust-deed, to the children of each of the share of the capital liferented by the deceasing parent, so far as not required to secure the widow's annuity. On the death of the widow they either paid or added the balance of the shares belonging to the families of James Ramsay, Mrs Young, and Mrs Finlay.

On the death, in 1873, of Isabella Ramsay without issue, a question arose as to the disposal of the capital of the one-fourth share of the residue which had been liferented by her.

This multiplepointing was accordingly raised by the trustees.

The first set of claimants were Alexander Culbert Ramsay and others, certain of the children of James Ramsay, Mrs Sylvester Ramsay or Young, an, and Mrs Catherine Ramsay or Finlay, the truster's brother and two sisters who left issue. They contended that vesting had taken place at the death of Mrs Elizabeth Bromfield or Ramsay, the truster's widow, and claimed that the fund in medio should be divided accordingly among the nephews and nieces of the truster who had survived his widow, the issue of those predeceasing the widow succeeding to their parents' shares.

Ramsay's
Trustees v.
Ramsay, &c.

The second claimant was John Ramsay Bishop, great-grandson of the truster, and his heir-at-law, who contended that the destination of the share of the truster's estate liferented by the truster's sister, Isabella Ramsay, had failed with regard to the fee, and, therefore, that the fund in medio must be held to have fallen into intestacy. Accordingly he claimed so much of the fund in medio as consisted of heritage.

The last set of claimants were Christina Margaret Duncan and others, certain of the grandchildren of Mrs Sylvester Ramsay or Duncan, one of the truster's sisters whose parents had survived the truster's widow but predeceased the liferentrix, Isabella Ramsay. They contended that vesting had been postponed till the death of the liferentrix, and claimed a share in the fund in medio as vesting in them in their own right and not in their parents.

The Lord Ordinary, on 25th March 1876, pronounced an interlocutor finding "that, according to the sound interpretation of the fifth and sixth purposes of the testamentary trust-deed of the late John Ramsay the parties who are entitled to the fee of the share of the trust-estate liferented by the late Miss Isabella Ramsay are the issue of the truster's brother and sisters who survived the truster and afterwards died leaving issue," and appointed the cause to be enrolled for further procedure.*

The claimant, John Ramsay Bishop, reclaimed, and argued;—The destination was, in the event, which occurred, to the issue of the brother and sisters of the testator, who survived the liferentrix, Isabella Ramsay. As the testator's brother and sisters all predeceased Isabella Ramsay it necessarily followed that the destination lapsed, and that the share in question fell into intestacy.¹

Argued for the claimants, Alexander Culbert Ramsay and others;—The presumption was against intestacy. "Survivors or survivor" was undoubtedly an inaccurate description requiring construction or explanation. But it clearly meant, according to the intention of the testator, to include the brother and the other sisters who should leave issue, and was

* NOTE.—According to the conception of the fifth and sixth purposes of the trust-deed there might be two periods at which the fee of the estate should be divided among the heirs. The last of these is the death of the truster's widow, which event the burden of her annuity was extinguished, and the estate so as undivided was left free for distribution. But, as the Lord Ordinary reads the clauses referred to, the vesting was not postponed till that period. On the contrary, that took place at the death of the truster; and consequently 'the issue the survivors or survivor,' who are referred to at the close of the sixth purpose of the deed, are the issue of the brother and sisters by whom the truster survived. This view of the destination, which appears to the Lord Ordinary to be a reasonable view upon the words of the deed, not only prevents the intestacy contended for by the claimants John Ramsay Bishop and another, but also avoids the difficulty inseparable from the construction, which, on the assumption that the death of the widow should be found to be the period of vesting, was presented by the other claimants as the true interpretation."

therefore equivalent to "others or other." There was therefore no intestacy, and the fund in medio vested at the death of the widow.¹

The claimants, Christina Margaret Duncan and others, adopted so far the argument of the claimants, Alexander Culbert Ramsay and others, but contended that the fund in medio did not vest until the death of the liferentrix, Isabella Ramsay, because then only could it be ascertained that she died without issue.

At advising,—

LORD ORMIDALE.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has found that the issue of the truster's brother and sisters who survived the truster and afterwards died leaving issue are entitled to the fund in dispute; and he explains in the note to his interlocutor that he has come to this conclusion on the assumption that the vesting must be held to have taken place a morte testatoris.

I cannot concur with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the period of vesting was the death of the truster. I am unable to see how this can be held consistently with the truster's directions. He directs in the fifth purpose of his settlement that the income of his estate, after meeting his widow's annuity, shall be enjoyed in equal portions by his brother and four sisters; and in the sixth purpose he directs that on the death of his brother or any of his sisters the capital of the sum or sums the income of which had been liferented by the deceased deceasers shall be paid in equal portions to their issue. In this way the truster disposes of the sums—capital as well as income—so far as pertaining to his brother and sisters, who died before his widow, leaving issue.

He then goes on to dispose of what might remain of his estate at the death of his widow by directing his trustees to make over and settle the same upon his brother and sisters—meaning, of course, such of them as had not previously died—in liferent for their liferent use alienably, and "the issue of their bodies respectively, whom failing, to the issue of the survivors or survivor in fee." Now although this direction is awkwardly expressed I think the intention of the truster may be fairly held to have been, that while his brother and sisters surviving his widow were to enjoy the liferent of that part of his estate not disposed of prior to his widow's death, the capital of their respective shares was to go to their issue (including grandchildren by that expression, as I understand it) surviving the longest liver of them,—that is, as the event happened, surviving his sister Miss Isabella Ramsay.

The result is that, in the view now explained, the capital liferented by Miss Isabella Ramsay must be held to belong to the truster's brother's and sisters' issue per stirpes, and not per capita, who survived Miss Isabella Ramsay.

I have come to this conclusion on the assumption that vesting of the trust estate, so far as it is here in question, did not take place either at his own death or at the death of his widow, but on the death of Miss Isabella Ramsay, the last survivor of his brother and sisters, as till that event it could not be known whether there would be then alive any issue of the truster's brother and sisters, and neither could it be known till that event whether Miss Isabella Ramsay might not herself leave issue.

I have only to add that the conclusion I have come to is the only one which, in my opinion, could be reached consistently with the terms of the trust.

at which I am satisfied was neither contemplated nor intended by the testator.

Dec. 21, 1876.
Ramsay's
Trustees v.
Ramsay, &c.

LORD GIFFORD.—The Lord Ordinary by the interlocutor under review has disposed of only one point arising in the case. He has found that the share of the trust-estate liferented by the late Miss Isabella Ramsay belongs in fee to the issue of her brother and sisters who survived the trustor and died leaving issue, but he has not determined by the interlocutor whether the whole of the said issue are entitled to participate, or at what date such issue are to be sought, or in what proportions the division is to take place. In particular, he has not determined whether issue who may happen to have predeceased either the widow, Mrs Ramsay, or the liferentrix, Miss Isabella Ramsay, have taken any vested right in the fee of what is called Isabella Ramsay's share.

In these circumstances we thought that it would not be a satisfactory course simply to affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor (assuming we agreed with him so far), but that it was necessary, or at least expedient, to consider and determine more precisely than the Lord Ordinary has done the exact nature of the rights created by Mr Ramsay's settlement, and to fix precisely the parties in whom the said rights are now beneficially vested, and with this view we had an additional argument from the parties.

In his note the Lord Ordinary has indicated an opinion that the whole residue of the trust-estate vested a morte testatoris in the issue of the testator's brother and sisters, but he has not made any finding to this effect in the interlocutor beyond the general finding that such issue are entitled to the fee of Isabella Ramsay's share.

I am not prepared to affirm with the Lord Ordinary that the whole residue of the trust-estate vested a morte testatoris. On the contrary, I am of opinion that upon a sound construction of the trust-deed and codicil different periods of vesting are fixed for the different shares into which the residue of the trust-estate is divided, and that it is necessary in determining the question of vesting to consider the precise position of each share.

The testator was survived by his widow, Mrs Ramsay, by one brother, James Ramsay, and by four sisters, Mrs Jess Ramsay or Young, Mrs Sylvester Ramsay or Duncan, Mrs Catherine Ramsay or Finlay, and Miss Isabella Ramsay. By the trust-deed the interests of the widow and of the testator's brother and sisters were all limited to mere liferents—to liferents alienably. Neither the widow nor the brother and sisters were to have any share of the fee of the trust-estate, and it appears to me that in determining the questions regarding the vesting of the different shares of the fee the mere liferents, that is, the liferents alienably, and most of which are declared alimentary and not assignable, may be set entirely out of view. In particular, I think even the widow's liferent may be disregarded, for besides her liferent of the house in Blacket Place and of the annuity, she was really merely an annuitant, and the mere existence of an annuitant, apart from any special provisions in the trust-deed, does not prevent vesting. Of course while annuitants or liferenters survived this might prevent the final division of the estate, but the period of vesting must be determined by the terms of the deed, and will not be necessarily postponed by the existence of liferenters or annuitants.

The provision in the trust-deed upon which the vesting of the fee depends is the sixth purpose, which is in these terms,—“Sixthly, I hereby further direct and appoint my said trustees or trustee acting for the time, upon the death of any one or other of my brother or sisters hereinbefore named, to pay to the child or children of such deceased brother or sister, in equal portions, the capital sum liferented by the parent so deceasing (the issue of such children being entitled to the share of their parent if also predeceased), and that in so far as the same can be done with a due regard to the foregoing purposes of this trust, of which my said trustees shall be the sole judges, and on the death of the said Mrs Elizabeth Bromfield or Ramsay my said trustees shall make over and sell my whole heritable and moveable means and estate, including that conveyed to me by the disposition and assignation by the said Mrs Elizabeth Bromfield or Ramsay herein in part before recited, and that in equal shares, upon my said brother and sisters in liferent, for their liferent use alienarily, in terms and under the conditions before specified, and the issue of their bodies respectively, whom failing, to the issue of the survivors or survivor in fee."

Trustees v.
Ramsay, &c.

This sixth purpose of the deed is expressed in some respects in very peculiar terms, and it raises questions of some nicety as to the vesting.

As already mentioned, the testator died on 31st August 1843, survived by his widow, his brother, and four sisters. Of these the testator's sister, Mrs Young, died first, in April 1851, leaving no issue, and on this event the liferent of the surviving brother and three sisters was increased under the fifth purpose of the deed, each survivor being then entitled to a liferent of a fourth of the residue instead of a liferent of a fifth. As Mrs Young left no issue, the fee of the share liferented by her, I think, simply accresced to and increased the share of the surviving brother and sisters.

In 1861, 1863, and 1865, the brother, James Ramsay, and two of the sisters Mrs Duncan and Mrs Finlay, died, all leaving issue, and on their deaths respectively the shares of the residue liferented by them became divisible among their respective children (so far as the trustees might think proper, having regard to the subsisting liferent and annuity of the widow). I am of opinion that the shares of the residue belonging to the issue of James Ramsay and of Mrs Duncan and Mrs Finlay vested a morte testatoris, or as soon thereafter as any of them and their issue respectively came into existence, in each case vesting in the issue as a whole, though not payable till the parent's death. This practically disposes of three-fourths of the whole residue which vested in the families of James Ramsay, Mrs Duncan, and Mrs Finlay respectively, payable on the deaths of their parents respectively, so far as could be done consistently with the security of the widow's annuity and liferent.

The widow next died on 22d May 1865, and, I think, the only effect of her death was to enable the trustees to pay to the issue of James Ramsay, Mrs Duncan, and Mrs Finlay, the balance of the three-fourths of the residue which had previously vested in these issue respectively, and thus there was left in the trustees' hands only one-fourth of the residue, being the one-fourth then liferented by the surviving sister, Miss Isabella Ramsay. Of this fourth Miss Isabella Ramsay had only a liferent alienarily.

Now, the fee of this fourth, that is, the fourth liferented by Miss Isabella Ramsay, was destined under the sixth purpose to the issue of her body, and it is only on the event of her having no issue of her body that other substitutes are called. She was then unmarried, and as in the eye of the law her having issue of her body was a possible and uncertain event, I think that the fee of her share did not vest till her death on 17th February 1873, on which event the unvested

the condition was purified for she died without issue. I think, therefore, that the fee of Isabella's share vested at her death on 17th February 1873, and vested in and then only, in the substitutes called by the deed. The substitutes called by the deed, failing Isabella's own issue, are the issue of the survivors or survivor, and as Isabella herself was the last survivor, if this were to be read as meaning that issue should take unless Isabella's brother or sisters should survive her, it would produce intestacy. But, I think, intestacy is excluded by the construction of the deed, and therefore, I am compelled to read "survivors or survivor" as if the words had been "others or other." I think it clear that the testator intended, failing the issue of any of his brother or sisters, to give the fee to the issue of any others who might leave issue, and as the parties directly substituted are issue I read the provision just as if it had run in favour of "my sons or nieces." It would come to the same thing if we were to read the "survivors or survivor" as referring to the survivors of the testator himself. The result is that the fee of the one-fourth liferented by Isabella Ramsay is to be paid to all her nephews and nieces who survived her, and (although this is a somewhat different question) I think they will take per capita and not per stirpes. If they take in their own right, and not as in right of their respective parents. If Isabella's nephews and nieces predeceased her, leaving issue, such issue take their parent's share, the vesting being at Isabella's death on 17th February 1873. The word "issue" is a general word which includes grand-children as well as children in cases like the present. The direction given to the trustees to make over and settle the residue on the widow does not, I think, make any real difference as to the fee of the share, which was the only share the fee of which had not vested prior to the widow's death. If the trustees had so settled Isabella's share they must do so in the precise terms of Mr Ramsay's trust-deed, and that would be exactly the same question which now arises. As to the effect now explained, and decrees of preference in conformity with the will, I think, enable the trustees, who are the pursuers and real raisers of the fund, to distribute the residue now in their hands.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred generally, holding, however, with Lord James, that the fund was divisible per stirpes and not per capita.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor complained of: Find that, according to the true construction of the fifth and sixth purposes of the testamentary trust-deed of the late John Ramsay, the parties who are entitled to the fee of the share of the trust-estate liferented by the late Miss Isabella Ramsay are such of the issue of the brother and other sisters of the truster or their descendants who survived the said Isabella Ramsay, and that per stirpes: Find the parties to this discussion entitled to their expenses out of the trust-estate, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary with power to decern for the expenses now found due, and decern."

Brodie received three payments on certificates, and Mr Shiells, architect, granted a fourth certificate on 15th September 1874 in the following terms:—"Imperial B.A.—65 George Street, 15th Sept. 1874.—I hereby certify that Mr William Brodie has executed such portions of the joiner work Imperial Building Association, Leith, as entitle him to payment of 4th instalment, amounting to the sum of five hundred pounds (£500). R. THORNTON SHIELLS."

Mr Brodie failed to obtain payment from the association, and pressed by Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, who had supplied with the wood for his contract, for payment of certain bills, he assigned the debt due by the association to him to Ferguson, Davidson, and Company by the following letter written on the certificate:—"Edinburgh, 10th October 1874.—Messrs The Imperial Building Association, Prince Regent Street, Leith.—Gentlemen,—I request you to pay to the order of Messrs Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, Leith, the sum of five hundred pounds sterling, as per annexed certificate granted by R. Thornton Shiells, Esq., architect, whose receipt shall be binding on your obedient servt. Wm. Brodie." The assignment was intimated to the association before 5th November 1874. Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, on 16th December 1874 received a letter from Mr Garson, the agent of the association, stating that the association was being wound up, and "there will be ample funds to meet the whole claims of parties when the conveyances are taken up."

On 27th January 1875 Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, with the concurrence of Mr Brodie, raised an action against the association and the individual members, and obtained decree in absence for £500, interest and expenses. Upon this decree they charged Mr Robert Thornton Shiells as a member of the association.

Mr Shiells brought the present suspension of the charge mainly upon the ground that "the said William Brodie was, and is himself, a partner in the said association. The affairs of the said association are in an embarrassed condition, and its assets are not sufficient to meet its liabilities, with the exception, moreover, of the present complainer, and one or two others."

the whole individual members of the association are insolvent. The share of the deficit in the funds of the said association falling to be paid by the said William Brodie, and due by him to the said association and the present complainer, is largely in excess of the sum charged for." Dec. 22, 1876.
Shiells v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.

In April 1875 Brodie's estates were sequestrated.

The complainer pleaded;—2. He was not liable, in respect that Brodie was due to the association as a partner thereof a sum in excess of the sum sued for. 3. In any view, the chargers have no title to sue for the said instalment—(1) in respect that the sum was not validly assigned to them, and (2) that any mandate granted in their favour was recalled by Brodie's sequestration.

In the course of a proof Peter Couper, judicial factor on the estate of the association, stated that on 11th March 1875 the assets were valued at £4616, 16s. 1d., and that the liabilities were £8045.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the first place, finds as matter of fact that value was given by the chargers to William Brodie for the draft, order, or mandate referred to on the record; in the second place, finds as matter of law that the said draft, order, or mandate is such a document as entitled the chargers to sue for the sum decerned for in the decree sought to be suspended, and having been granted for value was not recalled by the subsequent sequestration of Brodie's estates;—therefore repels the third of the pleas in law for the suspender; in the third place, finds further, as matter of fact (1) that the said William Brodie, the granter of the said draft, order, or mandate, was a partner of the Imperial Building Association, to which that document was addressed; (2) that the £500 covered by the said draft, order, or mandate was due by said association for work done for them by the said William Brodie; (3) that before said draft, order, or mandate was intimated, that is to say, before the 15th of October 1874, the affairs of the said association had become embarrassed, and the said association, for want of funds, had become unable to meet their obligations as these ought to have been discharged; (4) that in March 1875 the affairs of the company were placed in the hands of Peter Couper, accountant in Edinburgh, as judicial factor appointed by the Court for the purpose of liquidation; (5) that, according to the estimate of the value of the assets of the association made by the judicial factor for the purposes of this action, as contrasted with the debts of the association, calls or contributions from the partners will be required that funds with which their obligations can be discharged may be provided; and (6) that it has not been shewn, and is at present uncertain, whether the calls or contributions leviable from the said William Brodie will exceed or fall short of the sum due to him for work done by the association; and, in the fourth place, finds as matter of law (1) that calls or contributions leviable by the said association from the said William Brodie for the discharge of the debts of the association may be set off against the debt due to him by the association, and consequently against the £500 covered by the said draft, order, or mandate, of which the chargers are now in right; and (2) that as the affairs of the company are only now in course of liquidation, and it is uncertain whether there is any sum which the chargers, as in right of the said William Brodie, are entitled to recover from the said association, and from the suspender or one of the partners, all the questions on which parties have joined issue in this suspension cannot at present be determined: Therefore sists the process hoc statu, reserving, however, leave to the suspender, as well as to the chargers, to move that this sist shall be recalled when the mutual liabilities of the said William Brodie and the said association shall have been or can be definitely ascertained: Finds no expenses of process hitherto incurred to be due either to or by either the suspender or the chargers, and decerns." *

The chargers reclaimed.¹

After the case had been argued the complainer was allowed to put in an amendment, and the chargers to put in answers.

The complainer stated—The association was, on 2d October 1874, via the mandate or order above referred to was granted in favour of the chargers, insolvent and unable to meet its liabilities, and at that date, in consequence of several of the partners being persons of no means, William Brodie's liability amounted to the sum of £605, 17s., including the sum of £75, being the amount due on the three shares held by him.

Along with his amendment the complainer lodged a state of affairs of the association as at 2d October 1874, shewing that the assets of the association amounted to £4574, 10s. 3d., the liabilities to £8209, 13s. The liabilities were made up of sums due to the bank, to six tradesmen, the architect, and the law-agent, who were all members of the association.

The chargers stated—"The chargers do not know, and do not admit that the affairs of the association were, at 2d October 1874, or are, in the position stated, nor that the statements made with regard to individual members thereof are accurate. Quoad ultra denied; and explained that the chargers do not admit that the state of affairs referred to embraced the assets of the association, or correctly represents the payments that had been made by it. Inter alia, the chargers believe and aver that the value of the three tenements at Prince Regent Street, Leith, set down in the said state at £4500 sterling, is under-stated to the extent of at least £500 sterling; and further, that Mr Anderson, one of the creditors of the association, received payment of at least £160 more than is mentioned in the said state as having been paid to him. Explained farther that the state of affairs now produced shews the deficit in the funds of the association on the footing that the whole creditors of said association were not paid in full; and that, even upon the assumption that the said state of affairs and the suspender's statement are correct, it appears that Brodie was a creditor of the association as at 2d October 1874 to the extent of £1120, and liable as a member thereof in the sum of £605, 17s., leaving a balance due to Brodie of £514, 3s. sterling. Mr Brodie's alleged liability to the association in £605, 17s. was, however, illiquid and not ascertained in October 1874, and depended upon contingencies: neither the association nor the complainer gave any notice to the chargers that they had any claims of compensation against Brodie till the present.

* "NOTE. . . .—The third, and here the most important, of the pleas of the suspender is to the effect that Brodie is due to the association, as a partner, a sum larger than the £500 claimed by the chargers. Brodie was a partner, and, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, there is no doubt that against the debt, which originally was due to Brodie, there might be set off whatever was due by Brodie to the association. But it unfortunately happens that the mutual liabilities of Brodie and the association have not yet been ascertained. The affairs of the association are only in course of liquidation, and in the mean time it is impossible to say, unless conjecturally, whether there is or there is not due by Brodie, as a partner of the association, a sum as large as that which is claimed by him as a creditor of the association. In this predicament, the Lord Ordinary considers that it would be unsafe to give judgment at present upon the point in question, and therefore the cause has for the present been sisted. This, the Lord Ordinary thinks, is the only course by which possible, or rather probable, injustice will be prevented."

 to abstain from taking action against Brodie." Dec. 22, 1876.
Shiells v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.

The chargers admitted at the bar that the figures given by the complainant were substantially correct.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—William Brodie, the cedent to the chargers, was a builder in Edinburgh, and a member of a company of unlimited liability, called the Imperial Building Association. The business of this association was to acquire building-ground, build houses on it, and then sell them. Another object was to find employment to its various members. Brodie got a pretty extensive contract from this company—the slump sum which he was to receive being £2520. He got into embarrassment before his work was completed, but it appears that in producing the architect's certificate he had received certain sums to account from time to time, amounting in all to £1700. Brodie was indebted to the chargers, Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, for timber with which they had supplied him, and being unable to pay their account he assigned to them a certificate obtained from the architect, Mr Thornton Shiells, dated 15th September 1874, which bore "that Mr William Brodie has executed such portions of the joiner work, Imperial Building Association, Leith, as entitle him to payment of 4th instalment, amounting to the sum of five hundred pounds (£500)." The way in which this assignation was effected was by Brodie addressing a letter to the association requesting them to pay the amount to the order of Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, and it seems that this order was given almost immediately, for there is a correspondence upon it commencing on the 15th October immediately after. At all events it was intimated by 5th November 1874. If a building association had been prosperous no difficulty, I suppose, would have arisen about making this payment; but when a charge was given on 11th November 1875 it was suspended, on the ground that the association was insolvent, and that every partner would be called upon to contribute his share. This is stated in the 6th reason of suspension—"The said William Brodie was and is himself a partner of the said association. The affairs of the said association are in an embarrassed condition, and its assets are not sufficient to meet its liabilities. With the exception, moreover, of the present complainer, and one or two others, the whole individual members of the association are insolvent. The share of the deficit in the funds of the said association falling to be paid by the said William Brodie, and due by him to the said association and to the present complainer, is largely in excess of the sum charged for." The complainer being Mr Thornton Shiells, who was one of the members of the association against whom this charge was directed, the Lord Ordinary came to the conclusion that, if that were the fact, the association, and Mr Shiells, a member of it, were entitled to resist the demand made, on the ground that Brodie was not to relieve the association, and that that claim could be set off against the £500 due to him; and further, that this claim was good against Brodie's assignee. The Lord Ordinary therefore resisted procedure, "reserving, however, leave to the complainer, as well as to the chargers, to move that this case shall be recalled on the mutual liabilities of the said William Brodie and the said association which shall have been or can be definitely ascertained." It occurred to the Court, on the leading counsel on the reclaiming note, that the evidence was hardly sufficient to justify the course adopted by the Lord Ordinary. It might be that Brodie was due to the association sums exceeding that which the association owed him, but it might also be that at the date of the assignation he was not due to the association a sum in excess of what it owed him, and it might therefore be doubtful whether the claims of the association were good against Brodie's assignees or not.

We therefore allowed an amendment of the record, to shew that Brodie was under an obligation of relief to the association at the date of the assignation exceeding that which was due to him. The result of the amendment and admissions enables us to see how that matter of fact stood. The result is, that at the date of the assignation the liabilities of the association exceeded its assets by £3635, and very few, if any, of its members were able to contribute anything.

The question comes to be—Was Brodie liable to relieve the complainer to an amount not far short of or equal to the amount charged for? I am of opinion that he was, and that therefore the complainer is entitled to hold the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The principle is that an assignee is liable to all pleas competent against his author when the assignation was made. A claim emerging subsequently has never been held competent to be pleaded against the assignee, but the assignee is certainly liable to all pleas maintainable against his author at the date of the assignation.

LORD DEAR.—The aspect of this case when first heard before us was this: Brodie was a member of the Imperial Building Association, which had employed him to build three tenements in Leith on the usual condition that the cost should be paid by instalments, according to certificates granted by the architect. On 15th September 1874 Brodie obtained a certificate from the architect, entitling him to payment of £500, being the value of the work which he had then executed. It was the right conferred by this certificate which he made over to Ferguson, Davidson, and Company. The debt for which he made it over was contracted for materials used in building the tenements of the association; and when the claim of the assignees was intimated and payment demanded, it was given on the representation of the agent of the association that, if legal measures injurious to the credit of the association were not resorted to, it would be enough to pay everybody. Assuming this to be the whole case, it appeared to me that Ferguson, Davidson, and Company had a strong equitable claim to payment from the association, and that it was a nice question whether the general rule that an assignee can only use the right of his cedent would have been applicable and sufficient as an answer to the claim.

But an amendment to the record has been allowed and made, which materially alters the aspect of the case. It appears that the liability of the members of the association is unlimited. It further appears from the state of affairs of the association, as at the date when the assignation was intimated, that Brodie was not only member of the association entitled to payment for work done on the tenement in question. He was the contractor for the joiner work only. There were other tradesmen, members of the association, who had done work for it to a large amount—the builder, ironmonger, glazier, plasterer, plumber, and also some of whose outstanding accounts exceeded that of Brodie, and all of whom held certificates from the architect giving them just as much right to payment as Brodie had, and the architect had granted a certificate in his own favour for £94, which also remained unpaid. They were all themselves employers or in hand, and parties employed on the other; they all held liquid documents No. 44 debt, and were themselves all liable personally for these and other debts of an association. In that state of matters I cannot resist the conclusion arrived by your Lordship.

Dec. 22, 1876.
Shiells v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.

LORD MURK.—When this case first came before the Court it was pleaded, on the part of the chargers, that whatever might be the position of Brodie as regards his right to recover against the association, the fact that he was a member of and in debt to the association could not operate against his assignees. Now, all that was then alleged was that at the date of the charge the association was insolvent, and Brodie their debtor; but there was no distinct statement that Brodie was debtor to the association at the date of the assignation, and it was not admitted on the part of the chargers that he was indebted to the association even at the date of the charge. In this state of matters it was arranged that there should be an amendment of the record in order to bring out how these facts stood. That has been done, and it seems now to be admitted that Brodie was indebted to the association at the date of the intimation of the assignment in about the amount of the sum charged for. In these circumstances the question arises, whether the claim of the assignees is met by the plea of compensation. From the correspondence it appears that the chargers dealt privately with the association, and gave them some delay in October 1874, being assured by the agent of the association that they would get payment of their debt, and if it could be shewn that they were prejudiced by their giving up there should have been a special plea to that effect. But there is no such plea. If, therefore, a charge had been given on 15th October 1874 instead of the following year, the same question would have arisen, and the allegation in the affairs of the association were then in such a state as to shew a balance against Brodie would, I apprehend, have been a relevant defence, at all events against any claim at his instance to the extent to which he was a debtor to the association. And I do not think that his assignees, as the facts now stand stated, can be held to be in any better position, for there was plainly a concurrence of debtor and creditor prior to the date of the intimation of the assignation. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interpretation is right, and should be adhered to.

AND SHAND.—The law applicable to this class of cases is shortly and lately stated by Mr Bell (2 Com., M'Laren's ed. p. 131)—“The right to pursue passes against assignees if once vested in the cedent by a proper course before assignment. But if a debt be assigned and the assignment made before the counter debt arises, the concurrence is prevented, and there is no compensation.” The view taken by the Lord Ordinary in the present case accordance with the law thus stated.

It appears that Brodie obtained from the architect a certificate, bearing that he was a creditor of the association for work executed under his contract to the amount of £500. The property of the association consisted of two blocks of houses valued at £4500, but burdened with a debt of £4800. The residual assets were trifling, while sums were due to the bank and to other creditors, some of them members of the association, which brought the actual state of matters to be a deficit of £3635. The architect's certificate did not put him in any better position than that of other creditors, as, e.g., other tradesmen who had supplied goods to the association, the price of which had become

Shiells v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.

due. When he presented his claim the association were bound to pay. But the answer of the association is, "We have no funds; the solvent partners must contribute; and you must contribute money to meet part at least of your own claim as well as to pay the other debts of the association. For this purpose there is a larger sum due by you than to you, or, at least, the amounts are equal." This raised a clear case of compensation, and, to the extent to which Brodie was bound to contribute, the debt is extinguished. The assignee cannot take a higher right than the cedent, and a "proper concurrence" had taken place at the date of the assignation.

It is true that Ferguson, Davidson, and Company supplied a great deal of wood used in the erection of the buildings which belonged to the association, but they did so under a contract with Brodie, and on his personal credit. When they took from Brodie an assignation to his claim under the certificate of security of the payment of his account due to them they had to ascertain for themselves the value of the security obtained, and could acquire no higher value than he had. Immediately on the claim for payment under the certificate being made the plea of compensation arose, and was a good answer. If the state of the facts had been so far different that the association after the intimating the assignation had gone on trading or building, and in this way had by subsequent operations raised up a claim against Brodie, the result as regards the claim would have been different. If the assignation be intimated "before" the counter debt arises the concurrence is prevented, and there is no compensation. But that is not the state of the facts. The counter debt, or liability in contribution on the part of Brodie, had arisen at the date of the assignation. Brodie's claim, whether made by himself or his assignees, was thus properly barred by the plea of compensation.

THE COURT adhered.

Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson.

Patent—Interdict.—The patentee of a tool for expanding the ends of boiler tubes in the flue-sheet claimed in his specification "the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, viz. the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth." The expanding instrument was described as "a tapering plug, or equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube." The manufacturer against whom interdict had already been obtained for infringement invented a new tool in which the rollers were fixed at an angle with the axis of the tool converging towards a point, so as to make the whole tool of a conical shape, and expansion was effected by screwing the tool into the tube without any expanding instrument or divergence of the rollers. In a petition and complaint for breach of interdict held (diss. Lord Deas) that there was no infringement.

On July 4th 1873,¹ Richard Dudgeon, patentee of a tool for expanding the ends of boiler tubes in the holes of the flue-sheet, obtained interdict against William Thomson, engineer in Glasgow, who had been using a similar tool, which he had patented. In 1873 Thomson went into

Dudgeon v.

Thomson and

Donaldson.

Dudgeon presented this petition and complaint for breach of interdict against Thomson and Donaldson, alleging that the new tool was also an infringement of his patent.

Dudgeon in his answers stated that the new invention was substantially different, Dudgeon's tool having effected the expansion by means of rollers parallel to each other, which were made to diverge and press apart the tube by a tapering plug driven in among them, whereas the new tool was a conical instrument all of one piece, in which the rollers moved at an angle with the axis of the tool, and the expansion was effected by screwing the whole tool into the tube.*

Donaldson stated the further defence, that the interdict was not personally directed against him.

The Court remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary in terms of A. S. c. 11, 1828; and he after taking evidence reported the cause.

The import of the proof, so far as material, appears in the opinions of the Judges.

Deciding,—

PRESIDENT.—This is a petition and complaint for breach of interdict.

Dudgeon's specification as amended by a disclaimer and memorandum of amendment, filed on 28th May 1875 bore to be for "improvements in apparatus for expanding boiler-tubes," as set forth:—

The object of the invention is to enable the ends of the boiler-tubes to be expanded in the holes in the flue-sheet. Previous to this invention it has been customary to expand the ends of tubes by an expanding tool composed substantially of a series of swages radiating from a common centre, and caused to diverge by the use of a tapering plug driven into the centre of the tool by the repeated use of a maul or sledge.

The principle of the invention which constitutes the subject-matter of this patent is to expand the tube by rolling the metal by the application of pressure to the interior of the tube, so that the metal is extended by rolling it in distinction to the old system of driving it outwards by hammering, and as the operation can be operated by hand the use of mauls or sledges and all the expenses that attend their employment are dispensed with.

The roller expanding tool for general use is constructed by preference as shown at figures 1, &c. . . . In this case the tapering plug is simultaneously forced inwards between the rollers, and turns upon its axis by the application of the hands of the operator to a wrench or spanner D fitted to the head of the tool, and the rollers a, a, a, are caused to turn by the frictional contact of the surface of the plug with their surfaces, so that the series of rollers are caused to roll within the end of the tube, and are at the same time caused to diverge by the turning and entrance of the tapering plug.

Another form of roller expanding tool is represented at figures 6 and 7 of the accompanying drawings. In this example three rollers, a, a, a, are used, instead of being made solid are bored out and arranged to turn loosely upon a common axis, e, so that they may diverge when the expanding plug C is turned round in between them.

In the above described modifications of the roller expanding tool rollers are provided with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube), and with a stock or holder by which the rollers are prevented from twisting sidewise as they are turned round in the tube. It is claimed therefore as the invention to be secured by letters-patent is, the application in an expanding tool of the following implements, viz., the rollers, the stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth."

No. 45.
Dec. 22, 1876.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson and Donaldson.

The interdict was granted by Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, and we affirmed his judgment on the 4th of July 1873. The interdict was to prevent the respondent from infringing a patent held by the complainer. The patentee Dudgeon had obtained a patent of a certain invention for improving the apparatus used for expanding boiler tubes, and it was alleged in the suspension and interdict that the respondent Thomson was using a tool substantially the same as the described and claimed in the patentee's specification. We thought that the objection was well founded, and therefore we adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. It may be worth while by and by to recall the nature of the infringement which was then complained of. But, first, we must have a distinct view of the invention described and claimed. Since the interdict was granted the patentee has lodged an alteration and disclaimer in addition to his specification, but I do not think that alteration at all affects the merits of the question before us. The specification may be improved, but the nature of the invention and claim remains unaltered.

The object of the invention is to enable the ends of boiler-tubes to be expanded where they enter the flue-sheet. There is no doubt that previously the ordinary mode of effecting this purpose was very rough and unsatisfactory. The ends were expanded by putting in a series of swages radiating from a common centre, and then causing them to diverge by means of a tapering plug driven in by the blows of a heavy hammer. In contradistinction to that method the complainer's invention expands the tubes by rolling pressure. Pressure is applied by rollers to the interior of the tube and so it becomes expanded. This is a simple and obvious idea. The only difficulty was to find a good mode of accomplishing the expansion by means of rollers, and accordingly the patentee does not claim as his invention the substitution of rolling for hammering. Probably it would not have been safe to do so. He is careful to shew that he does not intend to monopolize the right of expanding by means of rolling, but he claims a certain mode of effecting that object. Accordingly he describes what he considers the best arrangement of the parts of a tool of this kind, though he does not confine himself to that arrangement, and in the end he tells distinctly what it is that he claims. It is "the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements viz., the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth."

Now, in order to expand a metal tube by rolling, it is necessary not only that the rollers should turn on their own axis, but also that they should be pressed strongly against the sides of the tube. Without that they would have no effect in expanding it. Therefore a double action is necessary, rolling and pressure. The way in which the patentee proposes to accomplish this double action is to have the rollers so adjusted that they can be made to diverge from the axis of the tool, and so press against the inner sides of the tube, and in order to enable them to diverge he suggests a certain mechanism. The rollers must be so adjusted in the roller stock as to be capable of being pressed outwards, and for that purpose they are to be fitted in radial slots, — that radial slots are an essential part of the invention, but that is one mode suggested by which the rollers may be made to diverge from the axis of the tube. The patentee suggests another mode, a spring ring fitted in a ring groove in the roller stock, and so bearing on the rollers as to hold them in position when pressed outwards against the interior sides of the tube. That is presented as a good substitute or equivalent for the radial slots, and the patentee does not confine himself to one or both of these plans or any other adjustment; provided the effect is the same, namely, to make the rollers capable of being made to diverge, it is equally within what he claims as his invention.

But then, what is to be the active power which is to cause the rollers to diverge? It is described as a tapering plug which is inserted in the centre of the tool, and its effect as it is gradually worked into the tool in the centre of the rollers is to cause these to diverge and work in the radial slots or on the spring so that they are pressed outwards from the axis of the tool and against the interior of the tube. That is the entire implement, and it is plain that to work the tool satisfactorily there must be a combination of rollers so adjusted to be capable of being pressed outwards, and a tapering plug which will have the effect of pressing them outwards gradually as the metal of the tube expands.

But again the patentee does not confine himself to a tapering plug as the only active instrument which can accomplish the divergence. He suggests that there may be equivalents. He does not say what these are, but he does say in the above description "a tapering plug, or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube." It is plain that whatever the equivalent may be it must have one thing in common with the tapering plug, it must act upon the rollers so as to force them to diverge and press against the inside of the tube.

Now, the tapering plug or its equivalent has two actions. I have hitherto described its action in pressing out the rollers, but it has also a rotatory action, which it communicates to the rollers, and so at the same time that it causes the rollers to diverge it also makes them rotate on their own axis, and so accomplishes the purpose of rolling the metal tube. The patentee describes his invention as a combination of rollers, a roller stock, and an expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth." Now, what are we to understand by that? Is it not that the rollers are to be made to diverge from the axis of the tool, and press against the interior sides of the tube, and that the expanding instrument is to have the effect of making them so diverge and press. It is impossible to read the patent otherwise. That being our opinion in granting the interdict was that Thomson was using a tool of that description, not indeed exactly the same, but substantially the same, a veritable imitation.

Now the question comes to be whether the tool used by Thomson since the interdict also falls within the combination, which is the only thing patented by the plaintiff. Now, the tool is certainly different in some remarkable particulars, and the question is, whether the variation is sufficient to take it out of the patent. In the first place, the rollers are not made to diverge from their position. It is not therefore by means of such divergence that they are made to press against the interior sides of the tube. It follows that for Thomson's tool a tapering plug is not only not required, but out of place, and, not only so, but an equivalent for it such as is suggested by the patentee is equally out of place. The means by which the rolling of the metal is accomplished is not divergence of the rollers but a different means, and one not contemplated by the patentee. No doubt Thomson uses rollers, and to make them available for rolling the interior of the tube he is obliged to use a roller stock on which they are fitted. It appears to me that with these two points the things which the tools have in common come to an end. The rollers are fitted in a different way, and for a different purpose, and they act in a different way. Thomson's tool in its best form has also a plug or centre which may be also said to be a point in common. But it is not a tapering plug, and it is not a plug by which the rollers are forced out, and therefore it is not intended to serve the one great object of the tapering plug in the patent. It is merely for the purpose of communicating a rotatory motion to the rollers.

The manner in which Thomson effects the great object of pressure against the interior sides of the tube is entirely different. The construction, shape, and contour of the tool is quite different. The tool is skewed or tapered, to a certain extent conical in shape, and its effect is that when it is put in at the end of the tube it works itself in by a rotatory motion communicated by the hand outside, and it becomes gradually drawn, or as some witnesses express it, swallowed into the tube. The effect is that the rollers being skewed as well as the roller stock, the metal is gradually rolled out, first by that part of the tool whose circumference is the smallest, and so gradually to a greater extent until the expansion is complete. Again, whereas the patentee's tool is stationary, Thomson's tool is necessarily in constant motion, as it feeds itself into the tube. It is by that gradual forward motion that the pressure is accomplished.

The difference between the two may be further illustrated by remarking that Thomson's instrument in all its essential qualities may be used without a plug at all,—not indeed so beneficially, but still with all its distinguishing characteristics,—by screwing in the roller stock itself into the tube. Such a tool was produced to us, and the patentee admitted that he could not complain of it, but that the one thing which is said to make the tool complained of identical with the patentee's is, that each has a plug, although in the one case it serves a different purpose altogether from the other.

If, then, the patentee is not entitled to claim all modes of rolling metal, he is forced to the conclusion that this tool is not the combination which he has claimed, but a different one for the same object, and that it is no infringement of the patent.

LORD DEAS.—I concurred in the observations which your Lordship made on the occasion of granting the interdict on 4th July 1873 (11 Macph. 863). I and your Lordship were all then of the same opinion with the Lord Ordinary, and I refer to the observations then made, and which I adopted as applicable to Mr Thomson's tool as it was manufactured by him at that time. But Mr Thomson has subsequently set himself with great ingenuity to attempt a farther variation of his tool, with the view of removing the objections to which it was then liable as an infringement of Mr Dudgeon's patent. The question is, has he been successful in that attempt?

I do not intend to go into all the details, which have been clearly stated to your Lordship. But I have great difficulty in holding that Mr Thomson has got himself out of the objections. The combination claimed by Mr Dudgeon is distinctly stated in the end of his disclaimer, where he says,—“In the above described modifications of the roller expanding tool rollers are combined with a tapering plug (or its equivalent), by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube, and with a stock or holder by which the rollers are prevented from twisting sidewise as they are turned round in the tube. What is claimed therefore as the invention to be secured by letters-patent is, the combination of the roller expanding tool of the following implements, viz., the rollers, roller stock expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth." No. 45.

The complainer plainly does not confine himself to a tapering plug as his expanding instrument. He says a tapering plug, or its equivalent, and, accordingly, he explains that what he claims is "the rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument," operating in combination. Now, in Thomson's tool, as your Lordship has distinctly stated (and I quite agree in that statement) there are rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument. This I conceive would be conclusive against Mr Thomson were it not that in the passage above quoted from Mr Dudgeon's disclaimer, when describing the modifications of his tool as introductory to his claim, there occur, after the words "tapering plug, or its equivalent," the additional words (which are not in the claim itself) "by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube." Dec. 22, 1876.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson and Donaldson.

Your Lordship, if I have followed your reasoning rightly, has come to the result that because in Thomson's new tool the expanding instrument does not force the rollers outwards in the tube the new tool is not an infringement of the patent.

In one sense, according to Mr Bramwell, the rollers may be said to be forced outwards in Mr Thomson's tool; but I am not sure that I follow Mr Bramwell sufficiently to rely upon his view on that point, and I take the case therefore upon the footing that there is a variation in this respect between the two tools, and that consequently the words particularly referred to by your Lordship do make a difficulty. It is that variation, I think, which forms the sting of the matter in the view of your Lordship. On the whole however, I am disposed to think that this variation is a colourable difference only. Mr Thomson's tool plainly does not accomplish the purpose in precisely the same way as Mr Dudgeon's tool does. It does not perhaps force out the rollers in the same way and manner. The necessity of doing that is obviated by Mr Thomson's rollers being fixed at the one end than the other, so that the pressure is produced by the expanding instrument going forward and, as your Lordship has expressed it, getting allowed in the tube. This difference, however, sounds much more formidable in words than it appears when you take up and look at the two instruments together. The principle of both appears to me substantially the same, and, to a man of Mr Thomson's skill, I think the one mode of producing the result would naturally suggest the other. I do not say that that would be enough. Mr Thomson was entitled to study Mr Dudgeon's tool, as it is plain enough he did, and to vary it as to get out of the position of an infringer if he could. But I do not think he has succeeded in producing anything more than a colourable imitation.

The decision which I understand your Lordships are to pronounce renders it necessary to consider the consequences which might have attached to a breach of the patent had my view been adopted. But I may say that I should in that case have considered a nominal sentence sufficient to vindicate the authority of the Court, the complaint being really only an appropriate form of trying the merits of the question.

MR. MURK.—This is a nice and delicate question, as almost all questions relate to patents of this description are; but after giving the matter the best consideration in my power I have come to the conclusion that the petitioner has failed to shew that there has been an infringement of his patent.

No. 45.

Dec. 22, 1876.
Dudgeon v.
Thomson and Donaldson.

The first point for consideration is what was the invention claimed in the disclaimer of Mr Dudgeon, that is, in the second specification? and it appears to me that in this specification he does not claim every kind of mechanism by which tubes are rolled out by interior pressure. I think that this is plain upon the terms of the specification itself; and it is also, I think, made pretty clear, by the fact that the object of this disclaimer was to exclude one or two other modes of expansion by means of rollers which had been before included in the patent, under the apprehension apparently that the patent might be held to be invalid if it claimed those modes, or every mode, of expanding tubes by roller pressure from the interior. After so disclaiming these modes, and referring to the other system of driving the tube outwards by hammering, for which the application of pressure rollers is to be substituted, the specification goes on to describe the mode in which that is to be done, and the principal feature in the description appears to me to be by the divergence of the rollers outwards by means of what are called "radial slots." Thus, in the disclaimer, it is stated,—“The journals, e, e, are also held in radial slots, which permit the rollers to move outwards from the centre of the stock. In this case the tapering plug is simultaneously forced inwards between the rollers, and turns upon its axis by the application of the hands of the operator to a wrench or spanner D like to the head of the plug C, and the rollers a, a, a, are caused to turn by the frictional contact of the surface of the plug with their surfaces, so that the ends of rollers are caused to roll within the end of the tube, and are at the same time caused to diverge by the turning and entrance of the tapering plug.”

There are thus two things here particularly specified, viz., the use of radial slots, and of a tapering plug, the object of these radial slots being to enable the rollers to diverge or move outwardly; and it is distinctly stated in the specification that the series of rollers are caused to roll in the tube, and then caused to diverge by the turning and entering of a central plug. Now, this divergence of the series of rollers by means of the tapering plug, as fully explained in the evidence, appears to me to be an essential feature of the patent. For the tapering plug goes in, these rollers are made to diverge or press out at a particular spot where the instrument is fixed, and it is by the forcing out of the rollers through the operation of these radial slots that the expansion of the tube is effected.

Then upon turning to the claim it further appears to me that this divergence of the instrument is what is specially in view. For the claim bears—“In the above described modifications of the roller expanding tool rollers are combined with a tapering plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the rollers are forced outwards in the tube), and with a stock or holder by which the rollers are prevented from twisting sidewise as they are turned round in the tube. What is claimed therefore as the invention to be secured by letters-patent is the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, viz., rollers, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth.”

There is, I think, in this passage a difference between the words “expanding tool” and “expanding instrument.” “Expanding tool” is the expression used with reference to the whole three things in combination; but what is specified as the expanding instrument is the tapering plug, which can only act as an expanding instrument in the case where there are radial slots or some thing equivalent to them, which enables the rollers to diverge. That is, I think substance of what is claimed ; for the gauge which is used in the operation is not distinctly claimed. But although this gauge is not distinctly claimed, it is, as I understand from the evidence adduced, almost always used, because it is necessary, as explained by the witnesses, to keep the instrument fixed at the part of the tube which is to be expanded ; it is only when the tool is so fixed that the tapering plug will cause the expansion of the rollers in the slots at the part of the tube which it is wished to expand.

Now, that being the way in which Mr Dudgeon's tool or instrument is made to work, the instrument which has been shewn to us as having been made in conformity with Mr Thomson's patent appears to me to be different in construction, and also to operate differently, as has been fully explained by your Lordship in the chair, and with that exposition I substantially concur. I have only therefore to add that the main distinction between the instruments appears to me to consist in this, that in the respondents' there can be no divergence of the rollers, as they are fixed in the stock, and there are no radial slots on which they can be made to expand, and no tapering plug. But while the rollers are thus fixed in the stock, they are made narrower at the one end than at the other, and skewed so that the tool is conical, and operates, as I understand it, only when it is in the act of moving inwards through the tube. It must be kept moving inwards, in short, to operate effectually, entering and passing through the tube gradually until the thickest part of the tool has passed into the tube, when the expansion is complete.

On these grounds, and without going further into detail, I am of opinion that the respondents' instrument is different from that patented by the petitioner, both in principle and in the mode of its operation ; and that it is not proved that there has been any infringement of the petitioner's patent.

LORD SHAND was not present at the discussion, and did not take part in the judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find that the complainer has failed to prove that since the date of the interdict mentioned in the petition and complaint the respondents, or either of them, have infringed the complainer's patent for 'improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes :'. Therefore refuse the prayer of the petition and complaint, and decern : Find the complainer liable in expenses," &c.

Process—Expenses—Extract Decree—Interest.—Held (by Lord Curriehill) in conformity with Dalmahoy and Cowan v. Mags. of Brechin, 21 D. 210, that interest runs upon an interim decree for expenses when the decree has been extracted and charged upon.

Outer-House.
Ld. Curriehill.

ON 27th February 1866 Robert Wallace raised an action concluding for £2000 in name of damages for breach of agreement against James Henderson, Esquire, of Bilbster, in Caithness. He also concluded for count and reckoning as to the rents of certain subjects belonging to him, which the defender had intromitted.

On 11th January 1867 the Lord Ordinary (Kinloch) reported the case on issues to the First Division, and of that date the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that there are not on record averments relevant or sufficient to warrant the issues proposed by the pursuer: Remit the Lord Ordinary to dismiss the action in so far as regards the first conclusion for £2000, and to proceed with the other conclusions of the action: Find the pursuer liable to the defender in expenses since the date of the closing of the record, and remit," &c.²

Mr Henderson lodged his account, had it taxed and approved of, and the expenses were extracted and charged on the decree. Wallace did not pay the expenses, and the action fell asleep.

On 12th October 1874 Wallace, with the concurrence of his wife, rethe action of count and reckoning with regard to the rents of the subjects against Mr Henderson. No. 47.

The Lord Ordinary (Young), on 4th March 1875, sustained the defender's motion for his alibi pendens, in respect of the former action being still in progress, and dismissed the action, with expenses. Dec. 22, 1876. Wallace v. Henderson.

The First Division, on advising a reclaiming note on 20th July 1875,¹ held the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and sustained the action as a reclaiming note with regard to the rents from and after the date of the signing of the summons in the first action, with £5, 5s. of expenses.

The second action was subsequently remitted to the Lord Ordinary's consideration, in which the former action was pending. Wallace had died before the reclaiming note in the second action was lodged. His widow was the executrix-dative to him, and as such, after the first action had been decided, was sisted in both actions.

The causes were then put to the roll by Mrs Wallace to have them called.

The defender opposed this motion, on the ground that no step could be taken in the first action until the expenses found due in the Inner-House of Session in May 1867 had been paid, with interest, and relied on the case of Struthers v. Dykes, June 16, 1846,² where payment of such expenses was held to be a condition precedent to going on with the action. He maintained that he was entitled to interest upon the amount of expenses decreed in the extracted decree.³

The pursuer contended that Struthers v. Dykes had never been followed as a precedent, and argued that at all events, as the defender could have obtained Wallace upon his failure to pay when charged he had no right to insist. It was also maintained that the pursuer was entitled to deduct five guineas of expenses to which she had been found entitled by the First Division in the second action from any payment made to the defender in name of expenses.

The Lord Ordinary, on the authority of the case of Struthers v. Dykes, Macmahoy and Cowan v. Mags. of Brechin, refused to conjoin the two actions until the expenses decreed for in the first action had been paid, with interest, but under deduction of the five guineas decreed for in the first instance in the second action.

The pursuer thereupon paid the expenses, with interest, but under deduction of £5, 5s. decreed for on 20th July 1875, and the causes were again conjoined.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, or any other inferior Court. (4) Generally, an action being raised against a judicial functionary in respect of matters arising in the course of his judicial functions and for alleged damages as a consequence to arise, is an incompetent action, and the statements therein are not relevant to infer the conclusions.

The Sheriff-substitute (Galbraith) and Sheriff (Dickson) assented to the defender.

The pursuer appealed.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that this action is not maintainable. It has been settled by a series of judgments in this Court and in England against an action of this kind the privilege of a Judge is absolute. No Judge is irresponsible, but no Judge is responsible for acts done in his judicial capacity in an action of damages. I adopt the judgment of Lord Chief Baron Martin in *Scott v. The plea which ought to be sustained is the 4th.

General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. sec. 162—Projection of buildings beyond the line of a street.—Kennedy was proprietor of a house forming the north-west corner of Church Street and Church Square, Fort-William. As originally built this house stood back some feet from the line of the adjoining house, below which the British Linen Company, and had a small plot of ground in front of it about 11 feet long, separated from the street by a low railing fixed on a curb stone. Kennedy proposed to pull down the front wall of his house and advance it to the site of the railing in front, which projected beyond what beyond the line of the adjoining premises.

The Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Fort-William, founding section 162 of the General Police Act, 1862,* gave notice to Kennedy that they required him in rebuilding to keep the new front wall of his house in a line with that of the adjoining house. Certain statutory provisions took place before the Sheriff on the subject, but there being some doubt as to its regularity the commissioners presented an ordinary petition for interdict against Kennedy in the Sheriff Court at Fort-William. This petition the Sheriff (Ivory) refused.

Fraser v.
Kennedy.

On appeal it was maintained (1) that section 162 of the statute by implication applied to the case of houses the front wall of which retreated on the line of the adjoining houses; and (2) that it applied just as much to the railing in front of the respondent's house as to the front wall of the house itself; and that as soon as the respondent commenced alterations on the line of his railing, which projected beyond the line of the adjoining house, the commissioners were entitled to require him to set it back to the line, otherwise the provision of the statute would, in such a case as at present, be entirely abortive.

The Court held that the section of the statute founded on did not apply to the case, as there was no old building taken down which projected in front of the buildings on either side, and as the railing was not a "building" in the sense of the statute.

Settlement—Constructive Residence.—A, who was a farm servant, had had a residential settlement in the parish of X prior to Whitsunday 1866. At that date until 12th April 1875, when he became chargeable as a pauper, continued tenant of a house in the parish of X, where his family resided, supported by him, under the charge at first of an unmarried sister (his first wife being dead) and afterwards of his second wife. He himself was (with the exception of periods of six months each in 1867-68, 1871, and 1874-75, during which he was employed in the parish of X and personally resided there) employed on farms in neighbouring parishes on which he personally resided, visited his family at his own house in the parish of X regularly every fortnight, and was more frequently, as the exigencies of his employment permitted, that he had retained his residential settlement in the parish of X.

The question raised in this action was whether Gordon Webster, a farm-servant, who at Whitsunday 1866 had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of St Fergus, had retained that settlement down to 12th April 1875, when he became chargeable as a pauper. Webster was born in the parish of Lonmay. He came to the parish of

From Whitsunday 1866 down to the date of chargeability he was, with the exception of three periods (viz., Martinmas 1867 to Whitsunday 1868, Whitsunday to Martinmas 1871, and Martinmas 1874 to Whitsunday 1875), engaged on farms in neighbouring parishes on half-yearly engagements.*

Jan. 10, 1877.
Cruickshank
v. Greig.

The farms in neighbouring parishes on which he was employed during this period were from two to six miles from his house in St Fergus. During these engagements he resided on the different farms, going home to his house in St Fergus regularly every fortnight from Saturday night to Sunday night, and sometimes oftener. During the three periods of his employment in the parish of St Fergus he resided in his own house in that parish. His first wife had died before Whitsunday 1866. But from Whitsunday 1866 to July 1873 his house was kept by an unmarried sister who took charge of his children. In July 1873 he was married a second time, and from that date down to the date of chargeability his second wife resided in his house in St Fergus along with his children. From Whitsunday 1866 down to the date of chargeability he regularly supported, first, his sister, and then his second wife and his children, by his own labour, both during the time that he himself was living on the farms and during the periods when he was residing in the parish of St Fergus.

An action of relief having been brought in these circumstances by the parish of St Fergus against the parish of Lonmay as the parish of the pauper's birth, on the ground that prior to the date of chargeability the pauper had lost his residential settlement in the parish of St Fergus, the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) held that the pauper had not retained his settlement in the parish of St Fergus, and that the parish of his birth was therefore liable.

An appeal was taken to the Court of Session.

Argued for Lonmay, the parish of the pauper's birth;—It was not of length but the character of a man's absence that was to be considered in determining whether he had lost a residential settlement. Here, though the period of absence had been long enough in duration its character was not inconsistent with constructive residence. The pauper's absence was never continuous. They were constantly broken by returns at regular intervals, and those fortnightly and often weekly, to his own house, the rent of which he was paying and the expenses of which he was defraying. He was in truth merely leaving his house in the exigencies of his employment, returning to it as often as that employment permitted, bringing with him his gains, and spending them in the maintenance, for himself and his family, of a house in the parish. This was therefore a very strong case of constructive residence.¹

Argued for St Fergus, the parish of residential settlement;—At Whitsunday 1871 the pauper had lost the residential settlement which he had acquired prior to Whitsunday 1866 in the parish of St Fergus, because during the five years, Whitsunday 1866 to Whitsunday 1871, he had not resided six months in the parish. The doctrine of constructive residence did not apply to a case such as this, where a man leaving his family in one parish had his own personal residence in another. In such cases ment must go with his own personal residence. It only applied to those whose employment was such that they had no personal home in any other parish, and were here to-day and there to-morrow, as a sailor or commercial traveller, and whose only home necessarily was the place where they left their families, and to which they returned when their employment permitted them.¹

v. Greig.

JUDGE-CLERK.—The facts in this case are that the pauper had acquired a partial settlement in the parish of St Fergus, in which he had resided for many years prior to 1866. After that period, he worked and lived temporarily in several of the adjoining parishes; but he never maintained a domestic establishment in any of them, but retained his house in St Fergus, to which at the end of a week or a fortnight he was in the habit of returning. It is in my opinion, that, in this state of facts, the parish of St Fergus cannot have been freed from the liability arising from the pauper's settlement there. It never was lost or interrupted. The constant personal presence of the pauper is essential to the acquisition and much less to the retention of a settlement, if the man's home was truly in the same place, as here it was.

MR. MURDOCH.—The question to be determined in this, as in most cases of its kind, I think, a delicate one, and not unattended with difficulty. I am, however, to come to any other conclusion than that arrived at by your learned brethren settled by previously decided cases that actual personal residence in the parish for the requisite period is not indispensable either for the retention or acquisition of a settlement therein. What has been called a "constructive" settlement has been in certain circumstances held to be sufficient for that purpose, as in the case of Miles, which was referred to in the argument. The principle of a general nature, and one of great importance, which influences much in this case, is that laid down in the well known case of Adam v. Lough,² in the House of Lords by Lord Chancellor Cranworth, to the effect—"Considering the peculiar nature and object of the poor-laws,—the relief to those unable to maintain themselves,—it is absolutely necessary that we should construe the provisions of the Legislature so as to meet the very social wants of those for whose benefit they are made." Applying this principle to the circumstances of the present case it would be difficult, I think consistently with it, to hold that the pauper here has lost his settlement in the parish of St Fergus. For a period of upwards of thirty years, or, in other words, for nearly the whole working portion of his life, he has had his home in that parish; he was twice married there, and there his wives successively lived; his first wife died; there also his children were born and brought up; and to that parish he himself constantly resorted whenever he could get away from his work when it happened to be elsewhere; and in his evidence he says that he had at any time been taken ill he would have gone to his house in St Fergus. Accordingly, when he was at last taken ill, and disabled from working, he remained there. In short, it is indisputable that although occasionally employed as a farm-labourer in adjoining parishes, the only house or home he had of his own was in St Fergus; and, as I have already said, to that house and home he always resorted whenever he could manage it. He seems besides to have worked in St Fergus when he could get work there, and although he worked when necessary in other adjoining parishes he spent the fruits of his labour in St Fergus.

Looking therefore to the circumstances of this case, as now generally referred to, I have not much hesitation in holding with your Lordship that the Sheriff's judgment appealed against must be altered to the effect of its being found that St Fergus is the parish of the pauper's settlement.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, and upon the same grounds, although I feel this to be a very narrow case. Indeed, naturally, and almost necessarily, cases of this class have a tendency to get narrower, each successive case presented being in advance of and more difficult than its predecessor.

On the question as to whether the residence of the pauper in the parish of his residential settlement was interrupted by non-residence so as to prevent the settlement being retained I cannot hold that there was any discontinuity. The man always had a house in St Fergus and paid rent for it. If his rent was large enough he would be rated for it, and would pay or be liable in poor rates. His family always lived in St Fergus, and he visited them as often as his employment permitted. He at no time had any other residence except a bothy provided by his master. Looking at the history of the man we find he never ~~was~~ for any considerable period of time in one place—he was never long anywhere. His house in the parish of St Fergus was always regarded and must be held upon as his home. It will always be difficult to make out a breach of continuity of residence when the man has all along kept a house in the parish and has no other house anywhere else. His family is there—his lares et penates are there. This pauper never had another home—as one cannot call a bothy a home. I think therefore the Sheriff-substitute is wrong here, and I agree with Lord Ormisdale that upon a popular construction of the statute, where a man's ~~home~~ is his home is, and that is his residence, although he may have to go out of the parish in order to find his work.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the pauper ~~had~~ resided in the parish of St Fergus for upwards of twenty years prior to 1866, and had acquired a residential settlement in the parish: Find that the pauper after that date worked in several adjoining parishes but retained possession of his house in St Fergus to which he returned at intervals of a week or a fortnight, and in which his family resided: Find that these periods of absence on the part of the pauper did not interrupt the continuity of his residence in the parish of St Fergus, or affect retention of his settlement in that parish: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decern, and find the appellant entitled to expenses both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court, and decern," &c.

M'Donalds.

Entail—Marriage-Contract—Reserved Power—Jus Crediti.—By antenuptial marriage-contract a husband settled an estate on himself and his intended wife in conjunct fee and liferent, and on the heirs-male of the marriage, whom failing, the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage, whom failing, on his brothers in coession and their heirs-male, whom failing, on his heirs whomsoever. He, however, reserved a power to entail the estate on the same series of heirs, and on other heirs as he should think proper. He subsequently executed a deed of entail in which he called his eldest son as institute, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, his other sons of the marriage in order and their heirs-male respectively, whom failing, the daughters of the marriage in order and their heirs-male respectively, whom failing, the heirs-female of his eldest son, whom failing, the heirs-female of his other sons and daughters of the marriage, whom failing, the sons of any subsequent marriage and the heirs of their bodies, whom failing, the daughters of such subsequent marriage and the heirs of their bodies, whom failing, his brothers and their heirs-male in order, whom all failing, his heirs whomsoever.

In an action of reduction of the entail by the institute on the ground that the destination to heirs was ultra vires of the entailer as not being in conformity with the power reserved in the marriage-contract, held that the institute had no title to pursue the reduction as by the institution of himself and the heirs-male of his body in the entail any jus crediti created under the marriage-contract to him or his heirs-male was completely satisfied.

Entail—Marriage-Contract—Jus Crediti.—Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk) when a father becomes bound in an antenuptial marriage-contract to convey a fee and estate to the heir of the marriage, with a substituted destination to others, there are two general rules which have been very clearly fixed by decision. The first of these is, that such a destination creates no jus crediti whatever in any member of the destination other than the descendants of the marriage, and that regarding other members of such a destination the father retains the absolute power of alteration and disposal. The second of these is, that if the father during his lifetime propels or conveys the estate so destined to the apparent heir of the marriage, and he accepts of the conveyance, the obligation under the marriage-contract and the jus crediti created by it are satisfied; and even although the conveyance contain an alteration of the destination, no right remains in the substitute to challenge it or set it aside, even in the case of the apparent heir precluding the grantor.

COLONEL M'DONALD raised this action against himself and the surviving 2^d Division. of entail called, for reduction of a deed of entail of the lands of Dalchoshnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, executed by his father, Sir John M'Donald, on 18th July 1837, under the following circumstances. By antenuptial marriage-contract, dated 8th September 1826, Sir John M'Donald (then Colonel John M'Donald), who was fee-simple proprietor of estate of Dalchoshnie, in consideration of their marriage disposed that the estate to himself and his intended wife, Adriana M'Inroy, in conjunct fee and liferent, but for her liferent use alienably, should she survive him, and to the heirs-male of the marriage, whom failing, to the heirs-male of his body by any subsequent marriage, whom failing, to his three brothers in succession to the respective heirs-male of their bodies, whom failing, to his own next heirs whomsoever. In the marriage-contract, however, he reserved the power to execute an entail of the whole or any part of Dalchoshnie, failing, if he thought proper, prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, providing only that in any such entail he should be bound, first, to call to the succession the series of heirs given above and in the order there narrated, and thereafter such other heirs as he should think proper.

Some time after his marriage Sir John purchased the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch adjoining Dalchosnie, and afterwards on 18th July 1837, he executed the deed of entail now brought under reduction.

This deed proceeded on the narrative that he and his wife wished to settle all their estates on themselves and their family, "and failing heirs-male, so far to alter the destination in the marriage-contract with regard to Dalchosnie as to settle it with the other lands, giving his female of the present marriage a preference and priority to heirs-male of any subsequent marriage." Accordingly Sir John disposed the three estates in favour of himself and his wife and the survivor of them in life-rent, and to the following series of heirs in fee, viz., to his eldest son Alastair M'Iain M'Donald (the pursuer), and the heirs-male of his body whom failing, to his other sons, born or to be born of his present marriage seriatim, in order according to their seniority, and the heirs-male in succession of their bodies; whom failing, to the daughters of his present marriage, born or to be born, seriatim, in order according to their seniority, and the heirs-male in succession of their bodies; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the pursuer and the heirs of their bodies; whom failing, to the heirs-female of his other sons of his present marriage, seriatim, in order of their seniority, and the heirs of their bodies; whom failing, similarly to the heirs-female of his daughters as above; whom failing, any sons that might be born of his body in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, any daughters of such subsequent marriage, of his body and the heirs of the body of such daughter or daughters, seriatim; whom failing, to his brothers in succession and to the heirs-male of their bodies; whom failing, to his heirs whomsoever.

Infestment followed upon this deed in favour of John M'Donald and Adriana M'Inroy or M'Donald, his wife, and the survivor in life-rent, and in favour of the pursuer, Alastair M'Iain M'Donald in fee, in Dalchosnie in July, and recorded August 1837, and in Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch in May, recorded June 1838. At this time the pursuer was in pupillage.

This deed of entail was duly recorded in the Register of Tailzies on 11th November 1837. Sir John M'Donald died on 24th June 1866, survived by his widow, who died on 7th November 1872. The pursuer as intestate under the deed of entail entered into possession of the lands so entailed.

This action of reduction was brought on the ground that Sir John M'Donald in the deed of entail as executed had not first called the series of heirs specified in the contract of marriage, but had introduced other persons as heirs-substitute in priority and preference to certain of the heirs in that series.

The summons concluded for reduction of the deed of entail and the decrees which had followed thereon, in so far as they related to the estate of Dalchosnie, and for declarator that the estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, or at least the estate of Dalchosnie belonged to the pursuer in fee-simple.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The entail libelled ought to be set aside, so far as it relates to Dalchosnie, in respect that it was not executed in conformity with the power reserved to Sir John M'Donald by the marriage contract, and was therefore ultra vires of him and inept. (2) The entail being ultra vires and inept as regards Dalchosnie, and the pursuer having right to that estate by virtue of the conveyance contained in the marriage-contract, he is entitled to have that right declared, and to be and possess the lands of Dalchosnie in fee-simple. (3) It having been the intention of Sir John M'Donald that the estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch should be added to and descend along with the estate of Dalchosnie, and the last mentioned estate not having been effectually entailed, the entail should also be reduced as regards Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, and it should be found and declared that the pursuer, the person having right to Dalchosnie, has also right to Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch.

M'Donalds.

His surviving brother and sisters defended the action, and pleaded, inter alia;—The pursuer has no title or interest to maintain the pleas stated, or to insist in the conclusions of the action.

On 10th March 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the pursuer has neither title nor interest to maintain the pleas stated, or to insist in the conclusions of this action: Therefore sustains the preliminary defences of want of title stated by the several defenders, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses to the said defenders—reserving for consideration the question whether and how far the defenders are entitled to the full expenses of separate appearance after the date of closing the record,” &c.*

* NOTE.—(After narrating the destination in the marriage-contract, and the reserved power and the destination in the deed of entail in so far as in favour of the heirs-male of the marriage)—So far it is not disputed by the pursuer the destination in the entail is in entire conformity with the obligation or conveyance in the marriage-contract, as it is in favour of the sons of the marriage in their order, and the heirs-male of their respective bodies,—in other words, in favour of the heirs-male of the marriage. And in particular it must be observed that the institute of entail is the pursuer, Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, who is the first stirps in the destination, the estates being conveyed to him and to the heirs-male of his body. Prima facie, therefore, the pursuer cannot complain of the destination, as he and the heirs-male of his body occupy the precise position in the deed of entail actually executed by Sir John M'Donald which they would have occupied had the deed been expressed precisely in terms of the marriage-contract in all respects.

The entail, however, instead of calling next in succession, after the heirs-male of the marriage, the heirs-male of any future marriage of Sir John, and after his brothers and their respective heirs-male, and his own heirs whom he calls first the daughters of his marriage with Miss M'Inroy in their order, the heirs-male of their bodies respectively; whom failing, the heirs-female of the sons of the marriage in their order; whom failing, the heirs-male of the body of the daughters of the marriage; whom failing, the brothers of Sir John in their order, and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively; whom failing, the heirs-female of their bodies respectively. And the pursuer claims that whereas under the destination in the marriage-contract the heirs-male of his body had a protected right of succession, that right has been interdicted with or postponed in the destination contained in the deed of entail; and maintains that although he is unmarried, he is entitled to protect the interests of such possible heirs-female. He seeks to protect these interests by reducing and setting aside the deed of entail in toto, or at least in so far as the same deals with the estate of Dalchosnie, and by asking decree of declarator that the said estate belongs to himself in fee-simple. It is difficult to see how the interests of the pursuer's possible daughters, which he says are protected by the marriage-contract, will be in any way secured by a decree in this action finding that he is simple proprietor of Dalchosnie. And this consideration alone is, in my opinion, sufficient to shew that the pursuer has no title to insist in the present action. But as the case was not pleaded at the bar on this footing, but was argued on both sides as if the sole question was whether daughters or heirs-female of the pursuer had a protected succession under the marriage-contract, which has

Colonel M'Donald reclaimed, and argued ;—Under the provisions in the marriage-contract a jus crediti was created in the series of heirs there called, and whenever Sir John changed the order of these heirs in the deed of entail he was acting ultra vires, and the deed therefore fell to be reduced. At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the nature of the action)—I am very clearly of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be adhered to. I doubted at one time whether the judgment would not have been more correctly put on the absence of interest on the part of the pursuer rather than on the want of title ; but I have come entirely to concur in the view of the Lord Ordinary, and I am further of opinion that, even if these had been doubtful, the pursuer is not in a position to insist on any such demand at present.

When a father becomes bound in an antenuptial marriage-contract to convey a land estate to the heir of the marriage, with a substituted destination to others, there are two general rules which have been very clearly fixed by decision. The first of these is, that such a destination creates no jus crediti whatever in any member of the destination other than the descendants of the marriage, and thus as regards other members of such a destination the father retains the absolute power of alteration and disposal. The second of these is, that if the father during his lifetime propel or convey the estate so destined to the apparent heir of the marriage, and he accepts of the conveyance, the obligation under the marriage-contract and the jus crediti created by it are satisfied ; and even though the conveyance contain an alteration of the destination, no right remains in the pursuer to substitute to challenge it or set it aside, even in the case of the apparent heir predeceasing the granter.

In this case the complaint by Colonel M'Donald, the eldest son of the pursuer, is, not that he has failed to receive any patrimonial benefit which the marriage-contract secured to him, but that the granter of the deed of 1837 has been interfered with by the destination in the entail, it is necessary to consider that question.

"It is clear that if the entail, after calling the heirs-male of the marriage, to implement of the marriage-contract, had proceeded to call the other heirs, none but the other heirs, who are specified in the marriage-contract, the destination must have been in favour of the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage of Sir John M'Donald, and failing them, the three brothers of Sir John, and failing them, the respective heirs-male in their order of seniority, whom all failing, the heirs-whomsoever of Sir John. But it is undoubted that under the marriage-contract neither the heirs of any future marriage of Sir John M'Donald, nor his brothers and their heirs-male, nor the heirs whomsoever of Sir John, had any jus crediti or any protected right of succession. And there is as little doubt that under the destination to heirs whomsoever of Sir John could the succession be open to the heirs-female of the pursuer. In short, none of the heirs specified in the marriage-contract, beyond the heirs-male of the marriage between Sir John M'Donald, and his wife Adriana M'Inroy, had any jus crediti or protected right of succession ; and the rights of all these parties, as has been shewn, have been effectually secured by the destination in the deed of entail above recited. Being so, I am unable to see what title or interest the pursuer,—to whom the heirs-male of his body, as heirs-male of the marriage, the succession is secured by the deed of entail,—can possibly have to secure to his daughters or to his female, who are not creditors under the marriage-contract, any right of succession to the estate of Dalchosmie.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has failed to shew any title in support of this action, and that the action must therefore be dismissed, with expenses.

and the position of certain of the members of the destination, on whom no jus crediti whatever was conferred, and has given a priority to heirs-female of marriage over the possible heirs-male of any subsequent marriage which he contracted, and over his collateral relations. It is perfectly evident that the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage, had any such existed, would have had no right to challenge this exercise of the granter's undoubted power. He might have omitted them entirely from the destination. It is equally clear that even on his own view the heir of the marriage can suffer nothing by the change.

The pursuer founds on the clause in the marriage-contract reserving power to General M'Donald to execute an entail of the whole or any part of the lands, reading "only that he should call to the succession the series of heirs above named in the order above narrated, and thereafter such other heirs as he shall think proper." He maintains that no entail could be conform to the terms of the marriage-contract in which that order was not strictly observed, and this was a reserved power and required to be executed precisely as it was granted. To the extent of his own interest under the contract this may be true. General M'Donald could not have interposed between the eldest son of the marriage and the heirs-male of his body any of the other members called to the succession. To that extent the order set down in the marriage-contract might be a condition of the power to entail. But beyond that, as the heir of the marriage had no interest in the subsequent order of succession, that order was not a condition of his right; and as regards the members of the destination, he could pretend to no jus crediti under the marriage-contract, the terms of the contract in no respect limited the power of General M'Donald, and the alteration was consistent with the good faith of the marriage-settlement, which is the rule in all such questions. The right of Colonel M'Donald was to obtain a share from his father under the fetters of a strict entail, in which he should be substituted and the heirs-male of his body should be next called to the succession. Beyond this he had no interest whatever in the order of the destination, and certainly none in the position which the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage might occupy in it.

An attempt was made in the argument, although not seriously pressed, to maintain that the heir of the marriage had an interest that the members of the destination should not be enlarged so as to interpose additional lives between him and the possible event of the whole destination being exhausted. It is unnecessary, however, to consider this contention, because it is excluded by the words of the contract itself, the power being to call first the series of heirs above mentioned and thereafter such other heirs as he shall think proper, which left it entirely in the power of General M'Donald to add to the destination as he should think fit. Even without this clause I should have doubted greatly if any such objection in the possible exhaustion of the tailzied line could be held to be within the jus crediti created by the marriage-contract. But as General M'Donald has been called to the destination, but has only altered the order in which the heirs were to take, this question does not arise.

These views, which I suggest in addition to those very clearly stated by the Lord Ordinary, are sufficient to dispose of the case. But although the record contains meagre materials for the view, I should be inclined to hold that even if it were not so the case is entirely in the position of the series of cases, including Routledge v. Carruthers, in which it was found that the apparent heir of the marriage by accepting a disposition during the father's lifetime of a land estate destined to the heir of the marriage and other substitutes by antenuptial marriage-contract, extinguished the jus crediti thereby created, as far as regards the rest of the destination, and that this is complete fulfilment of the obligation created by the marriage-contract. In this case the entail in question was executed so long ago as 1837. The grantor reserved his liferent, and propelled the succession to Dalchosnie and the two other estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Ramsay (in regard to which he lay under no obligation) to Colonel M'Donald his son, and other substitutes under the fetters of a strict entail. Infestment passed on the conveyance, and the entail was recorded in 1838. At that time no doubt Colonel M'Donald was under age. But he came of age several years before the death of his father in 1866, and since that date he has taken up all three estates and maintained his right under the conveyance in every possible way. I should have been of opinion, had it been necessary to decide the point, that he had conclusively accepted of the conveyance as it stood, and that the contentions maintained in this action are entirely excluded.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right.

It is obvious that, so far as the pursuer is individually concerned, his right and interest in the entailed estates in question have not been affected by the difference on which he founds betwixt the deed of entail as executed and the reserved power in respect of which it bears to have been executed. Neither am I able to understand how it can be maintained that the pursuer is entitled to insist in the present action for behoof and protection of heirs called after him to the destination; and certainly it is, as remarked by the Lord Ordinary, an anomalous mode, to say the least of it, of securing and protecting the interests of future heirs of entail for the pursuer to conclude that the lands should be held to belong to him in fee-simple.

The estates in question originally belonged absolutely to the entailor, and he had right to entail them upon any series of heirs he pleased, provided only that he did not interfere with or prejudice the rights conferred by the contract of marriage between him and his wife upon the children of the marriage. The parties alone had any jus crediti or protected right of succession. But it is not to be said, and could not be said, that the rights of the children of the marriage have been interfered with or prejudiced by the entail as executed. And if this be so, the authorities which were cited in the course of the debate are, I think, conclusive against the pursuer. Thus Mr Erskine (b. iii., t. 8, sec. 39), while he states and illustrates his statement by various examples, that settlements in marriage contracts restrain the father from executing "gratuitous deeds to the prejudice of the heir of the marriage," concludes by saying—"As to the remoter substitutes, if the husband contracted, it was with himself alone, and therefore substitution must be accounted a simple destination as to them, which may be altered by him at his pleasure." To the same effect is the statement of Mr Erskine in section 1970 of his Principles, and the cases to which he there refers. In accordance with this doctrine one of the questions in the case of Macdonald v. Cunninghame (20th July 1841, 3 D. 1288, 13 Scot. Jur. 570), cited in the course of the argument, seems to have been decided.

I may add that I concur with your Lordship in thinking that there is no ground for holding that the pursuer has, by taking up the entailed estates in the way he did, precluded himself from founding on his other objections. But I not help feeling that the materials for determining this point are not before me in proper form I do not rest my judgment on it. These are shortly the grounds which have influenced me in coming to the conclusion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

M'Donald v.
M'Donalds.

LORD GIFFORD.—(After stating the conclusions of the summons)—The ground which the pursuer makes this demand is that the deed of entail executed by his father in 1837 was ultra vires of his father, and in contravention of the provisions contained in his father's antenuptial contract of marriage with Miss Inroy, afterwards Lady M'Donald. He pleads that although the antenuptial contract of marriage reserved power to Sir John M'Donald to make a deed of entail, it was provided that such deed should be in favour of a certain series of heirs named in the marriage-contract, whereas the deed of entail actually executed is not in favour of the prescribed series of heirs but in favour of another and a different order of heirs.

I am of opinion that the contention of the pursuer is not well founded. I think that the deed of entail actually executed by the late Sir John M'Donald was entirely within the powers reserved to him in his antenuptial contract of marriage, and that the same is not challengeable on any of the grounds now urged in by the pursuer.

At the date of his marriage with Miss M'Inroy, Sir John, then Colonel Donald, was proprietor of the lands and estate of Dalchosnie, and by antenuptial marriage-contract between him and his wife dated 8th September 1826, in consideration of the marriage, made over that estate to himself and his wedded wife in conjunct fee and liferent, but for her liferent use alienarily in case she should survive him, and to the heirs-male of the marriage, whom failing, to the heirs-male of his body by any subsequent marriages, whom failing, to his three brothers in succession and their respective heirs-male, whom failing, to his nearest heirs whomsoever.

Now, if this provision had stood alone it would have entitled the present pursuer on his father's death to take up the estate of Dalchosnie in fee-simple as heirs-male of the marriage, and the pursuer's father could not have defeated his title by any mortis causa or gratuitous deed.

But the marriage-contract contains an important reservation in these terms—“reserving, nevertheless, full power to the said John M'Donald to execute an entail of the whole or of any part of the lands before mentioned, and that concluding, if he shall think proper, prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, reserving only that the said John M'Donald shall in such entail first call to the heirs-male the series of heirs above mentioned in the order above narrated, and then such other heirs as he shall think proper, and no way defeat or injure the said Adriana M'Inroy's liferent right hereby created in her favour over the lands of Dalchosnie and others during her lifetime.”

It is alleged in exercise of this reserved power, and on the further narrative, inter alia, that he had purchased the two additional estates of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch adjoining to Dalchosnie, and that he and Lady M'Donald wished to take the whole three estates on themselves and their family, “and failing our heirs-male, so far to alter the destination in the marriage-contract with regard to the said Dalchosnie as to settle it with the other lands, giving heirs-male of the present marriage a preference and priority to heirs-male of any subsequent marriage,” John M'Donald executed the deed of entail of 18th July 1837 of the whole three estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch to and in

No. 51. *favour of himself and Lady M'Donald and the survivor of them in life, and to the heirs therein mentioned in fee, viz., the pursuer, the eldest son, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, John, the second son, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, the other sons of the marriage and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, whom failing, the daughters of the marriage successively and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, whom failing, the heirs-male of the pursuer and the heirs of their bodies, whom failing, the heirs-male of the body of the other sons seriatim, then the heirs-male of the body of the daughters of the marriage seriatim, then the heirs-male or heirs-male of any subsequent marriage of the said Sir John M'Donald, whom failing, to the entitled brothers then surviving and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, whom failing, the heirs-male of the entail, whom failing, his heirs whomsoever.*

M'Donald v.
M'Donalds.

Now, the main difference between this destination and the destination mentioned in the antenuptial marriage-contract is, that in the entail actually male heirs-male of the marriage and heirs-male of the sons and daughters of the marriage are called to the succession before the entail's brothers and their heirs and it is upon this difference that the pursuer founds as rendering the whole void as ultra vires of the reserved power contained in the marriage-contract.

I am of opinion, however, that the pursuer has no interest and no right to complain of the entail as actually made. In the first place, the pursuer has evidently no right to complain of the destination of the two estates of Sir John Garry and Kinloch Rannoch, which were acquired by Sir John M'Donald at the date of the marriage-contract. These two estates were not included in the settlement by the marriage-contract at all. No jus crediti or right of any kind in favour of the heirs of the marriage was created by the marriage-contract as to these two estates. These estates were Sir John's absolute property after he purchased them, and he might settle them in any manner he pleased. The pursuer's complaint must be limited to Dalchosnie alone.

But even as to Dalchosnie, I think the pursuer's challenge of the entail is not valid. The variation in the destination in no way prejudices the pursuer. The pursuer himself and the heirs-male of his body are first called to the succession, then his brothers and their respective heirs-male, and it is surely not in the pursuer's mouth to object that the destination is then made in favour of the heirs-male of the marriage, including among others the heirs-male of the pursuer's own body—instead of the succession being diverted, failing heirs-male of the marriage, to the brothers and collaterals of the entail. The reserved power gave the entail full liberty, after his brothers and their heirs-male were called to introduce "such other heirs as he shall think proper." So that if the heirs-male in question had been called at the end of the destination this would have been strictly under the reserved power. I think it is not in the pursuer's mouth to object that the heirs-male are introduced in the destination to the pursuer's uncles.

The alteration is an alteration not against but in favour of the pursuer. It would give the estate to the pursuer's daughter if the pursuer should survive and leave no son. The daughter would otherwise be excluded or postponed.

It is quite fixed that while the provisions in an antenuptial marriage-contract confer indefeasible rights upon the spouses and upon the issue of the marriage yet when there are in such a deed ulterior gifts or destinations over in favour of collaterals of the spouses or of third parties, no indefeasible right is conferred upon or created in favour of such third parties, but a mere express reservation.

 each gift or destination, and revocable by the grantor at any time of the grantor's life. Accordingly I am clearly of opinion that the brothers of Sir John M'Donald v.
 M'Donald, although specially mentioned in the marriage-contract, had no jus M'Donalds.
editi under it, and could not have compelled Sir John M'Donald to make the entail in their favour. In like manner, supposing any of these brothers to be still alive, I do not think they could have challenged the existing entail because it interposes the heirs-female of the marriage before calling them (the brothers) and their heirs-male to the succession. I think it is quite clear that Sir John's brothers had under the marriage-contract a mere spes successionis which Sir John might defeat at pleasure by any gratuitous deed, either inter vivos or mortis causa. Now, if Sir John's brothers who have been postponed to the heirs-female of the marriage, and who are thus undoubtedly prejudiced by having their spes successionis made very greatly more remote, could not object to the deed of entail on this ground or on any other ground, it is difficult to see how the pursuer, who is in no way prejudiced, but on the contrary is benefited by the variation, can be allowed to plead on behalf of his uncles what his uncles could not have pleaded for themselves even if they were now alive and objecting. In a case like the present the interest to challenge and the right to challenge are the same. If there is no interest to challenge then there is no right to do so.
 If, indeed, the pursuer could say that by the entail in question more heirs of entail are created than the entailer had power to introduce or to name, this would be a relevant challenge, for it is plain that the institute of an entail is always entitled to object to the substitutes being multiplied, for this diminishes his chance that by failure of all the substitutes he himself may become fee-simple proprietor. The entailed succession is as it were a burden on the fee-simple succession, and this burden must not be unwarrantably enlarged. It often happens, as it may happen, that even an institute of entail may, by surviving all the substitutes called, and all the special heirs called, become absolute proprietor; for whenever the destination opens to "heirs whomsoever" the entail is at an end.
 If the pursuer cannot say this in the present case, for undoubtedly under the marriage-contract Sir John M'Donald could call by the entail any number of substitutes or any number of heirs he might "think proper" to the succession, and the pursuer has no interest whatever in the order in which they may be placed.
 I agree, therefore, in the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, but I doubt how far the form of his judgment is strictly accurate. He simply dismisses the action for want of title, and this may leave it open to bring any new action. I should have been disposed to have allowed the production to be refused, and thereafter to have granted decree of absolvitor, and not a mere dismissal of the action. I think the pursuer, the institute of the entail seeking to quit of its fetters, has sufficient title to insist on its production, and therefore the defenders are entitled not merely to have the action dismissed, but to decree of absolvitor. Perhaps, however, this is a mere matter of form, and may require any alteration in the form of the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse said note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of, with additional expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report, and decern."

Entail—Entailer's Debts—Prohibition—Irritancy.—The institute in possession of entailed estates came also to be in right of a bond secured over the estates containing a power of sale, which he assigned to third parties. In an action at the instance of the next heir for declarator of irritancy, on the ground that the institute had contravened a prohibition against doing any act whereby the estates might be evicted, by assigning the bond to third parties, who might sell the bond, held (1) that the institute was entitled to keep up the bond as a lien against the estate, and (2) that no irritancy had been incurred by assigning the bond to third parties.

Entail—Clause of Relief—Obligation on Heirs and Successors to Relieve of Debt.—The maker of a deed of entail inserted a clause, binding himself, his heirs-at-law, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve the entailed lands, and the heirs to succeed thereto, of all debts and obligations whereby they might be evicted. He afterwards purchased another estate, and entailed it on the same series of heirs as were called in the former deed, binding himself, his heirs, executors, and representatives to relieve the estate of the grantor's debts, but reserving a power of revocation. At his death the estates under the first entail were burdened with certain entailer's debts. The heirs under the two entails succeeded.

In an action against the institute in possession of both estates, at the instance of the next heir, held that the defender was not, in respect of his having succeeded to the second estate, personally bound to relieve the first estate of the entailer's debts.

Question. Whether the obligation of relief contained in the first entail could be made effectual against the lands held under the second entail.

2d DIVISION.
Lord Shand.

Vide ante, vol. ii. H. L. pp. 28 and 125.

Colonel Alastair M'Iain M'Donald, institute of entail in possession of the estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, and entailed executed by his father, Sir John M'Donald, in 1837, by an Act of the House of Lords on 17th June 1875, was found entitled to a bond for £25,000 held by the marriage-contract trustees of his father and mother over the lands of Loch Garry and Kinloch Rannoch. In obtaining and recording an assignation from the trustees he assigned the bond, which contained a power of sale, to certain onerous assignees, and had advanced the sum of £25,000 to him.

Sir John M'Donald, the entailer, at the date of his death in 1875, was indebted to the Central Bank of Scotland in the sum of £9000. Colonel M'Donald, under the authority of the Court of Session, had placed this sum a charge upon the estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch.

John Alan M'Donald, the next heir of entail in the destination, in this action, concluding against his brother, Colonel M'Donald, (1) declarator of irritancy, and for denuding, &c., of all right, title, and interest in the entailed estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch.

The conclusion for declarator of irritancy and denuding was granted upon the averments that the keeping up of the bond for £25,000 over the entailed lands, and the assigning it to third parties, who might adjudge, and the charging the estate with the £9000, were in contravention of the prohibitions in the deed of entail.

The pursuer founded on a clause in the deed of entail, which contained prohibitions against alienating the estates or incurring debt, and a clause containing this prohibition—"And with and under this prohibition and limitation also, that the said Alastair M'Iain M'Donald the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate, are, and shall be, fully limited and restrained from doing any act and granting any right, directly or indirectly, whereby the said lands and estate before disposed, or any part thereof, may be affected, appraised, adjudged, forfeited, confiscated, or be in any manner of way evicted from the said lands, or Sir Alastair M'Donald, or any other of the said heirs, or this nomination, or the order of succession hereby established, be sold, hurt, or changed, excepting as in the cases before excepted." The operative clause bore—"And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case the said Alastair M'Donald, or any of the other heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, shall contravene the before-written conditions, provisions, covenants, and limitations herein contained, or any of them, that is, shall neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, or any of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be observed and appointed by me, excepting as is before excepted, in any of these cases, the person or persons so contravening shall, whether self only, ipso facto, amit, forfeit, and lose all right, title, and interest which he or she hath to the lands or estate before disposed, and as the said shall become void and extinct, so that the said lands and estate shall survive and accrue and belong to the next heir appointed to succeed, descended of the contravenor's own body, in the same manner as if the contravenor were naturally dead and had died before the contra-was also (2) a conclusion to the effect that Colonel M'Donald, as executor, and as successor to Sir John in another estate Dunalastair, was bound to free and relieve the other entailed estates of £25,000 and £9000 above referred to. This estate of Sir John had been purchased by Sir John M'Donald about 1853, and considerable sums had been expended in improvements and building a new house—the £9000 debt to the bank having been incurred in so doing. Sir John in 1860 executed a deed of entail in favour of himself and Colonel M'Donald, and the same series of heirs as in the entail of of revocation was expressly reserved to Sir John in this deed. The deed contained an obligation binding the granter, his heirs, and representatives, to relieve the estate of the granter's debts. The pursuer contended that, in consequence of an obligation to free the estates contained in the entail of 1837, Colonel M'Donald was bound to discharge the burdens on the estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Kinloch Rannoch out of the proceeds of Dunalastair.

Following was the provision in the deed of 1837 relied on:—"In order to this tailzie and settlement the more effectual I hereby bind and oblige myself, and my heirs-at-law, executors, and successors whomsoever, to relieve the lands and estate before disposed, and the heirs thereof to be named to succeed thereto, of and from the payment and discharge of all the debts and obligations to which I, the said John M'Donald, for myself, or as representing any of my ancestors, are or shall be bound of and from all claims and demands whatever whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be evicted."

The pursuer also averred that Colonel M'Donald, as executor of Sir John, had collected and retained upwards of £3000 of executry funds of Sir John. These funds the defender averred had been exhausted in paying Sir John's debts.

On November 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interdict. He finds that the pursuer has stated no relevant grounds in support of the conclusions of the action for declarator of forfeiture and denuding by the defender in favour of the pursuer of the estates of Dalchoshnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, and assoilzies the defender from these conclusions, and also from the conclusions that the pursuer should be found entitled to be now infeft in the lands, and to delivery of the title-deeds thereof, and decerns: And with regard to the remaining conclusions of the action, finds that it is not disputed that the executry of the estate of the late Sir John M'Donald is liable in relief for the debts mentioned in said conclusion; and in respect the parties are not agreed as to the amount of the executry estates, appoints the defender as executor of his late father, to lodge an account thereof within the next eight days: Further, finds that the defender is not bound to free and relieve the estates of the said debts in respect merely of his having succeeded to Dunalastair as heir of entail and provision of his late father under the deed of entail of these lands of 1860, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons to that effect, but reserving to the pursuer to take all competent proceedings directed against the lands of Dunalastair and the heirs of entail called under the deed of 1860 to have these lands sold in order to free and relieve the lands held under the entail of 1837 of the entailor's debt affecting the same, and meantime to serve all questions of expenses; and grants leave to the pursuer to reclaim against this interlocutor.*

* "NOTE.—This action presents practically two questions for decision: first, whether the defender has incurred a forfeiture of his right to the estates of Dalchoshnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch; and the second, assuming that no forfeiture has taken place, whether the defender is bound to disburden the entailed estates of certain debts of £25,000 and £9000, which now affect them.

"The pursuer maintains the conclusions of forfeiture on two grounds. The first of these is that, in contravention of the entail, the defender has assigned to third parties, in return for money advanced by them, his right to a bond of disposition in security for £25,000 granted by his late father over the estates in favour of marriage-contract trustees, and which has been the subject of discussion in two previous litigations between the parties. It is maintained that forfeiture of the estates also resulted from certain leases which the pursuer granted, but this point was given up in the argument, and the assignment to various creditors of the £25,000 security is now the sole ground on which the alleged forfeiture is maintained. I have no difficulty in holding that the defender is entitled to succeed on this part of the case.

"It cannot be disputed that the debts of the entailor, the late Sir John M'Donald, the father of the pursuer and defender, form a proper charge upon the entailed estates, and may lawfully be made burdens upon the estates by bonds and dispositions in security in ordinary form. The entailor at his death was indebted to the Central Bank of Scotland the sum of £9000, and assumed that there was no executry or other estate to meet this debt, the pursuer does not dispute the right and obligation of the defender to grant the bond and disposition which he executed in security of this debt affecting the entailed estates. The conclusion for forfeiture is not based to any extent on the fact that the defender granted this heritable security. It cannot be disputed that the defender was entitled to charge the estates with entailor's debts which could not be provided for out of his general estate.

"The decision of the case, as regards the alleged forfeiture, thus depends on the question whether the £25,000 security was an entailor's debt, and if so, whether there be any obligation on the defender, in the deed of entail, to discharge the debt, or any provision which precludes him from assigning the debt to other creditors.

"There is no doubt that the debt was due by the entailor. It was not

John Alan M'Donald reclaimed. When the cause was in the Inner-house he amended his summons to the extent of adding a conclusion to re, but the entailor himself, on 13th October 1828, nine years before he executed the entail, which is dated 18th July 1837, granted a bond and disposition in security for the amount in favour of his marriage-contract trustees, from whom he borrowed the money, which was part of his wife's fortune settled by the marriage-contract. By this deed the entailor acknowledged the debt, and granted a disposition in security over the lands, containing a power of sale in common form.

"The defender acquired right to this entailor's debt by assignation in his favour granted by the marriage-contract trustees, in terms of a direction to that effect contained in the mutual general settlement and deed of division by his father and mother, executed on the same day as the entail, viz., on 18th July 1837. It is clear that, in ordinary circumstances, an institute or heir of entail acquiring right to an entailor's debt, and to a security over the estate granted by the entailor, held by a creditor, is under no obligation either to pay the debt or to refrain from assigning it to third parties. If an institute or heir of entail purchases a debt he is in no different position from any other creditor, except that he cannot charge succeeding heirs with the interest becoming due, year by year, during his possession. It was at one time contended that the debt became extinguished confusione, but a series of decisions settled that this was not so; but the estate was practically the debtor, and the heir of entail, as an individual, a creditor—(Bell's Principles, 6th edition, sections 1728 and 1743; Welsh v. Maxwell, 11th February 1837, 15 S., 537, and authorities there cited).

"It makes no difference in the case that the defender acquired right to the security for £25,000 by succession, or by virtue of the provisions of the marriage-contract of his parents, and relative deed of division. So far as the deed of entail is concerned all entailors' debts are in the same position. They are properly chargeable against the estates, whoever may become the creditor, and whether the creditor's title has been derived by purchase or succession. An entail might no doubt provide that an institute, or any succeeding heir, by acquiring the estates, should be bound personally to pay off the entailor's debts, but there is nothing of the kind in this entail, which contains only prohibitory clauses to the usual effect, that is, prohibiting alienation of the estate, or the extinction of debt, by the succeeding heirs; and I think, therefore, there is no ground for the pursuer's contention on this subject.

"The declarator of forfeiture is founded entirely on the provision of the deed of entail; but even if the provisions contained in the deed of settlement and division can be imported into this question, it would make no difference, for it has been settled beyond question by the decision of the House of Lords in the earlier litigation between the parties (Law Reports, Scotch App., vol. ii., p. 482) that that deed imposed no obligation on the defender to discharge the debt, or to refrain from enforcing it. It was there held that he was entitled to a conveyance of the security in favour of himself, and that the expressions in the deed of settlement which the present pursuer pleaded as creating an obligation on him to pay the debt to be discharged were either an expression of a wish merely, which was of no legal effect, or an attempt to adject a condition which was void. The result is, that this provision of £25,000 is in no different position from any other entailor's debt; and that being so, there is no reason for saying that the lender is under restriction as to his power of assigning it, any more than any other creditor would be.

"The alternative conclusion of the summons is founded on the clause contained in the deed of entail of 1837, by which the entailor bound and obliged himself, and his heirs at law, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve the entailed lands, and the heirs to succeed thereto, 'of and from the payment and performance of all the debts and obligations to which I, the said John M'Donald, for myself, or as representing all my ancestors, are or shall be liable, and of and from all claims and demands whatever, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be evicted.' This clause in express and stringent terms binds the entailor and his heirs, executors, and successors to relieve the entailed estate of all his (the entailor's) debts.

"The pursuer alleges that the defender succeeded to free executry estate; he claims that this estate shall be applied, so far as it will go, in extinguishing the debts for £25,000 and £9000 which now affect the lands. The defender does not dispute that if there had been free executry estate he would be bound so to apply it. He explains, however, that there was no free executry. Inquiry into this matter of fact is therefore necessary, and the defender has appointed to lodge an account of the executry, to which the pursuer will have an opportunity of objecting.

"But the pursuer further maintains that the defender is bound to relieve the entailed estate of the entailor's debts, because the defender succeeded as heir to the estate of Mount Alexander, now called Dunalastair, on the death of his father in 1866. This estate was purchased by Sir John M'Donald in 1853, at the price of £22,500; and the pursuer explains that after the purchase his father expended about £20,000 in the building of a mansion-house, and in the policies, and that the debt of £9000 to the Central Bank was incurred as a consequence of this expenditure. The estate of Dunalastair adjoins the estate of the entailor, and is contained in the deed of entail of 1837; and the pursuer explains that it was his father's intention that the house built by him should be the mansion-house for all the estates. The entail of this estate is in favour of the series of heirs as are called by the deed of 1837. It is dated and registered in the Register of Tailies in July 1860, and was conceived in favour of the entailor himself, and the heirs thereafter called, of whom the defender and the pursuer are the male of his body are the first; but the deed contained a reserved power of revocation which might be exercised at any time during the entailor's life.

"It appears to me to be beyond question that, however desirable it may be for the whole series of heirs that Dunalastair and the other estates should continue in time coming to be practically one entailed estate, yet, if the pursuer should insist on it, he is entitled to have the estate of Dunalastair sold, in that the price should go towards the extinction of the entailor's debts affecting the estates contained in the entail of 1837. Dunalastair must be regarded as having been within the power of Sir John M'Donald on the day of his death. He might have disposed of it as fee-simple estate by revoking the entail. It follows that Dunalastair in the same way as the executry was liable for Sir John M'Donald's debts and obligations, and one of these was the obligation contained in the deed of 1837, to free the lands thereby entailed of all the entailor's debts.

"In a proper action to that effect, therefore, I think the pursuer, as heir of entail, would succeed in having Dunalastair sold to meet the debts affecting the other estates. I am, however, of opinion that the present action is not one in which a decree to that effect could be given. The pursuer concludes that the defender, as successor to his father in the lands of Dunalastair, should be decreed to pay the debts which affected the other estates. But Dunalastair is not fee-simple property in the person of the defender. It is entailed, and has been held by the defender as an entailed estate for the last ten years. The defender is not personally liable to disburden the lands held under the entail of 1837 merely because he has taken the other estate as heir of entail under the fetters of the deed of 1860, which is the view presented by the conclusions of the summons, and the pursuer's third plea in law in support of them. The obligation by the late Sir John M'Donald, binding his successors whom the court will no doubt give relief against the lands, but cannot be construed as imposing personal responsibility for the debts on each individual who obtains the lands by right of an heir of entail in possession.

"It has been maintained, however, that at least the defender is bound to take the initiative by a petition to the Court, or by an ordinary action, to obtain authority to sell the estate of Dunalastair, and that a decree to that effect

No. 52.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the nature of the case)—In this case ^{Jan. 11, 1877.}
the Lord Ordinary has repelled the first alternative conclusion of the summons ^{M'Donald v.} irritating the right of Colonel M'Donald to these estates; he has sustained the second alternative conclusion, which is directed as against Colonel M'Donald personally, in so far as regards his character of executor, but he has dismissed the conclusion quoad ultra, reserving to the pursuer to assert his claim against the estate Dunalastair in any competent action. In this case also I am of opinion, although it raises some questions of difficulty, that the views of the Lord Ordinary are correct, and that his judgment should be adhered to.

The conclusion of the summons for declaring the right of the defender to the entailed estate to be forfeited is not attended with any difficulty. The entail did not bind any of the heirs of entail to pay off this debt, and therefore the obligation to pay or discharge it is not within the fettering clauses; but, if it exist at all, is a personal obligation arising outside the entail. It is said that when Colonel M'Donald paid these debts, although he took an assignation to them, they were extinguished confusione; and that conveying them to third parties pronounced in this action. With every desire to avoid the necessity of other proceedings between the parties, I do not think that even to this extent the pursuer can succeed in this particular case. There is no conclusion to the effect now suggested. The only conclusion on the subject and relative plea are based on the view that the defender has become personally liable to pay the debts because he has succeeded to Dunalastair, and it is clear that his limited interest in Dunalastair imposes no such liability. There is no conclusion to have the defender ordained to take proceedings to bring Dunalastair to a sale in any action for that object. It appears to me it would be necessary, in an action with such conclusions, to call the other parties having interest in Dunalastair under the deed of 1860.

It was assumed that the defender could proceed to have Dunalastair sold to pay the entailer's debts by a petition to the Court under the entail statutes; even if the present action were not open to the objection, that it is without conclusion either in form or in substance to that effect, it appears to me that the provisions of the entail statutes are not such as could be made available for sale of the estate. The Rosebery Act, 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 42, throughout contemplates and provides for the case of the sale of a part of the entailed lands only to meet debts affecting the whole, and not the case of a sale of the whole estate to meet the entailer's personal obligations otherwise. The Rosebery Act limits the power of sale to entailed lands other than the mansion-house and offices, and this power would be of no use in the present case, as the mansion-house also must be sold. It seems to me that if the pursuer, any of the heirs of entail, desire to have the lands of Dunalastair sold in relief of the obligation contained in the deed of 1837, the proper course of proceeding is by action of declarator (probably having conclusions for reduction of entail of 1860, as a deed ultra vires of the granter) to have it found that the estate was liable in relief of the debts which might affect the lands in the deed of 1837, and to have the estate of Dunalastair sold at the sight of the Court. The defender does not desire that this should be done, and for obvious reasons does not propose to raise such an action. The pursuer appears to have no title to enforce the obligation as the defender has. It therefore appears that the pursuer's remedy is by an action of the kind indicated, with conclusions directed against the lands, and in which all parties interested should be joined; and at all events, I do not think the pursuer is entitled to succeed in his conclusions in this action for decree against the defender requiring him to pay the debts in question."

M'Donald v.

was a violation of the prohibitions of the entail, and infers an irritancy. It is very clear on the authorities that there is no ground for this proposition. It may be true that an heir of entail cannot keep up as a charge against the other estate of the entailer a debt which was specifically made a real burden on the entailed estates. But it is quite fixed that an heir of entail paying off a debt which burdens the entailed estate out of his own proper funds, and not out of the separate estate of the entailer, may keep up the debt against the entailed estate by taking an assignation to it even in his own name. Here Colonel M'Donald paid this debt out of the sum appointed to him as his share of his mother's fortune by the deed of appointment, and the other heirs of entail could have no interest whatever to object to his doing so, unless he lay under an obligation to discharge these debts, which is not at all events to be found in the deed of entail.

The case in the alternative conclusion of the summons, turns, in the first instance, on the true construction of the clause of relief contained in the deed of entail. In regard to this I have felt a little difficulty—(Reads clause on p. 28.) Now, first, this is a clause in favour of the heirs of entail. It does not burden the heirs succeeding to the estate, but it gives them right to be relieved of the burden. The heirs called are the creditors in the obligation, and that right of credit became fixed when infeftment was taken on the conveyance in 1837. In the second place, the burdens, in regard to which they have this right of relief, are any debts of the maker of the entail which may affect or burden the entailed estates. Whatever question might arise in regard to personal debts which have not been claimed or made effectual against the entailed estate, I have no doubt that it does at once apply to personal debts secured over the entailed estate. The intention, in this case, of the clause of relief was, I think, beyond all doubt to leave the entailed estate entirely free of the entailer's debts, and I cannot see any ground for giving it a more limited construction. I am further of opinion that any heir-substitute has a title to make this obligation effectual against the debts which actually affect the lands. To hold that each heir must wait until he himself succeeds would frustrate the object of the clause, for before that time the property in the hands of the executor, or the heir-at-law, would be liable to fulfil it, might be entirely dispersed. So much for the nature of the obligation, the burdens to which it applies, and the creditors who are entitled to enforce it. The remaining question is, Who are the debtors in the obligation?

Colonel M'Donald is the executor of his father, and although the obligation is conceived in his favour as the heir in possession, as well as in that of the other members of the destination, as executor he is beyond doubt liable to discharge it, and so the Lord Ordinary has found. He could, however, only reach this conclusion by giving to the obligation the construction which I think it truly bears. The other branch under this conclusion stands in a different position. Before the entail of 1837 had been executed General M'Donald purchased certain lands, which he named Dunalastair, and conveyed them to Colonel M'Donald by a disposition entailing them on Colonel M'Donald and the same successors as he, but expressly reserving a power to revoke. The entail was recorded, and no infeftment passed on the disposition during General M'Donald's lifetime. It is now contended that this estate of Dunalastair is liable for the debts of the entailer, and that Colonel M'Donald by taking up the succession has made himself responsible for this obligation.

As regards the estate itself, it is enough to say that its liability to bear of the obligation contained in the Dalchosnie entail is in no degree No. 52.

 affected by the fetters of the entail under which it was conveyed, or even by any declaration of intention, if there were any such disclosed in the conveyance on Jan. 11, 1877.
 part of the granter. This is not an adjusting of burdens between heirs suc- M'Donald v.
 ceding to separate estates, but a question between creditors and gratuitous disposes. The estates under the Dalchosnie entail were vested in Colonel Donald and the other heirs of entail by the infestment in 1837, under which but a liferent remained with the granter. The latter had no power to discharge upon the obligation contained in that deed by any gratuitous alienation in causa. The obligation would certainly have attached to the funds by which Dunalastair was purchased in the hands of the executor, nor could that debt be discharged by any conditions which the debtor in the obligation attached to his gratuitous conveyance. It is unnecessary, however, to consider this matter further, because no steps have been taken to make the obligation effectual against the fee of the estate. The action is directed solely against the heir in possession personally, as if he by taking up the estate had incurred the representation. I am of opinion that there is no ground on which that action can be sustained, nor is there any doubt as to the law on this matter.
 The provision under a gratuitous deed, although it may be fenced with clauses, certainly represents the maker, and that in his just order in which he is liable. But it has been long fixed that he only represents in valorem the property which he takes. It was otherwise in the times of our older law, and Erskine elaborately disputes the doctrine. But the point was settled in the case of Baird v. The Earl of Rosebery, reported in Morrison 14,019, and affirmed in the House of Lords in 1767. In this case Lord Monboddo says—"It is determined a very general point of law, viz., that an heir of provision taking a particular estate, such as an heir of tailzie, is not by his service universally, but only in valorem, like an heir cum beneficio inventarii." Of course where an heir takes under an entail made by a third party, he does not represent his immediate predecessor to any effect, but this proposition refers to the provision taking by a gratuitous title directly from the granter, although subject to the fetters of an entail. In the case of Mackenzie, 9 D. 836, which is authoritative on this branch of the law, Lord Jeffrey doubted whether the liability of the heir of provision could be properly called representation at all, but he differed from the majority of the Court, who did not adopt his views.
 It is therefore clear that, although the liability of the lands of Dunalastair for payment of this obligation of the granter is in no degree affected by the terms of the disposition to that estate, the interest taken by the defender is materially affected by it. Had this been an action directed simply against the defender to clear the estates of Dalchosnie and others of the debt of £25,000, in so far as the fee of his life-interest could extend, the case might have been different; but then, I think, the heir in possession would have been entitled to insist that the fee of the estate ought to be represented, because before he could be liable for the value of his succession it was necessary to determine the value of the estate to the full amount. But this is not the conception of the law, and it is impossible to deal with it on that footing.
 I have said, not without force, that if the estate was liable for this obligation of the granter, the defender, as heir in possession, had the means of making this obligation effectual against it, in respect that under the entail statutes he had the power of relieving himself of his personal obligation, by adopting the necessary

No. 52. procedure for that purpose. But whatever force there might be in such view, there is one essential preliminary which is absent, viz., that it must be judicially found that this obligation does not affect the fee of the estate, and until that is done it is premature to raise the question, what powers in that event the heir in possession may have of freeing himself and the lands from the burden. We leave these steps to be pointed out as they may be advised, but we propose to add to the Lord Ordinary's reservation of his right of action a reservation of any answer which the defender may have thereto.

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

I must, however, say in conclusion, that if this be the issue to which this part of the pursuer's contention comes, it seems to be a very idle dispute. The case of Dunalastair will come to the pursuer at the same time as that at which Dalchosnie reaches him, and not sooner. If he never succeeds to the one he will never succeed to the other; and it cannot matter to him whether it is burdened or not. He ought to consider well whether, if he fail in irritating the right of the defender, he has any real interest in the rest of this action.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The summons in this case has various conclusions, to the effect, 1st, that the entailed estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, of which the defender is the heir of entail in possession, have been forfeited by him and now belong to the pursuer; and to the effect, 2dly, that the defender is bound to free and relieve these estates of and from certain debts of considerable amount at present a burden on them.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender from the whole conclusion of the action, except as regards the free executry, if any, of the late Sir John M'Donald, a matter about which the defender raises no dispute.

(1) The first branch of the summons proceeds on the assumption that the defender by assigning the debts in question to third parties has contravened the conditions of the entail, and therefore forfeited his right to the estates, which consequently devolve upon the pursuer as next heir of entail entitled to succeed. But I am unable to see how any contravention of the entail has taken place. It is true that the defender as in right of the debts referred to has assigned them to third parties. But it does not necessarily follow that this operates as a contravention of the entail. That no such contravention is specified in the entail appears clearly enough on the pursuer's own shewing in the various articles of his condescendence, where the conditions and provisions of the entail are enumerated. It is conditioned and provided that it shall not be lawful for the heirs of entail to sell, alienate, wadset, impignorate, dispose, burden, or affect the entailed estates, but the mere granting of an assignation to the debts referred to—debts which were not incurred by the defender—is certainly not alienating, wadsetting, impignoring, or disposing, burdening, or affecting the entailed estates, and it was scarcely contended that it was.

Accordingly, the pursuer did not seem to rely upon any positive or express contravention by the defender of the conditions of the entail, so far at least as I have yet noticed them. He founded chiefly, as I understood his argument, upon the provision in the entail to the effect that the heirs of entail succeeding to the entailed estates are limited and restrained from doing any act and granting any deed, directly or indirectly, whereby the said lands or any part thereof may be affected, appraised, adjudged, forfeited, confiscated, or be in any manner of way evicted. The argument the pursuer was, that the debts in question having been extinguished confusione No. 52.

 on the defender's succeeding as heir of entail, and thereby becoming, as the pursuer maintained, both debtor and creditor in them, he had no right thereafter Jan. 11, 1877.
 to rear them up in third parties, thereby enabling these third parties to enforce M'Donald v.
 their recovery against the entailed estates. Now, supposing the debts to have been M'Donald.

once extinguished, which ex hypothesi they were on the pursuer's argument, it is difficult to understand how they could be afterwards reared up by assignation. But, independently of this, it appears to me that the reasoning of the pursuer is founded upon an entire fallacy in assuming that the debts were or could be extinguished confusione merely by the defender's succeeding to the entailed estates. The defender in place of forfeiting his right to the £25,000 on succeeding to the entailed estates rather obtained right to that sum just in respect of his being the heir in possession of the estates. Such seems to be the import of the marriage-settlement of the entailer and his wife. And, as explained by the Lord Ordinary, it has been determined in a former litigation that there is no obligation on the defender to discharge the debt or to refrain from enforcing it. On this point the authority of Mr Bell (Principles, secs. 1728 and 1743), and the case of Welsh v. Barstow, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, appear to me to be conclusive to the effect that the debts here in question were not extinguished confusione in the person of the defender.

Assuming this to be so, it was not and could not well be said that there is reason for holding that the pursuer had contravened the conditions of the entail, or any of them, except that he had assigned the debts in question in the way he did. But that very point was the subject of discussion in the case of Welsh v. Barstow, and was there determined adversely to the pursuer's contention in the present case. Mr Bell also, in section 1728 of his Principles, expressly says that the heir of entail is not bound "as such to pay the entailer's debts as not being his representative, but only for the interest during his possession, as the rents are bound; and he may either neglect to pay the debt, or, if he may, by assignation, keep it up as a debt against the estate."

The second branch of the pursuer's action is founded on the obligation of the defender, as quoted in his condescendence.

Now, in so far as it may turn out that there has been any free executry of John M'Donald intromitted with by the defender—although he denies there was any such—he has never disputed his liability, and accordingly the Lord Ordinary has so found. That matter may therefore for the present be laid aside. Nor has the pursuer shaped his action so as to enable him to get at the entailed estates, either drawn or to be drawn by the defender, and he did not propose to restrict or amend to any effect his summons or record.

Independently of these points, the defender denies and disputes that the pursuer has any good ground as against him for insisting further or otherwise in this branch of the action.

The obligation referred to the entailer binds himself and his "heirs-at-law, assigns, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve the entailed lands and sirs named, or to be named to succeed thereto," of and from payment of all debts and obligations to which he was liable, and of and from all claims and demands whereby the entailed lands or any part thereof might be evicted. Is there an obligation enforceable against the defender on any of the grounds laid in the present action? It cannot well be maintained that he has incurred such liability by taking as heir of entail the lands which are intended to be relieved,

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

for the obligation is obviously one in which the heirs of entail are creditors and not debtors. The obligation expressly bears that its object was not only to free and relieve "the entailed lands," but also "the heirs named or to be named to succeed thereto." The defender might, no doubt, be, but in different characters, both debtor and creditor in the obligation. Thus, if, besides taking as heir of entail, he had succeeded to property as heir-at-law or executor of the entail, he might, to the extent of his succession in these characters, be debtor in the obligation, but it is not averred that the defender has succeeded to anything as heir-at-law, or in any other character than heir of entail, except as executor; and as to his liability as executor on the qualified footing already referred to there is no dispute.

If the defender, then, cannot be made liable in relief as heir of entail, under an obligation in which, so far as his character as such is concerned, he is creditor and not debtor, the question occurs, Is there any other ground of liability in respect of which he can be subjected in relief as concluded for? I cannot observe any, unless it is to be found in article 32 of the condescension, where the pursuer says the defender has made up a title to the estate of Dunalastair under a strict entail thereof executed by the late Sir John M'Donald. But, neither in that article nor anywhere else is it said that the defender undertook a personal liability for the debts of Sir John M'Donald by entering to the estate as an heir of entail; and it is clear on the authorities before referred to, and especially the authority of Mr Bell, in sections 1728 and 1743, that he cannot come under no such liability. Whether and how far the estate of Dunalastair itself might be proceeded against for the debts referred to is a question which has been reserved by the Lord Ordinary, and in regard to which I at present offer no opinion. It is sufficient, I think, to say that the present action directed against the defender personally, and it is a personal decree, if any, is not one against the lands, that would require to be pronounced, having regard to the form of action and the conclusions of the summons.

In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I agree in the result which the Lord Ordinary has made, and in the mode in which he has disposed of this action. I agree also in the views which the Lord Ordinary has expressed in his note, with one exception, namely, as to the right which the pursuer has to insist that the entailed estate of Dunalastair shall be sold, and that the price shall be applied towards satisfaction of the entailer's debts affecting the other estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch. On this point I am inclined to differ from the view expressed by the Lord Ordinary, but though the question is a very important one, I do not think its decision is at all necessary for the disposal of the present case, and therefore I concur in the judgment—while, merely to preserve the question about Dunalastair, which the Lord Ordinary has reserved. I will be disposed to add to his Lordship's reservation a reservation of the defender's answer to the claim as accords.

The first question raised in the summons is whether the defender has incurred an irritancy under the entail of 18th July 1837, and has thereby admitted and forfeited his whole right and interest in the entailed estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, and whether these estates now belong to the pursuer as the next heir of entail. The alleged irritancy is founded, in the place, on the fact that the defender, as the institute of entail, has acquired in his own favour, and has then assigned to third parties, an entailer's debt of £25,000, by means of which assignations to third parties, it is said, the whole three entailed estates above-mentioned are liable to be sold or adjudged, and carried off by the creditors now entitled to and vested in the said entailer's debt of £25,000.

M'Donald v.

M'Donald.

I am very clearly of opinion that none of the acts done by the defender on which the pursuer founds constitute in any sense an irritancy of the entail, or are in any view contraventions of its prohibitions. It was hardly maintained but the mere acquisition by the defender of the bond for £25,000 due by the entailer constituted a contravention or an irritancy of the entail. We know from a previous litigation in this Court the circumstances in which the defender acquired that debt as his own property. He was found entitled to take, and to take, the entailer's debt in question as his own absolute property in virtue of the decree of this Court, and of the House of Lords, as being his share of the estate of Lady M'Donald, the defender's mother, settled and apportioned in pursuance of the antenuptial marriage-contract. It was found that the bond was originally due to the marriage-contract trustees was the absolute and undivided property of the defender under the deed of apportionment, and that the defender was entitled to it absolutely and in his own right, and free from any obligation to extinguish it or apply it in freeing and relieving the entailed estates. The bond was as much the unqualified property of the pursuer as if he had bought it with his own earnings.

It is not possible to hold that this debt of £25,000 was extinguished merely by the mere fact of its acquisition by the defender who was at the same time of entail in possession. The bond was not discharged or extinguished. On the contrary, it was assigned and kept up. The assignation was taken to the defender, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, and not to the defender as entailer or to the defender and the series of heirs in the entailed destination. In short, it was simply an entailer's debt kept in force, and kept separate from the entailed estate in the mode in which such debts are always, or almost always, preserved as valuable and preferable burdens upon the entail. It is entirely impossible to hold that the debt was extinguished merely by its assignment to the defender.

It is not the pursuer who went on to contend that an irritancy was incurred not by the defender himself holding the bond, but by the defender assigning it to third parties, by whom it is said diligence may be used against the entailed estates. There is no prohibition in the entail against the defender assigning debts to himself, even although they happen to be entailer's debts. The defender does not contract the debts. He is the creditor and not the debtor in them. It is in consequence of the defender's act that the estate is liable to be attached for the entailer's debt. It is the act of the entailer himself who contracted the debt and granted the bond therefor, and the estate is in no greater degree liable for the debt than it was when the debt remained vested in the marriage-contract trustees, or than it was during the life of the late Sir John M'Donald. It is not conceivable that there might have been a condition in the entail providing that if any of the heirs of entail should acquire in any character entailer's debts, then the estates they should not be entitled to assign the same. Such a clause would be very unusual, perhaps unprecedented, and it might raise very serious questions. But it is enough that there is no such clause in the present

M'Donald v.
M'Donald.

entail, and no provision whatever as to the mode in which entailor's debts are to be dealt with so long as they are unpaid. Accordingly we have just here the common case of entailor's debts purposely kept up by the heir of entail for his own behoof and for behoof of his executors, and the very purpose for which such debts are so kept up is, that the heir who is vested may use them at his own pleasure, may leave them to his own executors, or use them either in vivos or mortis causa as his own proper funds.

It is perhaps needless to shew the difficulties which the pursuer's contention involves. What if the defender should die intestate? This debt would then belong to his executors or next of kin, or to his heir at law if different from his heir of tailzie—What then? Would that be an irritancy? Or suppose the debt to be adjudged from the defender by the defender's own personal creditors or to be otherwise attached by diligence, would an irritancy arise out of such proceedings? Such difficulties might be multiplied—but it is needless. I think it perfectly plain that the defender, by assigning the entailor's debt, was merely exercising his right and disposing of his, the defender's, own absolute property.

I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that the pursuer has failed to establish that the defender has incurred any irritancy or forfeiture of the entailed estates, or of any of them, and accordingly the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the declarator of irritancy and forfeiture, and from the conclusions auxiliary thereto.

But there remain other conclusions which seek to have the defender ordered to pay off or free and relieve the entailed estates not only of the bond for £25,000, but of another bond for £9000 which was granted under the authority of this Court for another debt of the entailor; and still farther, by the amendment tendered for the pursuer, an alternative conclusion is introduced that it is a condition of the defender retaining possession of two of the estates—Lees Garry and Kinloch Rannoch—that he free these estates from the burden of the debt of £25,000.

I am of opinion that none of these conclusions are well founded, and that the defender should be absolved therefrom. I think it quite clear, on the ground already mentioned, that the £25,000 bond is simply, and in the strictest sense, an entailor's debt, duly, validly, and effectually kept up against the entailed estates, and the same must be said still more clearly as to the other debt for £9000, the bond for which was granted under the authority of the Court and in terms of the recent entail Acts. Now, the moment the character of the debts as ordinary entailor's debts is established then all that the heir of entail in possession is bound to do is to keep down the interest on the entailor's debts accruing during such heir's possession, and that out of the rents which such heir is receiving. No heir of entail is bound to pay off the principal or capital of the entailor's debts unless this be a condition of the entail, or unless of course the heir of entail has incurred a separate or general representation of the entailor. Quia heir of entail he is not the debtor in the bonds, and he is only bound to pay out of the rents the interest accruing during his possession.

This brings the question simply to this: Whether it is a condition of the present entail—a condition validly made by the entailor—that the pursuer, or first heir of entail, or that any subsequent heir of entail, shall, as a condition of succeeding, “and irrespective altogether of how long he may be in possession as heir of entail,” be bound, out of his own means, to pay off the pr-ipal or capital sums constituting the entailor's debts? Now, there is no such No. 52.

 condition in the entail, and no such condition is implied at common law, and therefore there is an end to the pursuer's whole action, both as originally laid Jan. 11, 1877.
 and as amended or proposed to be amended. The defender is entitled to absol- M'Donald v.
 M'Donald.
 tion from the whole conclusions of the action.

In regard to the liability of the separate entailed estate of Dunalastair, to be sold or made available in some way for paying off the previous debts of the entailor affecting the other entailed estates of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, I wish entirely to reserve my opinion, although, as I have already mentioned, I incline to differ from the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary in his note. My difficulty is this, that both entails—that is, the entail of Dunalastair as well as the previous one—bind the granter, Sir John M'Donald, alone, and his heirs, executors, and representatives whatsoever—that, is his general representatives—to relieve the entailed estates of the granter's debts. There is no obligation laid upon the heirs of entail in any of the entailed estates to pay entailor's debts, even those affecting the estates respectively entailed, far less is it made a condition that the heirs succeeding to one entailed estate shall pay off the debts affecting other and separately entailed lands. None of the heirs of entail are bound at common law to do so, although of course all the estates are attachable at the instance of the creditors. Now, when the question of liability for entailor's debts, or questions as to the right to be relieved therefrom, arise, not between the heirs of entail and the general representatives of the entailor, but between two of a series of heirs of entail under separate deeds of entail, I do not think it is material, at least it is not conclusive, that one of the entails was executed long before the other, or that one of the entails contains a power of revocation while the other does not. These may be indications of intention, but they are no more. In particular, the power of revocation though reserved was never exercised, and I think it impossible to hold that the entail must be held revoked eo ipso from the mere fact that the entailor left debts unprovided for. It appears to me that in all such cases the real question is a question as to the intention of the testator or entailor. Did the late Sir John M'Donald really mean and intend that the estate of Dunalastair—carefully and specially entailed—should be burdened with, made answerable for, and probably sold to pay off, a heritable debt which he had previously constituted effectually as an entailor's debt and a real burden affecting and against the separate entailed lands of Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch? Reading the note, I should have the greatest possible difficulty in holding that this was Sir John M'Donald's intention, and when we remember that Sir John M'Donald himself, at great expense, built upon Dunalastair the mansion-house which he intended to be the mansion-house of the whole entailed estates, viewed as one estate and settled upon the same series of heirs, then if it should turn out that Dunalastair must be sold in order to pay off the heritable debt affecting Dalchosnie, Loch Garry, and Kinloch Rannoch, I cannot help thinking that this would be defeating, and signally defeating, the intentions of the testator. While I say this much, however, in consequence of the clear opinion to an opposite effect expressed by the Lord Ordinary, I do so merely for the purpose of expressing my difficulty and reserving my opinion entire, for I think that the question cannot be decided under any of the conclusions of the present action.

The case may go back to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain the amount of the

No. 52. free executry, which, so far as it will go, is admittedly liable for the entailor's debts.

WILLIAM HENDERSON, Defender.—Asher—Mackintosh.

Public Company—Duties and Obligations of Directors—Payments by Vendor to Directors.—Held that an original director of a company, formed for the purchase and working of certain mines, who had received a sum of £10,000 from the vendors out of the purchase money paid them, was bound to repay that sum with interest to the company, although the agreement between the vendors and him had been made before the company was formed.

Observed that the defender's allegation that he had rendered services to the company to the value of the sum he had received from the vendors was irrelevant.

Trust—Agent.—Observed, Wherever it can be shewn that a trustee has arranged matters as to obtain an advantage, whether in money or in money worth, to himself personally, through the execution of his trust, he will not be permitted to retain it, but be compelled to make it over to his constituent.

Observed (per Lord Young), When an agent or other trustee takes money from a person with whom he contracts for his constituents, the law assumes that he takes it at the cost of his constituent, and admits of no evidence to the contrary.

Observed (per Lord Young) When a constituent finds that he has been defrauded in a purchase by his agent by means of a secret agreement between the agent and the seller, his remedy is not confined to compelling the agent to give up what he has received, but he may repudiate the purchase and seek compensation or redress from the seller and the agent.

B.

THE HUNTINGTON Copper and Sulphur Company (Limited), incorporated under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, raised this action against William Henderson, chemical manufacturer in Glasgow and Irvine, at one time a director of the company, for payment of £10,000, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent from 1st April 1872 until payment. The company also concluded for disclosure and account of premiums and payments made to Henderson by certain persons who had been interested in the mines, now the property of the company's vendors; and failing such an account they concluded for £5000 as the amount of such premiums.

The pursuers averred that in 1872 the Honourable Mr. Huntington Canada came to England with the view of getting up a limited company to purchase certain mines in Canada, then the property of the "Huntington Mining Copper Company of Canada (Limited)," of which he was shareholder and director, and also to purchase certain lands adjoining these mines which belonged to himself; that with a view to carrying out this project he arranged to get the assistance of Alexander M'E a financial agent; and that either Mr Huntington or M'Ewen applied to Henderson, who was conversant with the affairs of the Canada company, to become a director of the projected company. No. 53.

The following averments were then made:—(Cond. 3) . . . "Messrs Jan. 12, 1877. Huntington and M'Ewen, in order to induce the defender to become a director of the company and allow his name to appear on the prospectus as a director, which, it was supposed, would induce the public to take shares in the company, and to use his influence to obtain gentlemen of position to join the board of directors, offered to pay him the sum of £10,000 out of the purchase money to be obtained by the sale of the said mining properties to the company. The defender accepted the said offer, and agreed, in consideration of the said sum of £10,000, to become a director of the said company, to allow his name to appear as a director in the prospectus, to obtain other gentlemen of influence to become directors, and otherwise to aid Messrs Huntington and M'Ewen in promoting and establishing the said company. It was further arranged between the defender and Messrs Huntington and M'Ewen that Mr James Henderson, a nephew of the defender, who was also a shareholder of the Huntington Mining Company of Canada, should be interim secretary of the proposed company, and that the defender's office in Glasgow should be the temporary office of the new company." Other averments were made in connection with the prospectuses and bringing out of the company, which, so far as substantiated, are given below in the summary of the evidence led at the proof. Messrs Copper Co. v. Henderson.

The defender answered the averment in cond. 3 as follows:—Ans. 3) "Admitted that Messrs M'Ewen and Huntington applied to the defender to become a director of the said proposed company. Admitted that it was agreed between them and the defender that the latter should receive £10,000 out of the sum to be paid by the proposed company to the vendors. Admitted also that the defender's nephew was appointed secretary to the company, and that the defender's offices were used as the temporary offices of the company. Quoad ultra denied, and reference made to the defender's statement."

The defender (Stat. 1) set forth that he was a metallurgical chemist of great experience, and was patentee of certain processes for treating ores which the intended company proposed to work, and that he had been applied to as his services as a person of skill were necessary in setting going the company's business. He added,—(Stat. 2) "In consideration of the sum of £10,000 agreed to be paid to the defender by Messrs M'Ewen and Huntington, the defender undertook to perform a variety of services which lay entirely outwith the ordinary duties of a director of the company, and which were necessary to be performed in the interest of the vendors and of the company, and, in particular, he undertook to experiment upon the ores proposed to be worked, to procure and employ suitable managers, chemists, &c., to design the works, furnaces, &c. to be erected, and, if necessary, to go out to Canada and set the company's works agoing. All the services thus agreed to be rendered the defender fully rendered to the vendors and the company. In particular, and, inter alia, he bought with his own funds fifty-two tons of the Huntington ores, and had the same taken to his works at Irvine, and there experimented on in great detail, and at considerable cost, in order to determine the form of apparatus and the particular modification of his patented processes which were best suited for working the said ore. He also selected two managers for the company's works, and had them, one for some months and the other for some weeks, at his works at Irvine, instructing them in the details of his processes. He further furnished plans and designs, and made a journey to Canada in order to set agoing the company's work. Apart from any allowance for his own time and trouble he expended the performance of these, and the other services rendered by him in consideration of the said sum of £10,000 a sum not less than £8000. the result the defender has derived no profit whatever from or under said agreement with Messrs M'Ewen and Huntington."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender is bound to pay to pursuers the said sum of £10,000, in respect that the said sum was stipulated for by the defender, and received by him from Messrs Huntington and M'Ewen, the vendors, under the arrangement and upon the conditions stated in article 3 of the condescendence, without the knowledge or sanction of the pursuers, and contrary to the duty which he owed to them as their director and agent.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuers are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The averments of the pursuers being, so far as material, unfounded in fact, and, in particular, the only sum received by the defender from Messrs M'Ewen and Huntington having been received on the footing set forth in the defender's statement, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. Separatim, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, in respect that no benefit or profit has accrued to him under the said agreement between him and Messrs M'Ewen and Huntington.

A proof was allowed to both parties, in which the defender led. The result of the evidence was as follows:—After M'Ewen and Huntington had persuaded Henderson to become a director of the company, upon an understanding, verbal, not written, as both M'Ewen and Henderson deposed, that he was to give his services and the use of his patent required, to the company, in consideration of the sum of £10,000 to be paid to him by the vendors, a proof prospectus of the company was issued with Henderson's name appearing on it as the only director as yet named upon. Copies of this prospectus were distributed, and eventually other gentlemen, including Mr Huntington, were induced to promise to act as directors. Of the gentlemen so selected three received money from the vendors, two £1000 each, and the other £500, and eventually another director was selected who also received £500. The prospectus, as issued to the public, bore that the purchase money to be paid for the mines was to be £125,000. It also contained this clause,—“It is proposed to sell the whole of the sulphur contained in the poorer ores treated at the mines, and for this purpose to make arrangements with Mr Henderson and his partners to adopt the most improved processes, when fully developed by Mr Irvine, which will very much increase the profits of the company.”

The only contract mentioned in the prospectus was stated to have been made between John George Long (who was M'Ewen's head clerk), James Henderson (the nephew of the defender), and was dated 25th or 26th March 1872. It contained this clause,—“This agreement shall be binding until adopted by the company.” The defender's office in Glasgow was used as the temporary offices of the company. On 1st April 1875 the company was registered, and on 5th April the first meeting was held, and the defender, along with the gentlemen above referred to, were formally appointed directors.

The company continued in operation with this board of directors until 1875, when, at a meeting on 30th July, a committee of investigation was appointed. The directors, other than the defender, who had received money from the vendors, all repaid what they had obtained to the company. The committee having ascertained that Henderson had been paid £10,000 by the vendors, instructed their law-agents to write to ing on him to repay this sum to the company. In reply to the letter making this demand Henderson's agents wrote as follows:—"On his part we have to inform you that he never received any promotion or reward whatever. You have doubtless before you the original prospectus of the company, to the following statement in which we would refer you: 'It is proposed to utilise the whole of the sulphur contained in the ores treated at the mine, and for this purpose to make arrangements with Mr Henderson and his partners to adopt the most improved process when fully developed at Irvine, which will very much increase the profits of the company.' For the advantages accorded by him to the company, and for the benefits the company would derive from his special skill and experience (which, we would remind your committee, he has been unceasingly devoted to the company—quite distinct from the duties of a director—at great inconvenience, with very considerable loss of time, and without any other remuneration), the vendors paid Mr Henderson £10,000."

Copper Co. v.
Henderson.

Henderson, in his evidence, deponed that M'Ewen and Huntington had engaged him to assist in bringing out the company, but to undertake only the necessary works and see that they were properly managed, and that it was in return for this and kindred services that he was to receive, and did receive, the £10,000. It was proved that Henderson had visited Canada to set the works in order after they had gone bankrupt, and had only been paid his travelling expenses. He had also acted as managers for the works at his own works at Irvine, and had made claims against the company for so doing. Several of his co-directors deponed that he took the whole practical management of the business, and that his experience and reputation as a metallurgical chemist was highly valued by them as of great value to the company. M'Ewen deponed that he never would have started the company without the promise of Henderson's assistance, and that his arrangement with him was fully confirmed before the sale to the company. Henderson produced an account of his books for expenditure on experiments which he had made with the company, which brought out a debit on account of the experiments of £11,907. The pursuers, on the other hand, produced receipts from Henderson for small charges for analyses, &c. made upon their ores.

On June 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"On the defender's pleas, and decerns against the defender to make good to the pursuers of the sum of £10,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the 31st day of August 1872 till the date of payment of the last instalment of the purchase money, and in respect the pursuers do not insist in the remaining conclusions for accounting and payment, finds it unnecessary to dispose of the remaining conclusions: Finds the defender liable in expenses, and remits,"

JUDGMENT.—The relevancy of the pursuers' case as stated was not disputed, notwithstanding of the plea of irrelevancy on record; and I am of opinion that it is clearly relevant. The relevancy of the defence, or its legal effect as an answer to the action, might, I think, have been reasonably established, but the pursuers, no doubt advisedly, abstained from doing so as an answer to proof, although before the commencement of the evidence they contended that, having regard to the defender's admissions, which they represented as sufficient prima facie to entitle them to judgment, the defender ought to be granted this course. This course was in accordance with my own impression, and was not taken by the counsel for the defender. It was, however, understood that the course taken should be without prejudice to the pleas of parties on the whole when the proof was concluded.

Copper Co. v.
Henderson.

Henderson reclaimed, and argued ;—There was no dispute as to the Lord Ordinary's law with regard to persons occupying trust relations, but

“The facts of the case as established, and indeed substantially admitted, are very simple. Mr Huntington of Montreal, being interested in a copper mining company in Canada called after his own name, and whose property he had authority to sell, and being himself proprietor of certain lands adjoining the company's mine and works, which he wished to dispose of, came to this country in order to effect a sale of the whole for the company and himself. His first communication, so far as we know, was with Mr Alexander M'Ewen of London, a gentleman of experience in promoting the formation of companies to purchase such properties as Huntington wished to dispose of. In the result Huntington and M'Ewen together applied to the defender for his aid in the matter, which was no doubt important, or thought to be so, to the success of the scheme. They, on the part of the proposed vendors, offered him £10,000 for it, or (adopting the expression in the defender's answer to condescendence 3), agreed that ‘should receive £10,000 out of the sum to be paid by the proposed company to the vendors.’ The defender agreed to these terms after (as he says no doubt truly), satisfying himself by inquiry that the property was valuable, and that the concern was likely to prosper in the hands of a joint stock company. The agreement being thus made, the defender set about the performance of his part of it by assisting in the preparation of a prospectus for a company, which was printed and circulated with his name as sole director, the purpose of it being apparently to induce other gentlemen of probable influence to allow their names to be added to the direction, with a view to a further and more complete prospectus. The measure was successful to the extent of inducing five gentlemen to join and add their names to the direction. They were no doubt influenced by the confidence which they not unreasonably reposed in the defender, ignorant of the terms upon which his aid had been purchased by the vendors, though four of them had some reason for suspicion from the circumstances, viz. bribes being promised, and in the result paid, to themselves for the use of their names as means of promoting the interests of the vendors. The bribes promised and eventually paid to these gentlemen were of less amount than that first agreed, but were, I think, of exactly the same character. The result was that of the six provisional directors, who had been selected because of the influence which their names were likely to carry with the public, five had been induced to give the use of their names by bribes to the aggregate amount of £13,000, promised on the part of the vendors speculating on the advantage of the sale which they hoped to effect through the influence thus procured. On the 25th and 26th March 1872 the contract whereby the sale was made to the intended company was executed by a Mr John George Long on the part of the vendors, and by the defender* on the part of the intended company. By this contract, which is set out in condescendence 5, it was agreed that ‘the company, when incorporated, purchase’ the property specified ‘for the sum of £125,000, payable as therein mentioned. This contract was necessarily conditional on the formation and incorporation of the projected company, but the condition was immediately thereafter, viz., on 1st April 1872, purified by the registration of the company. For all legal purposes the contract may be taken as effected by the directors of the company (including the defender), immediately after registration whereby its incorporation was effected. It has since been confirmed by a conveyance of the property, and payment of the agreed price. The vendors have also kept faith with the defender, and those of his co-directors with whom they had agreements, by payment of the rewards promised to them for the services which they received at their hands, and to which no doubt the advantageous sale which they effected through their means is greatly attributable.”

“Had the company prospered, nothing might ever have been heard of the manner in which the directors, who were charged, indeed had charged themselves with the company's interests in the matter of the purchase, had been facts of this case took it out of the rule. It was proved (1) that at date of the agreement under which the £10,000 was paid, the defender at least greatly tempted by the vendors whose interests were necessarily used to those of which the directors were the guardians. But the company being proved unfortunate, and a committee of investigation having been appointed, the facts came to light. The defender's brother directors who received money from the vendors have seen fit to pay to the company what they so received, with interest. Their view seems to have been that the price agreed to them for the company may be considered as having been higher by at least amount than it would otherwise have been, but the defender declines to even this apparently moderate view, and insists on retaining what he has. Hence the present action.

The view of his position or of the agreement between him and the vendors at which he was to 'receive £10,000 out of the sum to be paid by the proposed company to the vendors,' as urged at the debate, is distinctly enough set out in his agents' letter quoted in cond. 12:—'For the advantages accorded him to the company, and for the benefits the company would derive from his technical skill and experience (which we would remind your committee have been unceasingly devoted to the company,—quite distinct from the duties of a director,—at great inconvenience, with very considerable loss of time, and without any other remuneration), the vendors paid Mr Henderson £10,000.'

I cannot assent to this view. The import of it is that by the contract of the 18th 1872, the vendors, for the agreed on price of £125,000 sold and agreed to transfer, not only the property therein carefully specified, but also the defender's services as a skilful and active director, together with some undefined right to use his peculiar processes, for which they had prepaid him £10,000. There was no contract between the vendors and the defender, the benefit of which was capable of being sold and transferred to the company, and in the contract between them and the company there is no allusion to anything of the kind. But, laying aside this view as untenable, the rule of law applicable to the case, in my opinion, is not doubtful. It is the simple and familiar rule of trust law, that a trustee (using the term in its largest sense), shall not without the knowledge and consent of his constituent make profit of his office, or take any personal advantage from his execution of it. It is not a different rule, but merely a developed instance of the same rule, that a trustee shall not be permitted to do anything which involves or may involve a conflict between his personal interest and his trust duty. The rule is not confined to particular cases which are capable of being enumerated, but is commensurate with a large and important principle on which it rests. That principle is that a person who is charged with the duty of attending to the interest of another shall not bring his own interest into competition with his duty. It is immaterial, as many cases illustrate, what is the particular relation which raises the duty, provided only it raises a duty on reposed trust, of which the law takes cognisance. The remedy for breach of the rule depends on the circumstances of the particular case, and is, in some extent, in the option of the person who has suffered thereby, either to sue or to rely on presumption of law. I say in presumption of law, for it is very well settled that remedy under the rule is not confined to cases of established fraud; and that the law presumes an injury wherever the rule has been violated. Without speculating on the remedy in general, it is, I think, firmly established that wherever it can be shewn that the trustee has so arranged matters as to obtain an advantage, whether in money or in money's worth, to himself, through the execution of his trust, he will not be permitted to retain it, but will be compelled to make it over to his constituent. It is unnecessary to add such limitations as must tacitly accompany so general a proposition, as, for example, by excluding cases of fraud practised by a trustee, for his own benefit, on a third party with whom he was dealing for the trust, and in which the remedy would be to the party defrauded.

Applying the rule to the case in hand, it appears, and so I hold in point of fact, that the defender being a director of the pursuer's company, and so charged

No. 53. stood in no trust relation to the company. (2) It was no part of the agreement that he was to enter into a trust relation; he undertook with the duty of attending to their interests, made on their behalf a contract the purchase of certain specified property at the price of £125,000, having the time when he made it, a secret agreement with the vendors to reimburse himself £10,000 out of that price. The company implemented on their part the sale so made for them, by paying the price and accepting a conveyance of the property, and the defender received back from the vendors £10,000, which he has retained. Assuming the facts to be so, the case seems to be prima facie an exceptionally clear one for the application of the rule of law to which I have adverted.

"The first point which the defender makes in answer to it is, that when he made his bargain for the £10,000 he was in no trust relation, and that there was nothing to hinder him accepting the vendors' offer of that sum for his services in aiding them to sell their property to advantage. To this I agree. prima facie the proposition does not extend to the case that the services were to be given in first bringing about the constitution of a trust relation between the defender and a contemplated purchaser, and then effecting the sale through the medium of that relation. But I must exclude that case from my general assent. I do not think an agreement to that effect would be an agreement to commit a fraud of no importance truly if the contemplated fraud was not in the result actually perpetrated, but very important, even in its character of a preliminary agreement, if the fraud was afterwards in fact perpetrated in pursuance of it. This is precisely what I must, on the evidence, hold to be the fact here. It would it signify, in my opinion, that the agreement between the defender and the vendors might have been otherwise implemented, as, for example, by procuring a purchaser to whom the defender did not stand in any trust relation. I think it was in fact implemented exactly as contemplated and intended from the first, but it would not affect the result in my opinion had this been otherwise. The defender being a trustee did in fact purchase for his constituents a vendor who agreed to pay and did pay him £10,000 for his services in this matter, and the date or the terms of the preliminary agreement or understanding according to which he was to receive the money are, I think, altogether immaterial, except as bearing on a question of personal integrity, which need not be decided.

"The next point the defender makes is, that the company was not incorporated when the sale was concluded, and that the present members, or the body of them, joined subsequently. But, 1st, I think it clear that the sale was made on behalf of the incorporated company, and by the defender as a director of the incorporated company. From the necessity of the case, at least quite naturally and in ordinary course of business, the contract was made provisionally before the incorporation. But it was made in contemplation of that event, and in terms dependent upon it, so that on the incorporation a few days thereafter, it became instantly a contract of the company, made for it by the directors, and as such accompanied by all the ordinary legal rules and incidents applicable to it and to the conduct and responsibility of the directors in making it, notwithstanding that the directors and the contract were originally provisional, and remained so till the incorporation. 2d, The ordinary rules of law apply to an incorporated company, and to the relations between it and others, including its directors, without regard to changes in the membership. Further, apart from this rule of law as I regard it, and looking only to the facts and justice of the thing, I must hold that members joining an incorporated company at any time after its incorporation are entitled to rely upon it that all existing contracts have been made by the directors in the due discharge of their duty as governed by the rules of law, and on finding the fact to be otherwise are entitled, through the ordinary vital action of the company itself, which they have power to set in motion, to all the remedies which the law may allow to a company in the circumstances which may be established. Nor, for the reasons which I have indicated, can I distinguish in the matter between prima facie her special skilled services to the vendors and the company, and was a director only as the most convenient way of getting his services acts which became absolute by the incorporation, and those made subsequently to the incorporation, and so absolute from the first.

The last point the defender makes is of this nature. He says there is no reason that the price agreed to be given for the property was extravagant or unfair, and contends that when the price, thus assumed to be fair, was actually paid to the vendors the money became theirs to dispose of as they pleased, and that if they were pleased to give £10,000 to the defender, that was their affair and not the concern of the company's, who, on the assumption, had only paid a fair price for the property they acquired. This, which was the burden of the defender's argument, I must regard as altogether unsound, for it ignores the rule of law to which I have already sufficiently adverted, and a host of cases by which it has been illustrated. According to the view of the law thus maintained an agent or trustee purchasing a property may take any sum he pleases from the company's personal gratification to himself, without any remedy to his constituent, and on proof that the price was extravagant or unfair. Or an engineer or contractor may, without violation of duty, take gratifications from the contractors paid by him for his principal, in recognition of his patronage, and the principal has no remedy except on proof of extravagant prices. The law, as I understand it, is otherwise. When an agent or other trustee takes money from the company with whom he contracts for his constituent, the law assumes that he does so at the cost of his constituent, and admits of no evidence to the contrary. If otherwise would greatly defeat the wholesome object of the rule by which those who sought a remedy under it to litigation about values to determine whether or not abatements, for the trustee's personal gratification, had been paid at fair prices and fair profits, and so really at the sacrifice by the third party of what they were reasonably entitled to for their goods or services, and of the injury to the constituent who got his money's worth. The law is founded on this by holding firmly to the rule, that a trustee or agent shall have no remedy except what the law allows or his constituent knowingly agrees to, and if he receives more he receives it unfairly at his constituent's expense. This is founded on good sense, and the mischief of any other would be infinite. Thus, to instance in the case of sale, it seems only reasonable to hold that a vendor will not subsidise a buyer's agent for merely performing his duty as such. But if not what is the conclusion when such a subsidy has been given? Simply, that which every man forms who hears of it, that the interest of the buyer has by his own agent been sacrificed to that of the seller, and that this is precisely what the seller has paid for. The law, so far as it protects principals against the danger of having their interests so sacrificed, prohibiting agents from taking any benefit whatever in this manner without their knowledge and consent, and by taking from agents, without further proof, the fruits of any violation by them of this prohibition.

The defender attempted to make a point of the circumstance, that it did not appear that the £10,000 which he received was part of the very money which the vendors had from the company. It was probably, or even certainly, not. All the payments together may have been by cheques or bills, or in any way as the defender was concerned, by credit in accounts between him and the vendors. The identity of the money is of no importance, nor would it affect the application of the rule on which I decide the case had the money been paid by the vendors to the defender been not in money but in money's worth, as by a conveyance or delivery to him of heritable or other property hereafter.

Now, I hope and believe, made it sufficiently clear that I decide the case on the general rule of law, the application of which does not imply any imputation of fraud on the defender, in the sense that he bought the property in question for the company solely because of the benefit he was personally to receive from the vendors, and without believing that the property would be worth to the company for which he acted the price he agreed to pay for it, although as manager and not in order to bring about the purchase of the mine &c. (3) The defender had made no profit, having expended in experimen-

that did necessarily include the large amount which he had agreed with vendors to receive out of it on his own account. So far from this, it is according to my conviction of the fact on the evidence that he believed, as the result of his inquiries and the exercise of his judgment, that the company which he was so instrumental in calling into existence would be successful, and that there would be no reason to regret the purchase. He, no doubt, also thought that in the event of the success which he anticipated he ought to have a gratification for his skill and active services in originating the concern, setting it a-going, beyond a mere participation in the profits according to shares. Nor could there have been any objection to an arrangement between him and the company, whereby he was to be remunerated as the originator and most active director, in such manner and to such extent as they mutually agreed on, and that either absolutely and in any event or conditionally on success and according to profits. Such agreement might indeed have formed part of the articles of association, and appearing there would necessarily have been binding on the company incorporated according to these articles. This was the obvious, familiar, and above-board course if the defender meant that the company should remunerate him for his services, and the only objection to taking it appears to be that it might have formed an obstacle to the successful creation of the company, for men might not have been willing to join on such terms. But here, for whatever reason, omitted to take this course, the defender was, I think, clearly without any resource except an appeal to the company after its incorporation. It is therefore impossible, in my opinion, to defend the payment which the defender obtained from the vendors, on the ground that it was an indirect way of obtaining from the company payment for his services as originator, promoter, and active director of the concern. That the defender should, out of the proper price of their property, pay the defender for his services to the company is simply ridiculous, although it is conceivable that they might have lent themselves to such a device as is suggested by the stress laid by the defender on these services in his argument, provided the price was increased beyond what they were content to receive to themselves by amount as the defender wished to receive to himself out of the funds of the company. I need hardly say that no Court of law could for a moment countenance such a proceeding.

"The case is important as disclosing proceedings which there is no reason to believe not unfrequently attend the genesis of joint stock companies, and of opinion that they are of an illegal and mischievous character, I have examined and dealt with the case in all the aspects of it which were suggested in argument or have occurred to myself, in order that I might distinctly express and state the grounds of that opinion. The length at which I have entered on this subject is not, however, to be taken as any indication of doubt or difficulty on my part, for, indeed, I regard the case as a very clear and even gross case for the application of a familiar and well settled rule of law. And with respect to the remedy (which I have here given to the extent asked), I desire to say that I am of opinion that the law affords no larger and more complete remedy than depends on the trustee of the profit which he has personally made. If a private individual should discover that his factor or agent had betrayed him into the purchase of property, effected on his advice and through his instrumentality, in pursuance of a secret agreement with the seller to share the price with him, I am of opinion that the remedy is confined to compelling such factor or agent to pay up so much of the price as he had received. On the contrary, I incline, at present advised, to think that any one who discovers that he has been defrauded, may, if so minded, repudiate the purchase altogether, and seek complete redress against both the seller, who seduced his agent, and the agent who faithlessly yielded to the seduction. A company is in no different position with respect to its directors, and if it should appear that a party having power to sell tempted the directors of a company, by personal bribery, to buy it, he the company's behoof as much money as he got, and so he could not said to have any of their money in his hands. (4) There was no evidence that the company had paid too high a price for what they purchased, and so they had nothing to do with the manner in which the vendors disposed of the purchase money.

Copper Co. v.
Henderson.

These points distinguished this case from the recent one of Sir John Eyre founded upon by the pursuers.

Argued for the pursuers ;—There could be no doubt that the defender, having received money belonging to the company while acting in an agency capacity, was bound to refund it. This had been settled by a long series of decisions.²

At advising,—

LORD SHAND.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no doubt as to the general legal principle by which the question here in dispute must be determined, or as to the application of that principle to the circumstances of the present case.

It is clear that as part of the arrangement for the purchase of the Canadian property by the company at the price of £125,000 the defender, a director of the company, stipulated that he should receive £10,000 from the vendors, and that on the sale being completed he received that sum. This payment was made to be made, and was made, without notice to the company. In order to enable the vendors to make the payment they had to stipulate for £10,000 in addition to the sum they were themselves to accept as the value of the property, and the enhanced price to the extent of this sum of £10,000 was thus simply the money of the company paid without the sanction or knowledge of the company, through the vendors of the property, to one of the company's directors.

It was provided by the agreement for the purchase of the property that it would not be binding until adopted by the company. The defender, as a director of the company, was a party to the agreement being adopted, and so was a party to that character to the act of binding the company to its terms.

It would, in my opinion, have made no difference if the arrangement with the vendors had stood entirely on a concluded agreement entered into prior to the formation of the company, it having been part of the agreement that the defender should assume the trust character of a director in order to carry the arrangement out ; but the fact is that in binding the company to make the purchase by adopting the agreement which had been previously entered into, to that effect, with the defender's sanction by Mr James Henderson as a trustee of the intended company, the defender, being then a director of the company, obligated for payment to himself of the sum of £10,000, which, for the reasons already stated, must be regarded as a payment of money truly belonging to the company, I cannot permit myself to doubt that the company might, on discovery of the fraud, repudiate the transaction, and seek complete redress against all concerned in it."

Jan. 12, 1877.
Huntington
Copper Co. v.
Henderson.

The defender, unable to dispute the force and effect of the general rule, endeavoured to justify his receipt and retention of the money on the ground that it was paid to him under an agreement with the vendors that he should render important professional services to the company in preparing plans for their works in Canada, training men to take charge of the company's operations, going to Canada if necessary to see the works started, and pursuing experiments in this country in order to make the most of the manufacture of the company's ores, and that in point of fact these services were rendered to the company. The defence maintained was substantially rested on this, which is represented as making a special case, entirely distinguishable from the case of a director receiving promotion money or shares in the company as a qualification for his seat at the board, in which cases it cannot be disputed the ordinary rule applies. In this defence, however, there are several obvious and conclusive answers.

So far as services are said to have been actually rendered to the company under the alleged agreement it is a sufficient answer to say that it is impossible to refer any services rendered by the defender to the company of which he was a director to an agreement now alleged to have existed, but of which he was not a director of the company, and everyone in the management except the defender himself, was entirely ignorant. If the defender was really rendering, or professing to render, services to the company under an agreement binding on him in respect of remuneration received when the company was formed, it is inconceivable that this should not have been mentioned or disclosed in some way before the claim for repetition of this money was made. The entire absence of knowledge by the directors of any such agreement tends to create a strong impression that the defence founded on it has been reared up on a very slender foundation—the understanding, or promise, at the utmost, it may be, that the defender, like the other proposed directors, would do his best to promote the formation and aid the business of the company, giving also the benefit of his professional knowledge he had. And this impression has not been removed or confirmed by the proof. The defender's connection with the Tharsis mine, which is referred to in the prospectus, and the success of which is said to have been to a considerable extent due to him, is probably of itself sufficient to account for the larger bonus given to him to procure his name and influence in the direction (and so to attract shareholders) than the sums given to other directors, men admittedly with that view. And the suggestion now made of services having been rendered under an agreement antecedent to the formation of the company is in direct variance with the statement in the prospectus issued and being approved of by the defender, to the effect, not that an arrangement had been made, but that it was proposed to make arrangements with him for getting the benefit of his improved processes when fully developed.

It is not, I think, proved that the bonus of £10,000 was paid in respect of any agreement for services to be rendered to the company. Mr McEwan admitted the payment mainly, at least, to the assistance he expected from the defender "in bringing out the company," and that assistance was evidently so great that without it the company would probably never have come into existence. He states that the defender was under no legal obligation to perform the services referred to—a statement which is of course inconsistent with the existence of and it appears to me that the fact of the arrangement having been made by anticipation does not vary the case from what it would have been if he had been a trustee at the time the agreement was entered into. The agreement made by anticipation, and afterwards carried out, just puts him in the same position as if he had done all that he has done after he was actually invested with the character of trustee. It was contemplated from the first that the purchase should be confirmed, and that he was to hold the character which he afterwards held. These views are, as they deserved to be, very fully developed in the note of the Lord Ordinary; and I have only to say that in the whole of that note, from beginning to end, I substantially concur.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion; and as the Lord Ordinary has entered very fully into the question, and I entirely concur in his opinion and in what has fallen from Lord Shand, I shall simply state that it appears to me that this is a very clear case for applying the general rule which runs through all the cases on the subject, viz., that parties in the position of trustees are not permitted to make profit by that position. As I understand the arrangement which was here made it was settled from the first that the defender was to be a director in this proposed company, and it was also arranged that, for what he calls certain services to be performed by him as to the formation of the company and other matters, he was to get £10,000. That is borne out by the 3d article of the condescendence, and I think almost as clearly by what was admitted by the defender. He was therefore in the position of a party who was to get £10,000 of the purchase price of this property, provided the company came into existence in consequence of his exertions and those of the promoters, committee and the directors who floated the company. Now, the general principle of law as applicable to trustees, as I have always understood it, as laid down by Lord Lyndhurst in the case of New v. Jones (1 Hall and Twells, p. 632, referred to in the case of Gray, 12th November 1856, 19 D., p. 5) is that "It is the duty of an executor and of a trustee to be guardian of the estate, to watch over the interests of the estate committed to his charge. If he is allowed to perform the duties connected with the estate, and to claim compensation for his services, his interest would then be opposed to his duty, and in a matter of prudence the Court does not allow a trustee to place himself in such a situation." And he further adds—"It would be placing his interest at variance with the duties which he has to discharge." Some question having appeared in a subsequent case of Cradock v. Piper, as to the extent to which the opinion of Lord Lyndhurst in New v. Jones was meant to go, Lord Cairns, in deciding the case of Broughton v. Broughton (5 De Gex, Macnaghten and Gordon, p. 164), used these expressions when he was Lord Chancellor in 1854—"The rule really is, that no one having a duty to perform shall place himself in a situation to have his interests conflicting with that duty. A case for the application of the rule is that of a trustee himself doing acts which he might employ others to perform, and taking payment in some way for them. As the trustee might make the payment to others, this Court says he shall make it to himself." Now, I think, in the circumstances of this case the defender was substantially a trustee, and his duty was to endeavour to acquire this copper mine at as low a price as possible from the parties who were willing to sell it to the company. His duty was to beat down the price to be paid to the best possible figure for which the property could be acquired. That was his duty.

rustee. But, on the other hand, he was only to get this £10,000, as I understand the case, if the company was floated; so that he had a material interest to get the company started, whatever the cost might be to the other shareholders, in order to get the £10,000. His interests were therefore plainly in conflict with his duty; and on that ground alone he is not, as I apprehend, entitled to retain the £10,000.

LORD DEAS.—There is one observation I wish to make. A good deal has been said about counter claims on the part of the defender. I do not mean to give any opinion about these, but I am very clearly of opinion that nothing can be made of them here, whatever may be made of them in a counter action.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with all your Lordships that this is a case of great importance, and also that it is a very clear and even gross case for the application of the general rule of law which your Lordships have stated. The company was registered on the 1st of April 1872, and in the memorandum of association, in that part of it which professes to state the objects for which the company was established, we find that the leading object, without which indeed the existence of the company would be utterly purposeless, is thus expressed—"To buy and carry out a contract dated the 25th and 26th of March 1872, entered into between John George Long, on behalf of himself and other vendors on the one part, and James Henderson of Glasgow, on the other part, for the purchase of a certain mine in Canada. It is obvious, therefore, from this, without going further, that the company was brought into existence for the very purpose of purchasing and working this particular mine. Now, the preliminary contract by which the terms of the sale were settled was a contract in which the nominal vendor was Mr Long and the nominal vendee was Mr James Henderson. The Lord Ordinary has made a slight mistake, in point of fact, in supposing James Henderson to be the defender. He is the defender's nephew. But that circumstance makes not the slightest difference in my mind upon the general result of the case. There can be no doubt that both these gentlemen were mere names, representing other people. The vendors were the persons who had the true interest in this Canadian mine, and the vendees were the persons who were getting up the company, which was registered on the 1st of April. Now, who then were the vendees? So far as I can see, in the first place, the true vendee was the defender, Mr Henderson; because when the first prospectus was issued he appears as the only director of the company, and the other parties who aided him or co-operated with him in framing the prospectus and circulating it privately were parties who were rather interested on the side of the vendors, particularly Mr M'Ewen, who really was the agent of the vendors in Glasgow. The original prospectus thus framed having been privately circulated, some additional names were procured of persons to act as directors. And it is not material to observe that of the gentlemen who are named in the second issue of the prospectus as it was ultimately issued there are only two who are not, in point of fact, bribed to get up this company for the purpose of selling and giving effect to this sale. No doubt the other gentlemen who received money on account of this service received much smaller shares than the defender, and they have made the best reparation in their power by paying the money to the company, with interest; and the position of the defender is that he received £10,000 for giving his name as a director, and for getting up the company along with those other persons, the object or one of the objects at least of these parties in getting up the company being to secure to the vendors the full price of £125,000 as the equivalent for the mine to be sold. Then we have it established by the clearest and most distinct evidence that what Mr Henderson, the defender, stipulated for as the condition of his becoming a director and getting up the company to give effect to this contract of sale was that he should receive from the vendors a certain portion—amounting to £10,000—of the price which was to be paid by the company for the mine. Now, that is enough, I think, for the decision of the case. I think all the other facts may be looked at with advantage in judging of the conduct of the persons who were involved in this transaction, but these are the broad and simple facts upon which I think the decision of the case must rest; and it appears to me that they do close Mr Henderson, the defender, as standing distinctly in this position, and that he was a director of the company at the time that he entered into the arrangement with Mr McEwen and his clients, because the company was not then in existence, but that he stipulated that he should become a director, and so place himself in a fiduciary position for the company, and so assume the duty of managing and protecting the interests of the company when it came into existence, for the very purpose—not perhaps the sole purpose, but for this purpose among others—of compelling the company when it came into existence to adopt and fulfil this contract of sale by which they were to pay that £125,000. I think, therefore, that he just accepted the £10,000 as a bribe to induce him to bring this company into existence, and to make himself a director of the company—he accepted the £10,000 as the consideration upon which he was to perform that office for the vendors of the mine, and thus he placed himself in a position of having a trust duty to perform and a personal interest directly conflicting with that trust duty.

Now, the doctrine of law as applicable to such a case I think cannot be better stated than it is in one passage of the Lord Ordinary's note, in which he says—“Whenever it can be shewn that the trustee has so arranged matters as to obtain an advantage, whether in money or in money's worth, to himself personally through the execution of his trust, he will not be permitted to retain it, but is compelled to make it over to his constituent.” The judgment which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced is just to compel this gentleman to make over the money which he has received to his constituent, the company, and in that judgment, as I said before, I entirely concur.

SIR EDWARD HUNTER BLAIR, Bart., Petitioner.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Kinnear.

Jan. 24, 1877.

Entail, date of—Deed of Alteration—Entail Amendment Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 2.—By deed of entail dated prior to 1st August 1848 the entailer reserved power to alter the destination, and he executed subsequently on 1st August a deed of alteration by which he merely struck out of the entail series of heirs called in the second branch of the destination. Held (reversing the judgment of Lord Adam) that the entail was an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848 in the sense of section 2 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848.

SIR EDWARD HUNTER BLAIR, who was heir of entail in possession of the estates of Brownhill and Blairquhan, in Ayrshire, presented a petition for the disentail of these lands under section 2 of the Entail Amendment Act of 1848. The petitioner had obtained the consent of his eldest son as next heir of entail, who, being more than twenty-one years of age, was entitled to give such consent under 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61, sec. 4. The only question in the case was whether the petitioner was in possession of the estate "by virtue of such tailzie dated prior to the said 1st day of August 1848" as required by the 2d section of the Act of 1848.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
B.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr George Dalziel, W.S., who reported the facts as follows :—"The petitioner, Sir Edward Hunter Blair, is heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates of Brownhill and Blairquhan and others, in the county of Ayr, under and by virtue of a disposition and deed of entail dated 27th August 1840, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies 18th December 1847, and a deed of alteration of heirs of entail dated 22d December 1855, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies 17th January 1856. The granter of both deeds was Sir David Hunter Blair, the petitioner's father, who died on 26th December 1857, and after his death both deeds were recorded in the Books of Council and Session 4th January 1858.

The destination in the deed of entail of 27th August 1840 was,—(1) to be in favour of himself, the said Sir David Hunter Blair, whom he (2) to Captain James Hunter Blair of the Fusilier Guards, his second son, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing (3) to the petitioner, therein named and designed Edward Hunter Blair, ensign in the Regiment of Foot, his second son, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing (4) to certain other heirs-substitute, to whom it is unnecessary particularly to refer.

The deed of entail, however, contained the following reservation in favour of the entailer, viz.—"Reserving always full power and liberty to me at any time of my life, not only to revoke, alter, or add to the foresaid destination and order of succession, as to all or any of the heirs of tailzie and before specified, and also to revoke or alter any of the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, exceptions, irritancies, declarations, reservations, and others before written, at my pleasure, and to alter this present disposition and deed of entail in whole or in part, but to sell, alienate, wadset, or dispose the foresaid lands and estates, or any part thereof, or to contract debt thereupon, or even gratuitously to burden thereof or burden the same, as I shall think proper, without the consent of my said heirs of tailzie, as fully and freely as if these powers had never been granted by me; and also to empower and authorise any of the said heirs of tailzie, or any other person whom I please, to alter or dispense with the foregoing conditions, restrictions, and irritancies, or any of them, after my death, in the same manner as I could do during my life; all which alterations so to be made during my life by me, or after my death by any other person to be empowered by me, to be understood and taken to be a part of the present deed of tailzie, to be recorded in the Register of Entails, and inserted in the subsequent investitures of the said lands and estates, and registered in the Books of Council and Session as aforesaid, and be as effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been inserted herein; declaring that any alteration or revocation of these presents shall not be inferred by implication or construction, but only from an express writing under the hand and seal recalling this present deed, or altering the same in whole or in deed of alteration of heirs, by which he revoked and recalled the nomination of heirs contained in the said disposition and deed of entail, 'in so far as it calls to the succession the said Lieutenant-Colonel (therein designed Captain) James Hunter Blair, my eldest son, and the descendants of his body, whether male or female, and that in every branch of the said destination, in so far as under any of them the said Lieutenant-Colonel James Hunter Blair, or the descendants of his body, whether male or female, would have succeeded, the said Lieutenant-Colonel James Hunter Blair, and the descendants of his body, whether male or female, being now and for ever excluded from succeeding to the tailzied lands and estate under the said deed of entail as if they were dead, or should never exist; and the succession to the said tailzied lands and estate should devolve on the succeeding heirs of tailzie as if the said Lieutenant-Colonel James Hunter Blair, and the descendants of his body, whether male or female, were dead, or had never existed.' This deed of alteration contained an obligation on the heirs of entail to record the same in the Register of Tailzies, a power to the said Sir David Hunter Blair to alter or revoke the same, in whole or in part, at any time of his life, and a reservation of the whole powers reserved to the entailor, under the disposition and deed of entail; but no further exercise of these powers was made by him.

"The deed of alteration affected the whole destination in the entail after the entailor himself, and, in particular, removed from the succession one set of heirs called prior to the petitioner. That deed was therefore so far as the petitioner's right is concerned, an essential part of the entail in virtue of which he is in possession of the entailed estates.

"The entailor, though he recorded both deeds in the Register of Entails, did not expedite infestment thereon in his own favour; and on his death the petitioner made up a title by general service as heir of tail and provision under the deed of entail, in virtue of the deed of alteration and by notarial instrument in his favour, in terms of schedule K of the 'Titles to Land (Scotland) Act, 1858,' an extract of the disposition and deed of entail, and deed of alteration, with warrant of registration thereon, along with the notarial instrument, docquetted with reference thereto, having been recorded in the General Register of Sasines on 28 May 1859."

The Lord Ordinary appointed Mr William Macgillivray, W.S., as curator ad litem to the younger children of the petitioner.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the petitioner is not in possession of the entailed estates of Brownhill and Blairquhan and others by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848: Therefore finds that he has no title to insist in the petition, and dismisses the same, and decerns." *

* "NOTE.— . . . These being the facts of the case, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the petitioner is not heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates by virtue of an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848, and has, therefore, no title to insist in this petition. He thinks that the deed of 1840 and the deed of 1855 together constitute the existing entail of the estates. It will be observed that the deed of the deed of alteration was essentially to alter the destination of the entail. It removed therefrom one whole series of heirs called prior to the petitioner, and, but for the deed of alteration, he might never have been in possession of the estates. The petitioner has made up his title to the estates in virtue of both deeds, so that, in point of fact, he is in possession of them in virtue of both deeds. But if the Lord Ordinary is right in thinking that the deed of 1855 constitutes an essential part of the entail, then it cannot be affirmed that

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued ;—The date of the entail by which he held his lands was prior to 1st August 1848. All that was done by the deed of nomination was to strike out a series of possible heirs. It brought no new heirs into the destination. The first deed was the only title of the petitioner, and it contained all the proper clauses of a deed of entail. It was true that an heir might have come in by virtue of the second deed who might not otherwise have succeeded, but that would have been by virtue of the words “whom failing” in the first deed. The first deed was the only disposing deed, and although the second deed might destroy the rights of some heirs, it could give right to no new ones. It only provided that certain heirs should not succeed just as if those heirs had been dead. What would now require to be proved in the service of remoter heirs would not be the failure by death, but failure by the extinction of these rights by the entailer himself. There could be only one date of the entail, and that must be the date of the first deed.¹

The curator ad litem for the younger children argued ;—The petitioner held the estate in virtue of a tailzie dated subsequent to 1st August 1848. There might be a series of deeds constituting an entail, and the date of the last deed was the date of the entail, because the entail was not complete until the last deed was executed. But for the second deed some of the heirs called might never have succeeded, and as there could only be one date of the entail for all the heirs that date must be the date of the last deed.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has refused the prayer of this petition on the ground that the petitioner is not in possession of the entailed estates by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848, and the only question for our consideration therefore is—What is the date of the deed of entail?

The deed executed by the petitioner's father, Sir David Hunter Blair, by which he entailed the estates, was dated 27th August 1840, and was recorded in the Register of Tailzies 18th December 1847, in the granter's lifetime. If he had only that deed to deal with there could, I apprehend, be no question as to its answers to the description of a tailzie dated prior to 1st August 1848. If this deed contained a power of revocation and alteration, and in virtue of that reserved power the entailer executed another deed, dated 22d December 1856, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies on 17th January 1856—that is, a deed subsequent to 1848 ; and so, if the latter be held to be the true date of the petitioner is in possession of the estates by virtue of an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848.

“The petitioner maintained that the deed of 1840, seeing that it contained conveyance of the estates and the whole fettering clauses of the entail, truly constituted the entail of the estates, and that the deed of alteration was only evidence of the petitioner's right to succeed under it, and the case of Porterfield Shaw Stewart, 23d September 1831, 5 W. and S., p. 515, was referred to in support of that proposition. The Lord Ordinary does not think that the case of Porterfield has any application to the present case. He thinks that the destination is an essential part of an entail, and that in this case it is only to be found in the two deeds taken together.”

No. 54. entail, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right—if the former, it must be altered.

Jan. 24, 1877.
Blair.

The petition is presented under the second branch of the 2d section of the Entail Amendment Act, which permits "any heir of entail, though born before the said 1st day of August 1848, being of full age, and in possession of an entailed estate by virtue of such tailzie dated prior to the said 1st day of August 1848, with the consent (and not otherwise) of the heir next in succession, being then apparent under the entail of the heir in possession, he, the heir-apparent, being born on or after the said 1st day of August 1848, and being of the age of twenty-five years complete at the time of granting such consent, and not subject to any legal incapacity, to acquire such estate in whole or in part in fee-simple by executing under authority of the Court an instrument of disentail as aforesaid, in the form and manner hereinafter provided."

Now, it appears to me that under this and the other clauses of the statute authorising disentailes the expression "date of the deed of entail," and the phrases that occur again and again, "dated prior to the said 1st day of August 1848" and "dated subsequent to the said 1st day of August 1848," are not in any technical sense, but are to be taken in their ordinary meaning, and that there is no peculiar legal construction to be put upon them. I can very well understand that there may be two deeds affecting the settlement of an entailed estate regarding which it may be very difficult to say which is the more important of the two. The estate may be entailed by a deed of entail containing a precept and procuratory of resignation, clauses irritant and resolutive, a disposition to a certain series of heirs, and all the other clauses requisite in an entail; and by a subsequent deed that first one may be so altered, though not revoked, that it is no longer valid to such an extent as to entitle it to be held the more important of the two. In such a case it may be very difficult to hold that the date of the first deed is the date of the entail. Probably in such a case, when the first deed is so far altered, the date of the last deed would be held as the date of the entail, as it contains the more important provisions.

But, on the other hand, I can easily understand this too, that a second deed may be executed which can hardly in any sense be said to affect the deed of entail. Suppose a destination to A and the heirs-male of his body, failing, to B and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to certain heirs afterwards to be named, whom failing, to C, and that a deed is afterwards executed by which the destination, left, as I may say, blank in the first deed, is filled up and a series of heirs named, I do not think that the date of any such subsequent deed as that could, in any reasonable sense, be said to be the date of the entail. No doubt this nomination requires to be looked to in order to complete the destination, but there is no conveyance of the estate, nor fetters the destination; it is really nothing more than a deed to fill up the blank in the destination in the first deed, and so render the first deed complete in accordance with the desire of the entailer. To hold otherwise would lead to the most anomalous results, because if the case of heirs claiming under the third branch of the destination in the deed I have supposed entitles an objector to say "I hold under a deed dated subsequent to August 1848," that objection would of course only apply to the heirs called under the third branch of the destination and if the date of the entail with reference to such an heir must be held to be subsequent to August 1848, what shall we say of the case of A and his heirs, B and his heirs, who take under the original destination without reference deed of nomination at all? The result would be that persons taking the estate under the same deed of entail would be holding it the one under an entail created prior to 1848, the other under a deed dated subsequent to 1848. That decides me that it is not every deed affecting the principal deed of entail that will have the effect of bringing the date of the entail down to the date of the creation of the subsequent deed. In short, I take it that where the subsequent deed is only required to shew that the estate has devolved on a certain heir, and merely evidence that he is entitled to serve as heir, that deed is not such an integral part of the deed of entail as to alter its date.

Now, applying that to the present case, I find that this case differs only from that in which the second deed is a deed of nomination in this respect, that the second deed here is a deed of revocation striking out one branch of the destination and letting in the next branch to take the estate earlier than they would otherwise have taken. The conveyance in the original deed is first to the tailer's "eldest son, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to his second son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing," to various other heirs. Now, the deed of alteration and revocation simply strikes out the first branch. In point of fact, the eldest son was at this time dead, and the object of the deed is to prevent any possible issue of the eldest son from succeeding under the first deed, and merely to clear the way for the succession of the petitioner as the nearest heir of entail of his father. Now, is that a more unfavourable case than the case where the second deed is a deed of nomination for bringing the date of the first deed to be the date of the entail? On the contrary, I think it is a more favourable case. It is in virtue of the destination in the first deed that the petitioner takes; it is by the first deed that he is called to succession; his name is in the original destination, and in virtue of that destination he has taken the estate. If there had been any one to take under the first branch of the destination he would have been excluded by the deed of alteration, but the petitioner was heir of entail under the first deed, and therefore I am of opinion that the interlocutor should be recalled, and the petition referred to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure, on the footing that the deed of entail, by virtue of which the petitioner is heir in possession of these estates, is dated prior to 1st August 1848.

MR DEAS.—The deed of entail was executed on 27th August 1840, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies on 18th December 1847. The deed of alteration was not executed till 22d December 1855, and the question is whether the deed of alteration can be regarded as a new deed of entail, or has the effect of bringing the date of the entail. I am very clearly of opinion that it has neither the one effect nor the other, and I come to that conclusion on well established feudal principles in our law of conveyancing.

The deed of 1840 is complete in all its clauses, and it contains, inter alia, a reservation—"Reserving always full power and liberty to me at any time of me not only to make, revoke, alter, and add to the foresaid course and order of succession as to all or any of the heirs of tailzie and provision before specified, also to revoke and alter any of the conditions, provisions, restrictions, stipulations, exceptions, irritancies, declarations, reservations, and others before made in at my pleasure, and to recall this present disposition in whole or in part." Acting on this reserved power as regarded the course of succession, the tailer, by the deed of 1855, recalled the nomination of certain of the heirs

Blair.

But the petitioner has nevertheless succeeded under the dispositive clause of the deed of 1840. There is no dispositive clause in the deed of 1855, as it does not require to be. It was the very object of the reserved power to enable the entailor to vary the destination without, in other respects, varying or altering the deed of entail. The effect of striking out certain of the nominees would leave the dispositive clause as if they had never been in, and if, in place of the entailor had added others, the effect would have been the same as if others had been in ab initio. This is a fundamental principle in the law of entail. There is here but one deed of entail, and that deed is prior to 1st August 1848. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be altered.

LORD MURK declined, as being an heir of entail under the deed.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with your Lordships in holding that the petitioner is entitled, with the consent of his eldest son, the heir-apparent next in line to the entailed estates, to have the estates disentailed under the authority of the Court, as prayed for in the petition.

The petitioner's right depends on the meaning of the words "any deed dated prior to the said 1st day of August 1848," occurring in the 2d section of the Entail Amendment Act of that year. In the 1st section referring to deeds dated after 1st August 1848 the words used are, "where any estate in Scotland shall be entailed by a deed of tailzie dated on or after the said 1st day of August 1848." It appears to me that the words "tailzie" in the 2d section, and "tailzie" in the 1st, are used to designate that instrument or deed by which an entail has been created,—the deed of conveyance executed by the proprietor reserving the destination, and the fettering clauses, or the equivalent conveyance registered in the Register of Tailzies, and which is the origin or foundation of the subsequent investitures of the institute and substitute.

In the present case the only deed which answers this description is the deed of entail by the petitioner's father, dated 27th August 1847, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies in December 1847. If that deed had regulated the subsequent investitures there could be no question of the rights of the heirs of entail under the Entail Amendment Act would be maintained that the effect of the deed of alteration executed under the reserved power by the entailor by which he struck out of the destination the body of his eldest son, was to alter the date of the tailzie, and the entailor and the heirs of entail thereafter hold the estates under a deed dated after August 1848, viz., in December 1855, when the deed of alteration was executed. I am of opinion that this view is unsound. It is true that the deed of alteration has had a material effect on the petitioner's right, or at least it may be assumed to have had such an effect in calling him to the succession as the heir-male of the body of his elder brother, if such heirs existed; but this to be so, the deed of entail under which he holds the estate is the original instrument of 1840, containing the only conveyance of the estate, and the conditions, prohibitions, and fettering clauses by which his position and defined. The execution of a deed of alteration affecting a part of the No. 54.

 then leaves the original deed operative as the only deed containing the substance of the estate and the substance of the entail. It can have no effect Jan. 24, 1877.
 before the date of the original instrument. In ordinary as well as in legal Blair.
 sense the first deed is well described as the deed of entail dated in 1840, the later deed as a deed of alteration dated in 1855. It is said the second is an essential part of the petitioner's title, and so to him an essential part of entail. In a sense it may be admitted this is true. The later deed, immune though it be, operates, however, not by cutting down or superseding the deed of entail, but by taking that deed as a good and subsisting entail and the modification only of one of its clauses. However important the deed may have been as affecting the destination in the deed of entail so as to alter the petitioner's right of succession, it leaves the estate subject to the deed as the instrument which conveys the estate, which prescribes the terms under which the estate is to be held, and the destination which it has effect, except in so far as altered; and that original deed, in my opinion, retains, therefore, the instrument or deed of tailzie under which the estate is held within the meaning of the statute. It would be otherwise if any alteration effected on an entail were carried out, not by a deed of the description above, but by a deed revoking or superseding the original entail, creating a new conveyance. In that case the new conveyance would be the creation of a new entail and the origin of the subsequent alterations, and would therefore become the tailzie, the date of which is fixed in the statute. The present case, however, is not one of that kind;
 I am of opinion that the execution of the deed of 1855, affecting the estate only in the original deed of tailzie, left the estate, in the meaning of the statute, in the position of being held under the original deed or instrument of 1840, and so under an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor: Find that the petitioner is the heir of entail in possession of the estates of Brownhill and Blairquhan and others, by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st of August 1848; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the matter of this petition in accordance with the above finding."

of Guild—Jurisdiction—Dean of Guild Jurisdiction of Police Magistrates for the General Police Act, 1862, sec. 408.—Held (by Lord Curriehill) under the 408th section of the General Police Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict.
 the magistrates of police of Hamilton, a burgh of regality which had before that Act, possessed the powers and jurisdiction relative to buildings belonging to the Magistrates or Dean of Guild of a royal burgh in Scotland.

In 1875 the magistrates and town-council of the burgh of Hamilton, Outer-House.
 had previously adopted the whole of the General Police Act of Ld. Curriehill.
 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, resolved in virtue of the powers conferred Mr Shield,
 Clerk.

No. 54a. by sec. 408 of that Act* to establish a Dean of Guild Court. They subsequently published rules for regulating the procedure thereof, and appointed a clerk and assessor and a procurator-fiscal.

Jan. 24, 1877. Tainsh v. Magistrates of Hamilton.

In 1876 John Tainsh, a proprietor of ground in the burgh, having proceeded to erect a house without applying to the said Court, the procurator-fiscal presented a petition for and obtained interdict from the magistrates in their Dean of Guild Court. Tainsh having proceeded with the building was fined for breach of interdict and contempt of Court.

He then raised the present action of declarator, reduction, and damages against the provost and magistrates of the burgh of Hamilton, the town clerk of the burgh, and the superintendent of police, concluding—(1) That they have it declared that no Dean of Guild Court exists, or has ever existed in the burgh of Hamilton; that neither the defenders, nor any of the burgh authorities, are entitled to establish a Dean of Guild Court in the burgh, or to promulgate or enforce rules of procedure in such Court, or to exercise the powers of jurisdiction of a Dean of Guild Court relative to buildings, or to interfere with the erection of buildings by the inhabitants in the manner specified in the summons; that the rules promulgated by the defenders are ultra vires of them, and not binding on the pursuer or any other person, and that the pursuer and all other persons, owners of property within the burgh, are entitled to build thereon, on compliance with the requirements of the 202d, 204th, and 205th clauses of the Act of 1862: (2) For reduction of all the proceedings in the present action of interdict and breach of interdict already referred to: And (3) For damages in respect of the stoppage of his building operations.

The defenders maintained that the proceedings referred to were incompetent, and asked absolvitor—(1) In respect that the burgh of Hamilton is a royal burgh; and (2) That assuming the burgh not to be a royal burgh, it is a burgh of regality, and a parliamentary burgh, and not such, having adopted the General Police Act of 1862, it was and is entitled to exercise through its magistrates the functions and jurisdiction of a Dean of Guild Court as if it had been a royal burgh.

The pursuer maintained that sec. 408 did not confer the ædile jurisdiction of a Dean of Guild, but merely a sort of police jurisdiction to punish persons charged with certain petty police offences.

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th November 1876, held that Hamilton was not a royal burgh, but upon the second ground of defence absolved the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons.*

* Sec. 408. "The magistrates of police of a burgh under this Act, or any or more of such magistrates, . . . shall have all such and the like jurisdiction within such burgh as any magistrates of a royal burgh, or any dean of a royal burgh, has by the law of Scotland within the royal burgh in or to which he acts as such magistrate or dean of guild."

* "NOTE.— . . . It seems to be clear that the magistrates of the burgh, as magistrates of police, are entitled under section 408 to the same oversight of buildings that the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh, or of any other royal burgh, has in the royal burgh of which he is Dean of Guild. Now, it cannot be disputed that the Dean of Guild of a royal burgh is entitled not only to prevent the owner within burgh from building so as to encroach upon the ground of his neighbours, but also to prevent the erection or structural alteration of any building, unless and until by the exhibition of proper plans, and, if necessary, personal inspection, he is satisfied that the building may proceed with safety to the community. But further, section 408 of the Act confers on the magistrates the same jurisdiction in every respect as is or may be exercised not only by the Dean of Guild, but by the magistrates of any royal burgh. Dun v. Bain.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Issue.—A writer in a newspaper article, professing to describe a visit, after an absence of twenty years, to a farm belonging to a charitable trust, stated—"The fields, which once yielded useful, various, plentiful crops, are now redolent with whin and broom, and betoken the sense of the sluggard." . . . "In short, turn we where we may, the most rant abuse of fields, gardens, orchards, policies, house, and farm-steading is present. We did not ask who farmed the soil, occupied the house, or used the steading, as enough existed to shew that, be he who he may, he is barely worth a place on this fair earth." "The stable and offices . . . bear traces of the most manifest indolence and destructiveness, carelessness and recklessness." "As a matter of course, time works changes; but the short space of sixty years would never have wrought such devastation had the keeping of the place been entrusted to honest, careful, and persevering hands." In an action of damages for slander brought against the writer by the tenant of the farm the pursuer averred that the statements in the article referred to, and falsely and calumniously represented him as "a sluggard, and dishonest as a tenant in the management of said farm, and also as indolent, and neglective, and careless, and reckless in said management and in his business as farmer, and that he has abused and neglected the said farm occupied by him in such a way that he, the pursuer, is barely worth a place upon the earth." He held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue "whether the said article, or thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as being dishonest, or makes similar false and calumnious imputations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage." Lord Shand dissenting, on the grounds (1) that the article did not contain a charge of dishonesty against the farmer; and (2) that the innuendo in the issue stated was different from the innuendo upon the record.

It is held that in royal burghs where there is no Dean of Guild the magistrates are entitled to exercise the authority of Dean of Guild. This is laid down by Bankton, iv. 20, sec. 7, where he says:—"In some burrows there is no dean of guild. In such cases those matters that belong to the Dean of Guild Court are within the cognizance of the magistrates, with advice of the council, to whose jurisdiction that of the dean of guild is understood to be annexed, where by the constitution of the burrow no separate Guild Court is established." Erskine also, 2, ix. 10:—"Where the usage is not fixed, the Dean of Guild or other magistrate charged with the police appears to be trusted with a discretionary power of directing the buildings within burgh, subject to the review of the Court of Session." And the law as stated by Bankton and Erskine is fully recognised by the opinions of the Judges in the case of Milne, 4 D. 3, Lammond v. Cumming, 12 W. 784. Indeed, so necessary is it that some such jurisdiction as that exercised by the Dean of Guild in royal burghs should be exercised by the magistrates or governing bodies of populous places, such as burghs of barony and burghs, that the Court has held that the magistrates of Paisley, a burgh of barony, who had immemorially exercised the jurisdiction as to buildings which a guild could have exercised in a royal burgh, were entitled to continue to do so.—Neilson, 7 Sh. 182. And I think that the intention of the Legislature in enacting sec. 408 of the General Police Act of 1862, was to confer upon the magistrates of all burghs of every kind which adopted the system of adiale jurisdiction, which, in the case of Paisley, a burgh of regality, the magistrates had acquired by usage. I am therefore of opinion that the magistrates of Hamilton were entitled to constitute themselves a Dean of Guild, and to issue and enforce the rules mentioned in the declaratory conclusions of the summons. It is indeed asserted in one of the pleas in law for the defender that these rules are unusual and unreasonable; but this point was not insisted on at the debate, and I must say that these rules do not appear to be either unusual or unreasonable."

Dun v. Bain.1st Division.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

THIS was an action of damages for slander brought by George Dun, farmer in Brooklands, Kirkcudbright, against John Bain, Stranraer. The pursuer averred;—(Cond 1) "The pursuer, George Dun of Bradedden, a farmer at Brooklands, in the parish of Kirkpatrick-Durham and stewartry of Kirkcudbright. He has been tenant of the lands and of Brooklands for sixteen and a half years, and his lease thereof expired Whitsunday 1879. The defender, John Bain, resides in Hanover Stranraer, in the county of Wigton." (Cond. 2) "On 28th June 1876, defender wrote and caused to be published in the 'Dumfriesshire Galloway Herald and Register' of that date an article entitled 'A Visit to Brooklands, parish of Kirkpatrick-Durham, Kirkcudbrightshire,' which was in the following or similar terms:—'After an absence of twenty years, we paid a visit to the land of our early associations. I looked in vain for the happy scenes that had gladdened us in the days yore. Not a vestige was left of what once beamed comfort and happiness. All was gone, and the ruthless hand of the destroyer had laid to his work of destruction, and the scene was changed. . . . The once beautiful and well-kept laurel and other evergreens were in a state of moral decay. The avenue is overgrown with moss and grass, and she points her iron fingers to the devastating work she has so determinedly carried out. The hedges which grew and thrived so well are everywhere and there broken down, as if for the convenience of the ingress and egress of cattle to and from the pasture. The snowdrops and lilies which beautified the place twenty years ago seem to have undergone the process of "thinning." . . . The fields which once yielded useful, and plentiful crops are now redolent with whin and broom, and bear the presence of the sluggard. The garden, once the pride of the estate, a joy of life, has all but fallen into disuse. The stables and office-houses at the farm-stead, at one time extravagantly and elegantly fitted and tastefully arranged internally and externally, bear traces of the manifest indolence and destructiveness, carelessness and recklessness. . . . short, turn we where we may, the most flagrant abuse of fields, gardens, orchards, policies, house, and farm-stead, is apparent. We did not know who farmed the soil, occupied the house, or used the farm-stead, but enough existed to shew that, be he who he may, he is barely fit to place on this fair earth. . . . A more glaring corruption of the place was once a privileged place, of what was once an enchanting home, what once possessed all the endearments of a delightful country residence have been obliterated. As a matter of course, time works change, but in the short space of twenty years would never have wrought such deterioration had the keeping of the place been entrusted to honest, careful, persevering hands. Let us ask who is to blame for all this? It is known that the estate of Brooklands was committed to a trust. It comes to us to ask in all faithfulness if this trust has done its duty. We fear if they (the trustees) were "weighed in the balance they would be found wanting." This is a public trust, and we will be excused if we put the question as above in all frankness, and in an honest, candid manner. The revenue of the estate was to be devoted to the education and bringing of orphan children, not children connected with the parish, but those belonging to Scotland and England throughout, and we are right if we ventilate the grounds of our complaint, by asking if the essence of the trust has been preserved? We write from no personal motives, malignant or vindictive spirit. The matter is a public one, and the public in justice ought to have the whole affair thoroughly sifted. Now that we have written freely on the matter, we trust the public will not agitate the question till such times as the issue is favourably divulged."

The third article, as amended in the Inner-House, was—(Cond. 3) "The id article, and the statements made therein, or some of them, have reference to the pursuer, and to the farm of Brooklands occupied by him, and sely and calumniously represent that the pursuer is a sluggard, and dishonest as a tenant in the management of his said farm, and also as in-lent, and destructive, and careless, and reckless in said management d in his business as a farmer, and that he has abused and neglected the d farm occupied by him in such a way that he (the pursuer) is barely rth a place upon the earth, or contain representations in reference to : pursuer in regard to his management of said farm, and in his business a farmer, of the same or a similar kind, and equally false and calum-nias. The said representations were calculated to injure and did injure : pursuer in his business as a farmer. They will tend to prevent him aining the same or another farm when his present lease expires at tuesday 1879."

Dun v. Bain.

The defender admitted that the article was written and published by m, and explained "that the statements of fact in the said article were me, and that the comments thereon were fair comments upon a public mter, and were made without malice, and in the discharge of a public ny."

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are not rele- at to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The said article does t import any slander of the pursuer, and, separatim, the same is privi- ed, and having been written and published without malice, the defender ntitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary approved of the following issue :—"It being ad- ded that, on or about 28th June 1876, the defender, John Bain, wrote caused to be published in the 'Dumfriesshire and Galloway Herald d Register' of that date the article contained in the schedule hereunto nered. Whether the said article, or part thereof, is of and concerning e pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer was luggard, and so careless and hurtful in his management of the farm of ooklands, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, of which the pursuer is the ant, as to be dishonest in the matter of the obligations incumbent on n as the tenant of the said farm, or makes similar false and calumnious ecentations of and regarding the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and age? Damages laid at £500."

The pursuer gave notice of a motion to vary this issue, and proposed following issue (the admission being the same as in the issue approved y the Lord Ordinary) :—"Whether the said article, or part thereof, is and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents t the pursuer was a sluggard, and was not honest and careful in his egement of the farm of Brooklands, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, hich the pursuer is the tenant, and that the pursuer had so flagrantly ed and destroyed the whole subjects comprehended in said farm as e barely worth a place upon the earth, or makes similar false and umnious representations of and regarding the pursuer, to his loss, in- y, and damage?"

Argued for the pursuer;—There was here a general charge of dishonesty inst the person who occupied the farm of Brooklands. The pursuer's e of the farm would shortly terminate, and the article would render it eult for him to get another farm.

Argued for the defender;—There was no proper charge of dishonesty the article. The word "honest" no doubt occurred, but in such a con- tion as to shew that the meaning was not "active" or "diligent," and : the ordinary sense of the word. The observations referred rather to the

No. 55. management of the trustees of the charity, who were the pursuer's landlords, than to the pursuer. If this was a slander at all, it was in a matter of the pursuer's business. Any one interested was entitled to say that a tradesman conducted his business badly.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that the following should be the issue in the trial of the case :—

"It being admitted that, on or about 28th June 1876, the defender, John Bain, wrote and caused to be published in the 'Dumfriesshire and Galloway Herald and Register' of that date the article contained in the schedule hereto annexed:

"Whether the said article, or part thereof, is of and concerning the pursuer and falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as being dishonest, or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to his loss, injury, and damage?"

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am unable to agree with your Lordships, and the ground of my difference of opinion is shortly this, that I do not think the article complained of, on any reasonable construction of its terms, will bear the innuendo put to it either in the issue as now framed or in the record. The general nature of the article is a statement by the writer of his present observations and feelings, looking in view his early recollections of the estate of Brooklands. It is in high-flown, absurd, and incongruous language—language so absurd that it may, I think, have been well passed over as unworthy of notice. The utmost that, in my opinion, can justly be said of it is, that the farm is represented as being in a state of decay, and allowed to go to ruin. The imputation is one of negligent, slovenly, and reckless farming. It may possibly be said that there is a charge against the tenant that he has violated or failed to fulfil the stipulations contained in his contract with the landlords. It has not been seriously maintained that these imputations will support an issue. The charge complained of in the issue is one of dishonesty; but I confess I see nothing in the article to show that the writer meant to impute fraud or dishonesty. The passage found fault with is that in which it is said that matters would have been different "had the keeping of the place been entrusted to honest, careful, and persevering hands." But that phrase occurs where the neglect of the farm is the only subject of observation or discussion; and, in my opinion, by no straining can it be made to mean more than that the farm was not honestly or diligently laboured,—in other words, that care, perseverance, and honest labour were wanting to bring it into a state of proper cultivation. If the pursuer had asked for an issue on the innuendo that the article charged him with bigamy, or forgery, or theft, he would have asked an issue so obviously extravagant as to be inadmissible. The difference in the innuendo here put. It is a difference in degree only. The issue puts so unreasonable and forced a construction on the article that I think it ought not to be given.

The issue is, I think, open to the additional objection, that, as now framed, the innuendo differs from that put upon the record. The imputation complained of on record is that the pursuer is "dishonest as a tenant in the management of his farm," which, as I understand the language, means dishonest towards diords. The issue now adjusted substitutes for this a charge of general dishonesty, not as a tenant, but as a man in his ordinary dealings. I put it to the pursuer's counsel during the argument whether he could point to any word or expression in the article to support a charge of general dishonesty, and he failed to do so. I think the issue should not be given, and that the article complained of is not actionable at the pursuer's instance.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor approving of the issue proposed by the Lord President, and finding no expenses due since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Property—Urban Tenement—Servitude—Common Interest.—Two conterminous proprietors of houses and building stances in a street had under their titles, derived from a common author, a right of free ish and entry to their respective subjects by means of a meuse lane at the back. Held that the one proprietor was not entitled to build a shop over the lane opposite his ground converting it into a covered passage.

JAMES BENNETT and James Playfair were proprietors of conterminous holdings of ground and houses in Holland Place, Glasgow. A meuse lane, eight feet wide, ran at the back of the subjects parallel to the street, the titles of Bennett and Playfair, which were derived from a common author, contained a grant of free ish and entry to the respective subjects of the meuse lane, which the titles declared to be the eastern boundary of each property.

Playfair, who had two steadings, after obtaining a decree of lining in the Dean of Guild Court, built a joiner's shop over the lane opposite the whole length of his stading, upwards of fifty feet, leaving a passage below ten feet high. The whole length of the lane was about ninety-eight feet. Bennett raised this action, concluding for reduction of the decree of the Dean of Guild Court, and declarator that the defender had no right to erect any building over the lane, and for interdict and removal of the shop. The defence was that the pursuer's right of ish and entry was not infringed with.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the reasons of the pursuer; repels the defences; decerns in terms of the reductive and declaratory conclusions of the libel: Interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the defender from, and decerns: Further, decerns and ordains the defender forthwith to take down and remove a joiner's workshop or premises, or other building or structure erected by him upon, above, or across the lane mentioned in the summons, at or near the south end of, and all other buildings or structures of any kind erected by him upon, above, or across any part of said lane: Quoad ultra continues the decree: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

*NOTE.—The properties of the pursuer and defender are derived from a common author. They lie between Holland Place and a meuse lane, which, in several dispositions, is given as the boundary on the east. In the titles it is declared that the pursuer and defender shall have free ish and entry to their respective premises by this meuse lane.

The defender has erected over this meuse lane an archway of the entire width of his property, and eleven feet high. The length of the arch is about forty-five feet. The defender does not pretend that he has any right of Bennett v.

Playfair.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer had a bare right of servitude, which was not interfered with. There was no common interest which was the ground of decision in previous cases where such building had not been allowed.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have never met with a more extravagantly untenable contention than that maintained by the defender. A meuse lane runs between these houses, eight feet wide and apparently ninety-eight feet long. By the titles each of the parties have the use of the lane as an access to their property, and neither of them has any other right to it.

The defender has built over the portion opposite his own steadings about three feet in length, so as to convert the greater part of the open lane into a wall ten feet in height, and this he maintains he is entitled to do because the pursuer has no right but one of access, which it is said is not interfered with. I am very clearly of opinion that the defender's operations are utterly illegal.

LORD DEAS.—This is really not a debateable question. The parties have each the same kind of right, whatever that may be. I am disposed to think it is a right of common interest, because both parties are bound to pave and maintain the lane, precisely as proprietors on both sides of a street are bound to pave and maintain the street, which affords one of the most familiar instances of common interest.

But it does not matter whether the right is a right of common interest or a right of servitude. Each has a right of precisely the same kind, and one party is no more entitled to interfere with the enjoyment of the other in a mutual right of servitude and the mode of exercising it than he has to interfere with his neighbour in a right of common interest. A covered way or tunnel which excludes wholly or partially the light and air may or may not be preferable for some purposes, but certainly is not the same with an uncovered passage.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

A domiciled Englishman, proprietor of a house in Scotland, in whose property in the lane, nor does he dispute that the pursuer is entitled to 'pass and entry' by means of it. But he maintains that the arch does not interfere with the pursuer's rights, and that the pursuer has therefore no right to object to it.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defender is wrong. The pursuer is entitled to access to his property by means of the meuse lane. To convert the lane by an arch is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, to interfere with this right of access. As he reads the titles it was intended that the lane should be by an open lane, and the arch would make some legitimate use of the lane impossible."

side), sold his house and removed to England. He signed a disposition of the property on 30th March, which was delivered to the purchaser on 1st April, giving the date of the purchaser's entry. A summons was served on him on 4th April, by leaving a copy and citation at the house where he had been resident within forty days. The disposition was not recorded by the purchaser till 6th April. Held that at the date of citation the Court had no longer jurisdiction over the defender in respect of proprietorship of heritable property in Scotland. No. 57. Jan. 24, 1877. Bowman v. Wright.

THE following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk:—"The circumstances of the case are these: The pursuer is an architect in Greenock, and in November 1872 he was engaged by the defender, Mr Wright, to erect for him at Pollockshields a semi-detached house according to plans to be prepared by him and approved by the defender. The work was performed, and for the balance of the price this action has been raised. 2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. 1.

"Before, however, the summons was served on the defender he had moved to England. He was by birth an Englishman, and is now again domiciled Englishman, residing in London.

"Before he left Scotland he had sold the villa which the pursuer had built for him. The disposition was signed on the 30th March and delivered to the purchaser on the 1st April 1876. The latter day was the date of the purchaser's entry to possession. The disposition was recorded in the Register of Sasines on 6th April.

"The summons in this action was signeted on 3d April, and on the following day was served by leaving a copy at the villa in question, where the defender had last resided in Scotland, and that within forty days prior to the service.

"The defender had no other heritable property in Scotland at the date of citation, and he has not acquired any since."

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender not being subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and, in particular, not having had a domicile nor heritable property in Scotland when this action was raised, the action ought to be dismissed.

The Lord Ordinary repelled this plea.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Though the defender had been

*NOTE.—The question which has been decided is this: The defender was owner of the villa referred to on the record. On 30th March last he disposed of it, with entry as at 1st April, and on 6th April the disposition was recorded. In the interval, however, betwixt 30th March and 6th April the action was raised, and consequently it has come to pass that the plea of no jurisdiction—which is the plea repelled by the foregoing interlocutor—has been presented. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this plea cannot be allowed. The defender might have sold the property, or leased the property, charged the property with debt, to any one ignorant of the disposition still unrecorded, and this consideration the Lord Ordinary thinks is enough to shew in the sense in which the words are received, when the application of the law that possessors of heritable estate in Scotland are subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts is the point to be decided, the defender, notwithstanding the granting of the disposition, continued till it was recorded the possessor of the property. Authorities were cited on both sides at the debate. The defender referred to Erskine, 1, 2, 16, and to Fraser v. Fraser, 8 Macph. p. 400. The pursuer founded on 1 Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, 3d ed., p. 87 (2d ed. p. 81), Bell's Principles, 1181, 1 Bell's Com. (5th ed.) p. 66, and Kirk v. Irvine, 16 S., p. 1200. All that the Lord Ordinary has to observe in these is, that the authorities adduced by the pursuer at least go the length of sustaining the jurisdiction of the Court in this case, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, and that those brought forward by the defender are not inconsistent with the judgment which has been pronounced."

proprietor of Scotch heritage, he had divested himself prior to action being raised, which was on 4th April. He had signed the disposition on the 30th March, and given the purchaser entry on 1st April, nothing more was required of him, nor could he personally do any more to sever his connection with the property. He had no power the recording of the disposition, which the purchaser might delay at pleasure. In truth, this was an attempt to make two parties subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts, in respect, not only of the subject, but of the same right in the same subject, viz., the full right in the property. The foundation of the rule was that heritable property in a fixed subject which could be made available to satisfy the judgment. But that element was wanting here. The defender was totally divested of the delivery of the disposition, and though a bare infeftment stood in his person he had no right or interest in the property which he could make available, except by gross fraud.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—The disposer of heritable property remains absolute owner until divested by registration of the disponee's infeftment.² It was undoubtedly law that the disponee's right, so long as he left it without the protection of the register, could be defeated by a completed adjudication. This was a sufficient test of the right which remained in the disposer, and shewed it was sufficient to found jurisdiction. It was, at any rate, quite as substantial a right as that of a superiority defeasible at the will of the disposer, which had been sustained as a ground of jurisdiction.³ The principle, which jurisdiction in respect of heritable property was founded on, was that the property was a subject which might satisfy the judgment, that the bare connection with land in Scotland inferred allegiance to the sovereign, as superior thereof, and subjection to the Courts established therein. It rested just as much on a fiction as jurisdiction founded on arrestment. And there was no necessity for any more substantial ground of property in the one case than in the other.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question of some importance as to jurisdiction. The Lord Ordinary has sustained the jurisdiction of the Court over the defender, who now disputes the correctness of that judgment.

The circumstances of the case are these :—(After stating the facts as above.) The question is, whether the right or interest which the defender had in the house in question at Pollockshields at the date of citation is sufficient to found jurisdiction over him in this Court.

The Lord Ordinary has repelled the plea of no jurisdiction, on the authority of a variety of cases, in which it was held that a real right in heritable property in Scotland, however slight and valueless that right may be, is sufficient to constitute jurisdiction, and he has held that this case falls under that rule. I am, however, of opinion that we have no jurisdiction here, and that a fiction, but on a reality. It is not like jurisdiction founded by arrestment the debtor's moveable property, which is a fiction introduced for the benefit commerce. This is clearly pointed out in the case of Cameron v. Chapman,¹ which Lord Corehouse distinguishes between these two kinds of jurisdiction—jurisdiction which arises from the arrestment of moveables, and of which the ester alone can avail himself,—and the more general jurisdiction which arises in the mere proprietorship of heritable property in Scotland.

The only question, therefore, is, was Wright proprietor at the date of citation any heritage within Scotland, for it is admitted that he has acquired none and I am of opinion that he was not, for he had sold what he previously ed, and the right to it was vested in the purchaser, so far at least as he, Wright, was concerned. I do not think that it matters that under the Act of 1617, cap.
1, the disponee's right might have been evacuated in favour of a second bona purchaser first infest, or might have been burdened by a lease granted at the date of the disposition. These are rights which the Legislature has right proper to confer on bona fide purchasers, taking advantage of our system of registration, and upon tenants, but not rights remaining in the original owner, who has done all he could to divest himself. It comes to this, that anything which the defender could have done to affect the property would not have been the exercise of a right but the commission of a fraud, and the power to affect property by the commission of a fraud cannot be treated as a right of property.
Being thus of opinion that this matter is to be looked on according to the letter and substance of the thing, I am clear that we have no jurisdiction over the defender, and have no alternative but to dismiss the action. His creditor may sue him in his proper forum.

LORD ORMDALE—The question for the determination of the Court in this is whether there is jurisdiction over the defender. The pursuer maintains that it is, in respect that at the date of raising the action the defender had heritable property, consisting of a villa and some relative ground, in Scotland.
The other hand the defender denies that when the action was raised he had heritable property in Scotland, the villa and ground referred to having been previously sold by him.

It cannot be disputed that the fact of a person having heritable property in Scotland is sufficient to give jurisdiction over him in this Court, not only in all actions relating to that property, but generally in all actions of a merely pecuniary nature. The same rule applies to jurisdiction founded by the arrestment of moveable funds or estate. And the jurisdiction, either in respect of the defender having heritable property, or of his moveable funds or estate being arrested under the edictio fundandæ causæ, is not limited to the heritable property or to the estate so arrested, but is general, and will sustain pecuniary actions to any amount.
It is of any consequence that the heritable subjects or the arrested funds, of small or trifling value or amount. It is enough that there is some heritable property or some arrested funds, however small or trifling. The principle upon which the rule has been recognised is that where there is property, funds, or effects fixed within the jurisdiction which, although not immediately brought into question by the action, and wholly incommensurate with the claim sued for, may be affected by the judgment or decree to be pronounced, that is enough to constitute jurisdiction. And provided there is jurisdiction constituted in one of the ways now explained against a defender, it is of no consequence that he is a foreigner, and is not, and never has himself been, personally resident in Scotland, and may be in complete ignorance of any action that is brought or contemplated against him.

A jurisdiction so anomalous and peculiar is plainly, I think, not to be sustained unless it is made to appear very clearly and unmistakeably to exist; and certainly it ought not to be extended beyond the limits within which it has been hitherto exercised. None of the precedents referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note appears to me to be in point, although they may more or less serve to illustrate the principle.

Now, in the present case, the action was raised on the 3d of April 1877. But the defender had left Scotland and taken up his residence in London in September of the previous year; and he had also sold the villa and ground, the only heritable property to which the pursuer refers as founding jurisdiction against him—and executed a disposition thereof in favour of the purchaser on the 30th of March, which was delivered on the 1st of April 1876, three months before the summons was served by a copy being left at the house the defender had occupied when resident in Scotland. About this state of the facts there was no dispute at the debate. The conclusion, therefore, seems inevitable that when the present action was raised against the defender he had no heritable property in Scotland; and it not being pretended that there was jurisdiction against him on any other ground, his plea of want of jurisdiction ought, in my opinion, to have been sustained, in place of being repelled, as it was, by the Lord Ordinary.

But then it would appear that the purchaser of the defender's villa and ground had not registered his disposition in the Register of Sasines till the 1st of April 1876, three days after the present action was raised; and founding on this circumstance the Lord Ordinary, in the note to his interlocutor, stated that the defender continued till after the action was raised "possessor of the heritable property," meaning the villa and relative ground, and was therefore subject to the jurisdiction of this Court. This, I think, is an entire fallacy. The defender had, previously to the action being raised, parted with the villa and ground. He had not merely sold it to another, but granted and delivered a disposition of it to the purchaser, whose entry to possession was the 1st of April, three days before the pursuer's action was raised. The defender was, therefore, neither owner nor possessor of heritable estate in Scotland at the time the action was raised, and, therefore, there was no jurisdiction over him. It is true that the defender may be said, in a certain sense, to have remained undivested of the formal title to his property till the purchaser registered his disposition; but, as remarked by the Lord Ordinary, he might have resold the property or sold it to another, or charged it with debt to any one ignorant of the sale which had been previously made, and of the unrecorded disposition to the purchaser. He could have done none of those things honestly, and, so far as he was concerned, any of the acts referred to would have been fraudulent and invalid.

possible, therefore, to hold that the defender was in any fair or correct position when the present action was raised, either the owner or the possessor of heritable subjects in question. It is true that a third party acquiring from the defender title to these subjects onerously and in good faith—that is to say, for a valuable price, and in ignorance of the prior sale, and getting his disposition recorded in the public office—that of the prior purchaser—would be, in competition with that former purchaser, preferred as the owner; but no such case has here occurred. The question is not whether jurisdiction might not be constituted against such a purchaser as the proprietor or possessor of the heritable subjects referred to, but whether there is jurisdiction over his author, the defender, merely because he has in certain supposed circumstances have succeeded in perpetrating a fraud. Besides, as the case actually stands, there would be jurisdiction against the party to whom the defender sold the property, and that just shews that it cannot be at the same time, and in respect of the same subjects, jurisdiction constituted against the defender.

Bowman v. Wright.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the ground of the Lord Ordinary's decision is erroneous, and that the defender's plea of want of jurisdiction ought to be sustained in place of being repelled.

GIFFORD.—I am of opinion that the defender, William Wright, was, at the date of this action (3d April 1876), and at the date of the citation following, not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, either in respect of his position as proprietor of heritable subjects situated in Scotland, or on any other ground disclosed in the pleadings. I think, therefore, that the defender's plea that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court must be sustained, and that the action accordingly falls to be dismissed.

The ground upon which it is maintained that the defender is subject to the jurisdiction is that at the date of the action and of the citation the defender was proprietor of heritable subjects in Scotland, that is to say, of a villa and garden at Pollockshields, near Glasgow. The defender, indeed, is designed as proprietor of a villa at Earnvale, Pollockshields, near Glasgow, but it is admitted that he did not reside there before the present action was raised, and that at the date of the action he had no domicile there, either actual or constructive. The ground of jurisdiction, therefore, is that although resident in England he was proprietor of a villa in Scotland. It is not said that the defender had any property or effects in Scotland, and, at all events, none of the defender's moveables having been arrested in order to found jurisdiction the pursuer can only rely upon the defender's proprietorship of the heritable subject.

There is no doubt that the defender was at one time proprietor of the villa in question, but some time before this action was raised the defender had sold it to the pursuer, with entry at 1st April 1876. A formal disposition in favour of the pursuer was executed by the defender on 30th March 1876, and the price was paid and the disposition delivered to the purchaser on 1st April 1876, being two days before the defender was cited in the present action, and two days before the summons was raised or signeted. It is not disputed that the sale was a valid and bona fide sale, that the price was duly paid, and that the disposition was delivered prior to the raising of the action. The disposition is in the usual form; it gives entry as at 1st April, being before this action was raised; and it was intended entirely to divest the defender of all interest whatever in the subjects sold. The defender, after receiving the price and delivering the disposition, retained or reserved no beneficial right whatever in the subject, and as in a question with the purchaser he had nothing whatever to do with it.

The pursuer, however, maintains that, as the disposition in favour of the purchaser was not recorded until 6th April 1876, this recording under the revised statutes being equivalent to infeftment, the defender must be held to have been feudal proprietor of the subjects till that date, and was therefore liable to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts, not only in the present action, but in all personal actions of any kind in which he might be cited at any time before the purchaser chose to record the disposition, and thus take infeftment in the subjects which he had purchased.

I do not think that the view contended for by the pursuer is well founded. It would lead to very startling results. For, in the general case, a purchaser is not bound to expedite infeftment in any heritable subject which he has bought, and as it might happen that although a person had absolutely and out and out sold his heritable property and left the country, it may be for forty or fifty years he would still be subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts, merely because the person to whom he had absolutely sold his property so long before had not chosen to complete his title. I think it is impossible to hold this.

It appears to me that the principle on which jurisdiction is founded in respect of heritable property rests not on merely nominal property, but on real and beneficial interest in some heritable subject. It does not rest on what the Lordship has called a mere fiction, but must have something real and substantial in the party against whom jurisdiction is sought to be established. It is in this case that at the date of the action the defender had really no heritable property in Scotland, and as there is no other ground relied on by the pursuer I think the objection to the jurisdiction must be sustained.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and sustain the first plea in law for the defender, and dismiss the action, and find him entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

Proof—Lease—Possession—Rei interventus—Missive Offer.—A person made a written offer for a lease of a farm on 14th August. At the request of the landlord's factor he met him, and on 12th September subscribed a second offer appended to printed conditions of lease. The second offer omitted certain alterations in favour of the tenant, and contained new conditions chiefly in favour of the landlord. There was no written acceptance, but possession followed on Martinmas. In defence to an action by the landlord to compel the tenant to execute a lease in terms of the second offer the tenant stated that when he signed the second offer he did so on the understanding that it was relative to and taken in conjunction with the first. Held that the second offer being only binding by the possession which followed upon it, proof must be allowed to sustain whether the possession was referable to the second offer only, or to both.

IN July 1873 the Duke of Hamilton advertised the farm of Flemington to be let. On 14th August 1873 Andrew Buchanan addressed the following letter to Mr Robertson, the Duke's factor:—"I hereby offer to take the farm of Flemington in Cambuslang parish, and presently occupied by Mr Russell, for a lease of nineteen years, the yearly rent of £1200."

Mr Robertson replied on the 18th.—“Before submitting your offer for e consideration of His Grace the Duke of Hamilton's trustees I will be liged by your furnishing me with references as to your means and agri-ltural ability for the farm of Flemington.”

On 6th September Mr Robertson appointed a meeting at the Hamilton tates Office on the 12th. On that day Mr Buchanan subscribed the lowing offer, appended to a copy of the printed conditions of lease used the Hamilton estates:—“I, Andrew Buchanan, residing at No. 28 elgrove Street, Glasgow, do hereby make offer to the trustees of His ace the Duke of Hamilton of the sum of £1200 sterling of yearly rent a lease of the farm of Flemington, in the parish of Cambuslang, as resently let to Archibald Russell, but excepting therefrom whatever ound has, previous to my entry under the said lease, been taken off the oun, or damaged by pits, roads, railways, plantations, or in any other way, r all which I am to have no claim for compensation, and on the under-anding that for whatever ground may be taken from the farm for any of ne purposes during the currency of my lease I am to be paid at the to of £6 p. imperial acre, the lease to commence at Martinmas next as the lands for tillage, and Whitsunday thereafter as to the houses and tare grass, and to endure for nineteen years; and I agree to the fore-ing printed conditions of let, the words ‘one-half of’ on the fifth line the bottom of page second being deleted. In witness whereof I anan C. Barr, witness; Thomas Muirhead, witness.”

Without any further written communication between the parties the dender entered into possession of the farm at Martinmas 1873 and Whit-nday 1874. Disputes arose as to the repairs to be executed by the dlord, and the defender refused to execute a lease in the terms pre-ted by the pursuer, and withheld payment of his rent.

The pursuer then raised this action, concluding for declarator that a id contract of lease had been constituted by Mr Buchanan's offer of 1 September 1873, and that the defender was bound to execute a formal e.

The pursuer set forth the said offer, and averred;—“The said offer was pted by the pursuer, and the defender, in terms thereof, was allowed nder into possession of the said farm at Martinmas 1873 as to the le land, and Whitsunday 1874 as to the houses and grass, and has e continued in possession of the said farm.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender's offer of 12th September 1873 ring been accepted by the pursuer, and followed by rei interventus, the e is binding on the defender, and he is bound to implement the same, i to execute a lease in terms thereof.

The defender averred that he signed the offer of 12th September “on understanding and believing that he was signing mere conditions tive to, and to be taken in conjunction with, his offer of 14th August.”
 e pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having refused to insert in the draft the ditions of the agreement, and having failed to implement these con-ons, the defender is not bound to sign a lease in the terms proposed.

The Lord Ordinary, on 31st May 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—

No. 58.

Jan. 25, 1877.
Duke of Hamilton v.
Buchanan.

" Finds, declares, and decerns, in terms of the declaratory conclusion of libel: Finds that the defender is bound to implement the whole conditions and stipulations contained in the offer and printed conditions of the libel, and forthwith to enter into and subscribe a formal and valid lease of the lands and farm of Flemington, in terms of the said offer and printed conditions, and remits to Mr James Moncreiff, writer to the signet, to prepare and lodge in process the draft of the lease so to be executed by the pursuer and defender in terms of this interlocutor, and continues the cause.

On 18th October his Lordship pronounced an interlocutor approving the draft lease, and ordaining the defender to execute a lease in terms thereof.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The offer of 12th September 1873 was only a unilateral document, and it was not probative, the writer not being named and designed. If there had been a concluded bilateral contract, inquiry would have been excluded. But this offer might have been accepted or rejected, and it was only made binding by possession. It cannot be said that the possession was necessarily referable only to the offer and not to the other. Both were kept by the landlord, and there was no repugnancy between the two. There were only certain conditions added in the second offer, which sufficiently explains why, in the opinion of the landlord, it was necessary to write a second offer.¹ It ought to be inquiry on what footing the possession was taken and given.

The pursuer argued;—The second offer was quite complete in itself, and fairly read, entirely excluded the idea of being only supplementary to the previous offer. If a previous offer, to which no reference was made, upon which nothing had followed, were to be admitted to modify the terms of a subsequent formal and complete offer, it would be equally incompetent to admit parole evidence and correspondence.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The foundation of the Lord Ordinary's judgment is that there was a completed and binding agreement that there should be a lease in terms of the offer and relative conditions of 12th September 1873. The judgment was pronounced on a closed record without taking evidence. But there was not a completed written agreement in any view of the case. The completion of the agreement, if it was completed, was brought about by the possession which the defender was allowed to take as tenant upon an offer made by him. Therefore, the question whether there was a completed agreement depends, first, on the terms of the offer, and, secondly, on the quality of the rei interventus, which consisted in the possession given and taken, and which was said to have operated acceptance of the offer by the landlord.

The circumstances are very peculiar. First, there was an offer by the

* "NOTE.—The offer of 12th September 1873 is complete in itself, and has no reference to any preceding offer. It was not accepted in writing, but possession followed upon it, and such possession is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, equivalent to a simple written acceptance.

"The defender argued that an offer which he had made on 14th August 1873 should be read along with and as part of the offer of 12th September. But he cannot allege that this offer was accepted in writing, or that any rei interventus followed upon it. His case is that, when he signed the offer of 12th September, 'he was signing mere conditions relative to, and to be taken in conjunction with, his offer of 14th August.' This is an allegation of error, but it does not entitle the Court to introduce anything into the contract which is not contained in the offer. At last, and, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, the only accepted offer."

18th August 1873 in which he offers for the farm as possessed by Russell, but on conditions as to improvements to be executed by the landlord. That offer was never accepted, but also, so far as appears from either the averments of parties or the correspondence, it was never rejected. The answer made by the pursuer's factor was the letter of 18th August, in which he says that in submitting the offer for approval he must have references as to the tenant's means and agricultural ability. So far from rejecting the offer that was actually entertaining it. We do not see from the correspondence or the facts what takes place after that till the meeting of 12th September, which was followed by a letter addressed by the factor to the tenant, dated 6th September, in which it is impossible to read without seeing that there must have been communications in the interval. These may very probably have related to the references demanded as to the tenant's means and agricultural ability, but they may also have had an important bearing on the terms and conditions which were in view of the parties. Be that as it may, the parties met on 12th September, and the defender then signed another offer in the office of the pursuer's factor. It omits any reference to the conditions in the previous offer, and alterations to be made by the landlord; but it imports the printed conditions imposed upon all persons offering for leases on the Hamilton estates. That offer was never accepted any more than the first. In itself it was not being neither holograph nor validly tested, and therefore it was of no effect unless fortified by rei interventus. It stood very much in this respect on the footing as the offer of 14th August.

It is not that possession of the farm was given and taken. The parties are at issue as to how it was given and taken, and what were its nature and circumstances.

The pursuer himself brings that out clearly in his condescendence, article 1st—“The said offer was accepted by the pursuer, and the defender, in consequence thereof, was allowed to enter into possession of the said farm at Martinmas 1873 as to the arable land, and Whitsunday 1874 as to the houses and outbuildings, and he has since continued in possession of the said farm.” What is meant by the offer being accepted is that he allowed possession to follow upon it. The averment is relevant only in respect of the words being inserted that the defender was allowed to enter into possession in terms of that offer. The pursuer, therefore, hereby undertakes to prove that possession was given and taken, and was afterwards held under and in terms of the second offer as distinguished from the first—in fact, that the possession was given and can be ascribed only to the second offer. That averment, in point of fact, is absolutely essential to the case of the pursuer. On the other hand, he fairly enough represents in the answer that while that was his view, the defender's allegation was that the possession was specially referable to the offer of 14th August also, or to that offer alone. When we look to the defender's statement, the matter is stated in the same way, except that it is not so clear as it ought to be whether possession was ascribed wholly to the first offer or to both. Thus, on the face of the pleadings, an essential issue of fact is raised material to the case, and without decision of which it is impossible to give judgment. This is a one-sided document, and a matter of fact to be proved before it can be reared up into the position of a contract. If there had been a distinct offer and acceptance, holograph or otherwise, we could not have gone beyond that or have entered upon the consideration of facts and circumstances. The quality of the possession would have been immaterial, for the contract would have been complete without it.

It appears to me that before we can decide this question we must know history of the case, and I do not know that there is any circumstance attending the possession in its first commencement and continuance that will not be material to the decision. I propose, therefore, that we should recall the locutor, and allow the parties a proof of their averments.

LORD DEAS.—Both these documents were delivered before possession was and taken, and the question is whether possession was so given and taken or both. The doctrine of law applicable to final and formal deeds, that we look at previous correspondence or communings, has no application whatever to this case. Whether the lease was to be in conformity with one of the offers or with both, a formal and final lease would in ordinary course have followed containing a great many stipulations not contained in the informal missive or minute. A document, although informal, which does no more than specify the subject-let, the endurance of the lease and the rent, is sufficient, if followed by possession, to constitute a lease, subject to the right of either party to insist upon execution of a full and formal lease. But it is clear that to such a document the rule above referred to does not apply.

Both of the offers in this case contain all the essential elements of a lease, and I agree with your Lordship in holding that if there had been a written acceptance of the second the parties must have entered into a formal lease on that basis. But the possession, which followed without any written acceptance, must be held to either the one or the other or to both. It would be difficult to hold that the lease was intended to stand on the first offer alone without reference to the printed conditions which were imported into the second. But it seems even more difficult to suppose that the tenant intended or the landlord understood the claim for improvements to be made by the landlord, such as altering the houses and putting the houses in tenantable repair, were to be relinquished by the tenant.

I cannot hold that, because the second document sets out with the words "we hereby make offer," the party is thereby tied down to the words of the offer to the exclusion of all inquiry, however reasonable or unreasonable it may be to suppose that such was intended.

I am of opinion that inquiry is perfectly open in point of law, and in point of justice.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of Lord Rutherford Clark of 31st May and 18th October 1876, and allow the parties a proof of their averments, the proof to be taken before Lord Shand," &c.

DANIEL MUNRO, Pursuer.—Fraser—Darling.
AGNES SMITH OR MUNRO, Defender.—Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Lenocinium.—Behaviour of a husband had been told that his wife had committed adultery, which was held (by the decision of Lord Curriehill) not to bar him, on the ground of lenocinium, from obtaining a divorce on account of a subsequent act of adultery.

Observation (per Lord Justice-Clerk) on the absence of any averment or plea leucinium on record. No. 59.

On 30th September 1876, Munro, who was a spirit-merchant in Dundee, raised an action of divorce against his wife for adultery with a man named Taylor, who had been a shopman of the pursuer's, and who was called as co-respondent. Two acts of adultery were alleged—the first July of that year, within the pursuer's house in Dundee, and the second 19th September of the same year, in the Waverley Temperance Hotel Dundee.

2d DIVISION.

Jd. Curriehill.

I.

The defender denied having committed adultery on either of these occasions. With respect to the latter she answered the pursuer's averment as follows:—"Denied, and explained that the pursuer asked the defender to see him at nine o'clock on the 18th of September. That she accordingly, in company with her landlord, Robert Tait, mason in Newgate, saw the pursuer in Dundee, and that he detained her and Tait until the last boat, which, leaves Dundee for Newport at ten o'clock, had departed. That she and Tait were thus forced to walk the streets, and having met or been joined by the co-defender, Taylor, who was lately a shopman in the pursuer's employ, and knew the maltreatment she had received from the pursuer's hands, took pity upon her, and accompanied her to the Waverley Temperance Hotel, Union Street, Dundee, where they remained until the departure of the first boat crossing the ferry in the morning. She stated that the defender committed adultery with the co-defender on one of the occasions specified."

A proof was allowed, from which the following facts appeared:—

The parties were duly married on 24th March 1862, and resided together as married persons until 31st August 1876, when the pursuer left his wife in lodgings at Newport, Fife, and returned alone to his house in Newgate, Dundee.

In 1874 Munro engaged the man Taylor, the co-respondent, as shopman, to assist him and his wife in the management of his business in his shop in the Seagate, Dundee. Some time after Taylor had entered his service Munro observed improper familiarities between him and his wife. At first he did not take notice of this; but afterwards, on their being repeated, he remonstrated with his wife, and subsequently he missed Taylor for being too familiar with the defender. Taylor, however, was again taken into Munro's service at the request of his wife; and although Munro dismissed him again and again he was always called back.

In July 1876, Munro, for the sake of his health, went to St Fillans for some time, leaving his wife in Dundee. A short time after his return he and his wife went to Newport in Fife, on the other side of the Tay from Dundee, where they lodged in the house of a man Tait. While they were there Mrs Munro quarrelled with her servant, Mary Robb, who came with them from Dundee; and in consequence—as Robb admitted—of that quarrel she told Munro, on 31st August, that during his absence at St Fillans in July improper familiarities had taken place between his wife and Taylor, and that in particular, on the night of the 26th or morning of the 27th July, she had found Taylor and Mrs Munro in bed together in the house in Cowgate, Dundee. In consequence of this information Munro, on 31st August, left his wife in the lodgings at Newport, and went home alone to his Dundee house. There was no other evidence of this alleged act of adultery, although another witness deposed to seeing improper familiarities before this.

Mrs Munro raised an action for aliment in the Sheriff Court of Dundee, and Munro paid her a sum of £10. On Sunday, 17th September, Munro v.

Munro.

Munro wrote a letter to his wife at Newport,* and at 8 o'clock on evening of Monday, 18th September, Mrs Munro asked Tait, in whose house she was lodging, to accompany her to Dundee to see her husband. Tait went with her, and upon arriving at the pier at Dundee the first person they met was Taylor. Tait and Mrs Munro and Taylor were there about for some time, and at length Tait went up to Munro's shop in the pier-gate, and asked him to come out and see his wife. Munro joined them, and they talked for some time, but came to no definite arrangement, and at last Tait and Mrs Munro started off to catch the last steamer from Dundee to Newport, which left at 10.15 p.m. Munro followed them a distance, and when he saw that they had lost the steamer he joined them again. They all walked together from the pier towards Munro's shop, but Mrs Munro seemed to be looking out for some one, and went back. Munro, who said that he suspected Taylor was "hovering about," seems to have been annoyed at this, and went into his shop, leaving his wife and Tait outside. He afterwards came out again, and offered some money to pay for his bed, which was refused, but he did not see his wife any. He then went into his shop, and when he came out both Tait and his wife were gone.†

Munro stated that he then went home to his house and went to bed, but on account of a suspicion which occurred to him that his wife was with Taylor he rose between four and five in the morning and went out to look for them. After making some inquiries of a policeman he went to the Waverley Temperance Hotel, which was the hotel near

* This letter was not recovered, but Munro in his evidence deposed to the contents of it as follows:—"On the Sunday before the 18th September I wrote to my wife a few lines, saying I wished to see her, to ask if she would leave that man's company—I mean Taylor. I was going to see her. Instead of that she came to the foot of Trades Lane, and sent me."

† Tait's evidence on this point was:—In chief—"When we got to the pier the boat had left. We stood at the quay a little time, and in the meantime I looked round and saw pursuer again. All the three of us then went up the street to pursuer's shop. He entered the shop and shut the door, leaving me and defender on the street." In cross—"We were not more than four, or five minutes at the landing-quay before pursuer again came to me and spoke something about the boat being away. I said we had lost it. I then spoke to go up to his shop. Defender hung back. Pursuer and I went on, and I noticed that defender was looking over her shoulder. Pursuer asked me to come and walk beside him. When she hung back he said 'Is that your wife?' or something like that. When I parted from him at the shop at 8 o'clock he offered me money to pay for a bed. It was defender's proposition we should go to pursuer's shop after having lost the boat. Taylor, when we were going on the opposite side of the way at the steamboat quay, had seen pursuer coming forward before I saw him; and I fancy he had 'ta'en the road.' Pursuer therefore did not see him, for he had disappeared before pursuer reached the steamboat quay. Nothing was mentioned about Taylor having been there. On the way up to pursuer's shop, when defender was looking over her shoulder, pursuer accused her of looking for Taylor. (Q.) Did she go into the shop? No; he would not allow her. (Q.) They had fallen out again before they reached the shop in consequence of her looking back? (A.) Yes, and in consequence of the way she was behaving towards him. When we were standing outside he expected him to come out and join us, and he did come out. He then offered me the money. (Q.) Did he say where Mrs Munro was to pass the night? He said she would look out for a bed for herself, or something of that kind. She and I went away together, and pursuer went into the shop, which at that time was not shut."

re pier, and there he found his wife and Taylor in a bedroom together, which they had obtained after saying that they were married persons. his room contained two beds, but only one had been used. The porter the hotel, Tait, and two policemen were also present when the couple are discovered together. No. 59.

Munro v.
Munro.

At the hearing on evidence and debate before the Lord Ordinary the defender's counsel maintained that the pursuer's conduct on the night last question was such as to entitle the defender to plead that he had been ill of lenocinium.

On 22d November 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it proved that for a considerable time before the month of September 1876 improper familiarities took place between the defender and co-defender, and that the pursuer was aware of these proceedings: Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender committed adultery with the co-defender on or about the night of the 26th or morning of the 27th of July 1876: Finds facts and circumstances proved relevant to infer that the defender committed adultery with the co-defender on or about the 19th day of September 1876, within the Waverley Temperance Hotel, Union Street, Dundee: But finds that the pursuer, who was then residing in his house in Dundee separate from his wife, who was then residing in lodgings in Newport, in Fife, invited the defender by letter to come and see him in Dundee, and that the defender accordingly, accompanied by Robert Tait, mason, the landlord of her lodgings in Newport, went to Dundee to see the pursuer about 8 o'clock in the evening of Monday, 18th September 1876: Finds that the defender, along with the said Robert Tait, met the pursuer in Dundee on that evening, and that the interview lasted so long that the defender and Tait missed the last ferryboat for the night, which leaves Dundee for Newport shortly after 10 o'clock at night, and that Tait and the defender were accordingly obliged to remain in Dundee all that night: Finds that the pursuer followed the defender and Tait to the pier, believing that they would be too late for a boat, and that the pursuer, accompanied by the defender and Tait, remained to the shop, a public-house kept by him in the Seagate of Dundee: Finds that after some conversation the pursuer offered to give money to the defender to enable him to procure a bed for himself, but refused to allow the defender to enter his shop or house, and told her that she could look out a bed for herself, but did not offer her money to enable her to provide herself with such accommodation: Finds that the pursuer then went into the shop, and that Tait and the defender left the place and walked about the streets until 1 o'clock in the morning of the 19th September, in company with the co-defender, William Taylor, who had seen and conversed with the defender in Dundee repeatedly in the course of that evening: Finds that after walking for some time with Tait the defender and co-defender left Tait, and went to the Waverley Temperance Hotel already mentioned, where they passed the night together: Finds that the pursuer expected and believed that the defender would meet the co-defender and pass the night with him, and that he was guilty of exposing the defender, wife, to lewd company, in the expectation and with the desire that she would commit adultery: Therefore finds that although the defender committed adultery with the co-defender upon the said 19th September 1876 the pursuer is barred by his conduct from obtaining decree of divorce on the ground of said adultery: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action: Finds the pursuer liable to the defender in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be lodged, and remits," &c.*

*NOTE.—This is a somewhat difficult and delicate case upon the evidence.

No. 59. Munro reclaimed, and argued;—In order to sustain the plea of laesum nium it is necessary to prove that the husband had either directly or
